This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PREFACE.

In the forty-sixth volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest this year contains, in the same form as last year, a summary of all the cases published from the 25th of October, 1897, to the end of August, 1898, in the WEEKLY REPORTER, and in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports, besides some of those given in the Irish Law Reports. In the body of the Digest, figures following the name of a case denote the page in the WEEKLY REPORTER at which it will be found. Where the name of a case has no figures attached, the case is not reported in this volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER; but the references to the case in other series of Reports will be found in the Tabular Index to the Names of Cases.

J. & P. COATS (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Exchange of shares in company for shares in other company—Conveyance or transfer on sale—Exchange—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 55, Schedule.

A transfer of shares in a company in exchange for shares in another company, held to be a conveyance or transfer on sale within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Grantham, JJ.) on a special case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

The instrument upon which the commissioners were required to express their opinion was a transfer of shares in a limited company in exchange for shares in another limited company.

The circumstances were as follows:

J. & P. Coats (Limited) were a company incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturers of cotton, woollen, and other threads.

James Chadwick & Brother (Limited) were a company incorporated for the purpose of carrying on a similar business.

By an agreement to which the two companies and certain shareholders in the latter company were parties it was agreed that the said shareholders should use their best endeavours to procure all the shareholders in James Chadwick & Brother (Limited) to sell and dispose of their shares to J. & P. Coats (Limited) in exchange for shares in J. & P. Coats (Limited).

In furtherance of this agreement for the amalgamation of the two companies, Alfred Kaye, the proprietor of twenty-five shares in James Chadwick & Brother (Limited), executed the instrument in question, which was as follows: "I, Alfred Kaye, in exchange for eight fully paid ordinary shares of J. & P. Coats (Limited) allotted to me by them, and one fractional ordinary certificate delivered to me, do hereby transfer to the said J. & P. Coats (Limited) twenty-five ordinary shares of £10 each, numbered 42,612 to 42,636, inclusive, of and in the undertaking called James Chadwick & Brother (Limited), to hold unto the said J. & P. Coats (Limited), subject to the several conditions on which I held the same immediately before the execution hereof; and we, the said J. & P. Coats (Limited), do hereby agree to accept and take the said shares subject to the conditions aforesaid."

The question was whether the instrument was chargeable under the Stamp Act, 1891, with ad valorem stamp duty as a conveyance or transfer on sale, or whether it was only chargeable with a ten-shilling stamp as an exchange.

By section 55 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891: "Where the consideration or any part of the consideration for a conveyance on sale consists of any stock or marketable security, the conveyance is to be charged with ad valorem duty in respect of the value of the stock or security."

The commissioners were of opinion that the instrument was chargeable with ad valorem duty as a conveyance or transfer on sale, and they assessed the duty at £2 15s.

The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the commissioners.

J. & P. Coats (Limited) appealed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am quite clear that the decision in this case must be upheld. We have to deal with a conveyance of shares in a company. We must apply what was said in John Foster & Son (Limited) v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 42 W. R. 259, [1894] 1 Q. B. 516. There Lindley, L.J., said: "What is the consideration? The consideration for the transfer of this property is, I agree, not money, but it is stocks and securities"—that is also the consideration in the present case—"which for this purpose are to be regarded as equivalent to money by reason of section 71 of the Act," or, as we may now read it, by reason of section 55 of the present Act. That is his construction of the Act, that, if you convey property for a consideration and that consideration is shares, it is equivalent to a conveyance of the property for money. Now take the words of Kay, L.J., in that case: "It seems to me clearly to be, under the words of this statute, a conveyance on sale for a consideration, which, if not money, at least is money's worth." Then A. L. Smith, L.J., says: "The term 'conveyance on sale' includes every instrument whereby any property, upon the sale thereof, is transferred to or vested in the purchaser in consideration of any stock or marketable security." The transaction here can be described in exactly the same language as is used in that case. But somebody has tried artfully to make an instrument which shall not be within the language of that case. The consideration is put first, before the conveyance, and the words "in exchange for" are put instead of "in consideration of." But suppose it read thus: I do hereby transfer to J. & P. Coats twenty-five shares of and in the undertaking called James Chadwick & Brother in consideration of eight fully-paid shares of J. & P. Coats allotted to me—that would be the exact thing described in those judgments. The other case of Great Western Railway Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 42 W. R. 211, [1894] 1 Q. B. 507, is really to the same effect. I think that this is an artful attempt by the use of the words "in exchange for" to escape from the law laid down in those cases. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether this document is a conveyance on sale within the meaning of the Stamp Act. It seems to me to fall entirely within the definition given by Lindley, L.J., in John Foster & Son (Limited) v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue. We have to consider what the substance of the transaction was, and the mere fact that the words "in exchange" are used cannot, I think, make any difference. In my judgment the substance of this transaction is a conveyance on sale within the meaning of the Act.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of opinion that this is a case of conveyance on sale. Looking at the document itself, we see that it is undoubtedly a transfer—that is, a conveyance to J. & P. Coats (Limited) of shares in an undertaking called James Chadwick & Brother (Limited). The consideration is certain shares in J. & P. Coats (Limited) and the parties, instead of using the words "in consideration of" have ingeniously used the words "in exchange for." Suppose they had struck out the words "in exchange," and left it simply "for fully-paid shares," I venture to think that no one would have dreamt that it was not a conveyance on sale. But putting in those words cannot make a difference, otherwise it would be possible by the mere introduction of such words to make that an exchange, which without them would not be an exchange. The facts show that this was intended by the shareholders to be, and was in truth, a sale of shares. The point has been decided in other cases, but I should have been disposed to decide it in the same way if those cases had never existed.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. THE GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL. (a.)

Dentist — Registration — Pupil — Declaration—Dentists Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 33), ss. 6, 7, 37.

A person who, at the date of the passing of the Dentists Act, 1878, was articled as a pupil to a dental practitioner, and whose articles expired in October, 1878, held not to be entitled to be registered under section 37 of the Act, unless he complied with section 7 by sending to the registrar before the 1*st of August*, 1879, the information and declaration therein mentioned.

Judgment of Hawkins and Wright, JJ. (45 W. R. 526), affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Hawkins and Wright, JJ.), discharging a rule for a mandamus to command the General Medical Council to place the name of Isidore Spero, the prosecutor, upon the Dentists' Register, reported 45 W. R. 526.

The prosecutor was at the date of the passing of the Dentists Act (22nd of July, 1878) articled as a pupil to a dental practitioner who was entitled to be registered under the Act. The prosecutor had paid a premium of £30 in consideration of receiving a complete dental education. His articles commenced in April, 1875, and expired in October, 1878. He did not produce or transmit to the registrar before the 1st of August, 1879, the declaration required by section 7 of the Dentists Act. Some years afterwards he applied to be registered, and the General Medical Council refused to place his name upon the register.

T. W. Chitty (Bigham, Q.C., with him), for the prosecutor, in support of the appeal.

Muir Mackenzie, for the General Medical Council.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The prosecutor in this case clearly comes within the words of section 37 of the Dentists Act; for he was at the time of the passing of the Act articled as a pupil and he had paid a premium to a dental practitioner entitled to be registered under the Act in consideration of receiving from him a complete dental education, and his articles expired before the 1st of January, 1880. The effect of his being within the section is that he is entitled to be registered under the Act as though he had been in bonâ fide practice before the passing of the Act. What would have been his position with regard to registration in that case? He would by section 6 have been a person entitled to be registered, and section 7 says that, where a person who is entitled to be registered does certain things, he shall be registered, subject to this proviso, that a person shall not be registered as having been at the passing of the Act engaged in the practice of dentistry unless he produces or transmits to the registrar before the 1st of August, 1879, information of his name and address, and a declaration signed by him in the form in the schedule to the Act or to the like effect. The prosecutor has never produced or transmitted any declaration at all. He therefore does not come within the first part of section 7 and he cannot be registered at all. The words of the Act are quite plain, and in my opinion the judgment of the Divisional Court is right.

A. L. SMITH, L.J—I also think that this judgment should be affirmed. The prosecutor was articled as a pupil to a dentist, and while the term of his articles was running the Dentists Act, 1878, was passed. By section 37 he became entitled on the expiration of his articles in October, 1878, to be registered under the Act as though he had been in bonâ fide practice before the passing of the Act. Section 6 states the qualifications for registration, one of them being that the applicant shall have been at the passing of the Act bonâ fide engaged in the practice of dentistry. Then section 7 says that a person shall not be registered as having been at the passing of the Act engaged in the practice of dentistry unless he sends in to the registrar before the 1st of August, 1879, a declaration in the prescribed form or to the like effect. It would have been quite possible for the prosecutor to send in a declaration moulded in the proper form between October, 1878, and the 1st of August, 1879, but he did not do so. The question how we ought to deal with a case in which the articles expired between the 1st of August, 1879, and the 1st of January, 1880, does not arise now. I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

In re TIBBITS' SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Appointment of trustees—Compound settlement—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-section 1; s. 50, sub-section 3—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 4, sub-section 1.

In order that a valid receipt for the purchase-moneys of land sold by tenants for life under the Settled Land Acts may be obtained, trustees for the purposes of the Acts must be appointed of all the deeds constituting a compound settlement.

Charles Tibbits, by his will in 1828, gave his real estate to his granddaughter, Mary Isabella Tibbits, for life, with remainder to her first and other sons successively in tail male. And he empowered her either before or after her marriage with any husband by deed or will to appoint to such husband for his life, to take effect immediately after her decease, a yearly rent-charge not exceeding £600 to be charged on the devised property with power to limit a term for securing the same. He also empowered her by deed or will to charge the property with portions for younger children to the extent of £10,000, and to limit a term for raising and securing them. The testator died in 1830.

Mary Isabella Tibbits exercised the power of charging the estate with portions for younger children, and limited a term of 1,000 years to trustees to secure the same, upon her first marriage to Viscount Hood, in 1837. Viscount Hood died on the 8th of March, 1846.

By a settlement made in 1849, upon her second marriage (to George Hall), she demised the property to trustees for ninety-nine years, if she should so long live, on trust out of the income to raise an annual sum of £1,500 for her benefit and then to pay the premiums on certain policies on her life which were thereby settled, and also charged the property with a rent-charge of £600 to George Hall. George Hall died on the 10th of September, 1854.

By a settlement made in 1858, upon her third marriage (with J. B. Maunsell), she appointed a rent-charge of £600 to J. B. Maunsell for life, and limited a term of 300 years to trustees to secure the same, and also demised the property to trustees for nine-nine years, if she should so long live, on trust to pay her £1,500 per annum, then to pay the premiums on certain policies, and subject thereto to allow J. B. Maunsell to receive the income during their joint lives. J. B. Maunsell afterwards assumed the name of Tibbits.

In 1866 the entail created by the will was barred, and the property was settled to such uses as J. B. Tibbits, Viscountess Hood, and Viscount Hood (her son by the first marriage) should appoint, and in default to the uses of the will.

By a settlement in 1871, on the marriage of Mary Blanche Hall (a daughter by the second marriage) J. B. Tibbits and Viscountess Hood demised part of the settled property to trustees for 100 years from the date of the marriage, if Viscountess Hood should so long live, upon trust to raise out of the income a yearly sum of £350 during the joint lives of Viscountess Hood and Mary Blanche Hall, and £200 during the joint lives of Viscountess Hood and E. S. Watson, in the event of Mary Blanche Hall leaving the said E. S. Watson and issue her surviving, such sums to be held on the trusts of a settlement of even date.

On the 6th of February, 1894, trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act were appointed (on the application of J. B. Tibbits and Viscountess Hood) of the will and of the re-settlement of the 3rd of December, 1882.

The present summons asked that the same trustees might be appointed trustees of all the instruments for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, or that in the alternative it might be declared that the existing trustees were capable of giving a discharge for the purchase-money arising from the exercise of their powers under the Settled Land Acts by the tenants for life.

Errington.—A valid discharge for the purchase-money cannot be given unless trustees are appointed for the purposes of the Act of the will and five deeds, which together constitute a compound settlement. In re Meade's Settled Estate, [1897] 1 Ir. Rep. 121, 45 W. R. Dig. 141, is exactly in point as to the charge of portions and the term to secure them. The other four deeds are covered by the Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 4, sub-section 1 (2).

Burnett.—The trustees, without any fresh appointment, can give a valid receipt for the purchase-money.

NORTH, J., followed In re Meade's Settled Estate as to the charge of portions, and thought that section 4, sub-section 1, of the Settled Land Act applied to the other four deeds. He accordingly appointed the trustees appointed in 1894 to be trustees for the purposes of the Acts of the compound settlement constituted by the will and the five deeds.

In re Soutar's Policy Trusts, 32 W. R. 701, 26 Ch. D. 236, discussed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a summons raising a question as to the mode of payment of policy-money secured by a policy effected by a husband for the benefit of his wife and children under section 10 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, where the husband dies after the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

The summons was taken out under the Married Women's Property Acts, 1870, 1882, and the Trustee Act, 1893, and asked (among other things) for a declaration that a policy dated the 10th of October, 1874, and effected by Wm. Turnbull, deceased, with the Prudential Assurance Co. "is now vested in the legal personal representatives of the said Wm. Turnbull, deceased, who are entitled to receive all moneys payable thereunder, and to give to the said assurance company effectual and sufficient discharge therefor, Or in the case that the judge shall be of opinion that the said policy of assurance is not now vested in the said legal personal representatives, with such power to give a discharge for the moneys payable thereunder as aforesaid, then that" under the provisions in the Acts on that behalf trustees might be appointed of the moneys payable under the policy. The policy in question was effected by Wm. Turnbull under the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, s. 10. It was declared to be for the benefit of his then wife Ann Turnbull and his children, and they were to be interested in the moneys thereby secured as therein mentioned. Two of the conditions endorsed on the policy were material. They ran as follow:

"The money payable under the policy shall not be paid before the expiration of three calendar months from the time when the death of the assured shall be proved to the satisfaction of the directors." "It shall be paid to a trustee appointed according to the Act of Parliament 33 & 34 Vict. c. 93, s. 10. It shall be paid to such trustee at the expiration of a month from the time when the satisfactory proof of the appointment shall be proved to the satisfaction of the directors, if the said three calendar months have then expired, otherwise at the end of the last mentioned period; but the directors may, if they think fit, pay to anyone beneficially entitled the amount to which he or she may be entitled."

Section 10 of the Act of 1870 provided that a policy of insurance effected by a married man for the benefit of his wife and children was to be deemed a trust for the benefit of his wife for her separate use and of his children, and so long as any object of the trust remained it was not to be subject to the control of the husband or his creditors or to form part of his estate. The section also provided for the appointment by the court of trustees of the policy moneys, and enacted that the receipt of such trustees should be a good discharge to the office.

Section 22 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, repealed the Act of 1870 subject to a proviso that such repeal should not affect any act done or right acquired while the previous Act was in force. Section 11 of the Act of 1882 provided that a policy of assurance effected by a man on his own life, and expressed to be for the benefit of his wife and children, was to create a trust in favour of the objects named, and so long as any object of the trust remained unperformed the moneys payable under the policy were not to form part of the estate. The section then gave the husband power to appoint trustees of the policy, and provided that in default of appointment it should vest in his legal personal representatives. It also provided that the receipt of a trustee duly appointed, or, in default of appointment, of the husband's legal personal representatives should be a good discharge to the office.

William Turnbull died in 1897, and the question now arose as to the mode in which the moneys secured by the policy were payable.

Ingle Joyce, for the summons.—I submit that the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, is only in force as to rights acquired prior to the passing of the Act of 1882, and that the view taken by Chitty, J., in In re Adams' Policy Trusts, 31 W. R. 810, 23 Ch. D. 525, is not correct. In re Soutar's Policy Trusts, 32 W. R. 701, 26 Ch. D. 236, is in my favour.

He referred to the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, s. 10, and the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 11 and 22.

P. Gregory, for the Prudential Assurance Co., supported the contention.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 27.—STIRLING, J. [after stating the facts and reading section 10 of the Act of 1870, continued:] Now, the effect of that section appears to be this, that the policy is not under any circumstances to be under the control of the husband or to form part of his estate. According to the language of the Act that extends not only to the policy-moneys but also to the policy itself; and it is plain that the husband has no power to appoint a trustee of the fund, nor, if a trustee were lawfully appointed, any power to assign the benefit thereof vested in such trustee. It is entirely out of his control. The right, therefore, of the cestui que trustent under this policy is that they are entirely emancipated from any control over the policy on the part of the husband. [His lordship read the 11th section of the Act of 1882, and continued:] That section is different. The language there is very remarkable. The policy immediately on being effected is to vest in the insured. That appears to me to point very strongly to the future. [His lordship read the 22nd section of the Act, and continued:] Now, looking at the question apart from authority, I come to the conclusion that the 11th section of the Act of 1882 does not apply for two reasons; first, because the language of the Act points to the future and is therefore inapplicable to the case of a policy effected before the commencement of the Act. If it had been intended that its provisions should apply to policies affected previously we should have found, I think, not the language which occurs: "In default of any such appointment of a trustee such policy immediately on its being effected shall vest," &c., but in addition some such words as "shall be deemed to have vested." And, secondly, I also think that to hold that section 11 applies would be to hold that the rights acquired while the Act of 1870 was in force were effected by the Act contrary to the express provisions of section 22.

It seems to me therefore that the cestui que trustent under this policy have a right to the exclusion of the husband or any person claiming, through him, from any control over the policy-moneys. I think that the conclusion to which I have arrived is in accordance with the decision of Chitty, J., in In Re Adams' Policy Trusts. The learned judge there said: "The policy was effected under section 10 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, which so far as the case before me is concerned has not been repealed by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and this is an application under that section for the appointment of a trustee." That, I think, was a decision that the provisions of the 10th section of the Act of 1870, had not been repealed, but the matter is made more plain by the report of the case in 48 L. T. Rep., at p. 728. It appears from that report that Chitty, J., inquired, in the course of argument, how the application was made under repealed Acts, and the report continues: "Section 22 of the Act of 1882 provides that the repeal of the Acts of 1870 and 1874 'shall not affect any act done or right acquired while either of such Acts was in force.' The right to have a trustee appointed to receive the policy-moneys was a right acquired under the old Act within the meaning of that section. [CHITTY, J.—Yes, I think that the Act of 1882 is prospective only; "shall vest" must relate to the future.] Perhaps it would be better to amend by striking out the rest of the title and leaving the petition entitled, in the Married Women's Property Act, 1870, only." And Chitty, J., directed that to be done. I have ascertained by an examination of the petition that that was done and that the order was made under the Act of 1870 only. Subsequently the case of In re Soutar's Policy Trust came before Pearson, J. Then the case of In re Adams was not called to his lordship's attention, but counsel for the petitioners seems to have used the same arguments as were used before Chitty, J., in that case. But Pearson, J., said: "I doubt whether section 10 of the Act of 1870 remains in force for any purpose, because section 11 of the Act of 1882 says that if at the time of the death of the insured there shall be no trustee, a trustee or trustees 'may be appointed by any court having jurisdiction under the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1850, or the Acts amending and extending the same.'" And he directed the petition to be entitled under all the Acts. The result is very curious, because in the case before Chitty, J., his lordship directed the additional titles to be struck out. But I do not read the views of Pearson, J., as amounting to more than a mere expression of doubt, and I do not think it is really a decision on the point. For these reasons I think that a trustee must be appointed under the Act of 1870.

The issue of warrants for arrears of interest does not operate as a satisfaction of the claims for interest. The cause of action is therefore in respect of a specialty debt, and is not within the Statute of Limitations, but of the Real Property Limitation Act*, 1833, and the period of limitation is therefore twenty years and not six.

This was an application on behalf of the liquidator in the voluntary winding up of the company for decision whether certain sums of unpaid interest on debenture stock of the company standing in the name of Thomas Holford at the time when the interest became due should be paid to him or whether his claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The Cornwall Minerals Railway Co. was incorporated under a special Act, 36 & 37 Vict. c. clxii., which authorized the company to borrow money to the amount of £250,000 on mortgage or by the issue of debenture stock, subject to the provisions of Part 3 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863. The company borrowed money on debentures, and in 1883 was in arrear. It then entered into a scheme of arrangement with its creditors whereby it was empowered to convert its old debenture stock into two new ones, A and B. These stocks were to bear interest from the 1st of July, 1883, and the interest on the old stock was to cease from that date. The scheme was confirmed on the 6th of February, 1885, and enrolled on the 11th of March, 1885. Certificates were issued to the persons entitled to B stock. Holford was one of these. On the 6th of June, 1885, he received a deferred warrant under the hand of the secretary of the company for the interest on his B stock from 1st of July, 1883, to the 31st of December, 1884, and in September he received a notice that this interest would be paid on presentation of the deferred warrant at the company's bankers. Holford never presented his warrant, and the question now arose whether he was still entitled to be paid or whether the claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

A. Read, for the liquidators and ordinary and preference shareholders.—This is a simple contract debt. The holders of these deferred warrants could have sued on them at any time after they received notice in September, 1885, that these warrants would be paid. The statute, therefore, began to run at that date, and the claim is barred. This is a new point; it was raised in argument but not decided in In re Severn and Wye and Severn Bridge Railway Co., 44 W. R. 347, [1896], 1 Ch. 559. In Barton v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 36 W. R. 754, 38 Ch. D. 458, stock was issued under seal of the company, and this is very different to the case of dividends where dividend warrants issued. This claim for arrears of interest for which dividend warrant is given is a simple contract debt given to shareholders by the company, and on which they could have sued at any time after September, 1885.

E. C. Macnaghten, for Holford.—The scheme provided that interest should run from the 1st of July, 1883. This warrant was for interest from that date to the 31st of December, 1884; but the warrant is no payment of the interest till it is cashed. This stock is under the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, and is under the seal of the company, and is a specialty debt. If the view of Christian, L.J., in Smith v. Cork and Bandon Railway Co., Ir. Rep.. 3 Eq. 356, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 115, is correct it covers my case. There was no actual covenant to pay him except as implied by certificate: Cork and Bandon Railway v. Goode, 1 W. R. 410, 13 C. B. 826.

Read replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In my opinion these gentlemen are entitled to be paid the interest in respect of the stocks referred to in article 1 of the scheme of the 11th of March, 1885. That article provided for the creation of two kinds of debenture stock—viz., A and B stock, in substitution for the existing mortgage and the debenture stock of the company. The statutory powers under which the stock was issued are contained in the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, ss. 22 and 27. Section 22 enables companies under special Acts incorporating Part 3 to raise money by the creation and issue of debenture stock, and to attach interest to the stock so created payable half-yearly or otherwise, and commencing at once or at a future time or otherwise as the company thinks fit. Section 27 provides for the recovery of interest in arrear by action or suit against the company. It seems to me that this interest was recoverable by action or suit against the company under the latter section.

Then we find on the 6th of June, 1885, a letter was written enclosing to each holder a warrant called a "deferred warrant" for interest from the 1st of July, 1883, to the 31st of December, 1884. I have one of these warrants before me now. It does not seem to me that the issue of those warrants operated as a satisfaction of the claim for interest. If it did it may be that a fresh cause of action was created. In either case the cause of action is in respect of a specialty debt, and is not within the Statute of Limitations but of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833. In my judgment the issue of the warrant did not operate as a satisfaction of the cause of action, and therefore as the original cause of action was statutory the same period of limitation applies as in the case of a specialty debt, and the period is therefore twenty years and not six years, and the Statute of Limitations does not therefore apply.

I see nothing in the scheme which would lead me to suppose that the issue and acceptance of the debenture warrant operated, as has been suggested, as a simple contract and not as a specialty debt. The respondents are therefore entitled to be paid these sums of interest.

HATTON (Appellant) v. TREEBY (Respondent). (a.)

Local government—Highway—Bicycle—Bicyclist riding at night without a light—Power of police constable to stop—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 85—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), ss. 78, 79.

Section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which declares bicycles to be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Act, and lays down additional regulations (as to having lighted lamps at night and as to the sounding of a bell) to be observed by the riders of the same, does not include the power given in sections 78 and 79 of the Highway Act, 1835, to apprehend without a warrant; and, therefore, a police-constable who sees a person offending against such regulations by riding at night without a lighted lamp, and who, in order to ascertain the name and address of the offender, who refuses to stop, lays hold of and stops the bicycle, and thereby throws the rider off the bicycle, commits an assault upon such offender.

Case stated by justices of the peace in and for the county of Somerset.

The appellant was summoned to appear at a petty sessions held at Keynsham on the 26th of February, 1897, by the respondent (a police-constable of the county of Somerset) for having committed an offence against section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, by riding his bicycle on the highway at Keynsham without carrying a lamp attached so constructed and placed as to exhibit a light in the direction in which he was proceeding.

The charge against the appellant was proved, and he was fined 2s. 6d.

The appellant had also summoned the respondent for that he, the respondent, did unlawfully assault and beat the appellant by pushing him or causing him to fall from his bicycle which he was then and there riding on the highway.

The complaint of the appellant was that the respondent had stopped him by catching hold of his bicycle and thereby causing him to fall off.

It was proved and found as a fact that the respondent was acting as a police officer on duty on the 17th of January, and that about 10 p.m. on that day he saw the appellant approaching him riding a bicycle; he saw that the appellant had no light attached to his bicycle, and he thereupon called the appellant to stop in order that he might ascertain his name and address, and to prevent a continuance of the offence. The appellant and a witness who was riding with him stated that they did not hear the call, and the justices did not find as a fact that they did. The appellant failed to stop, and thereupon the respondent caught hold of the handle-bar of the bicycle, and the appellant fell to the ground, such fall being occasioned by the act of the respondent in catching hold of the bicycle.

The justices found as a fact that the respondent did not know the name or address of the appellant, and they were of opinion that the appellant's name and address could not have been ascertained in any other way than by stopping him, and that in so stopping him the respondent was acting in pursuance of his duty, and that he used no more force than was necessary.

The justices were of opinion that, as the appellant was committing an offence punishable on summary conviction in view of the police-constable (the respondent), he, the respondent, was justified in stopping him and did stop him in order to prevent a continuance of the offence, and for the purpose of ascertaining his name and address; and they dismissed the complaint against the respondent.

The question for the court was whether the justices were right in dismissing the complaint of the appellant.

Section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), provides: (1) "Bicycles, tricycles, velocipedes, and other similar machines are hereby declared to be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Acts; and the following additional regulations shall be observed by any person or persons riding or being upon such carriage:

"(a) During the period between one hour after sunset and one hour before sunrise, every person riding or being upon such carriage shall carry attached to the carriage a lamp, which shall be so constructed and placed as to exhibit a light in the direction in which he is proceeding, and so lighted and kept lighted as to afford adequate means of signalling the approach or position of the carriage;" and the second of such regulations had reference to the sounding of a bell or whistle so as to give warning of the approach of the carriage.

(2) "Any person summarily convicted of offending against the regulations made by this section shall, for each and every such offence, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding forty shillings."

Section 78 of the Highways Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), specifies a number of offences by drivers of wagons, carts, or other carriages upon highways, and proceeds: "And every such driver offending in either of the said cases shall and may, by the authority of this Act, with or without any warrant, be apprehended by any person who shall see such offence committed, and shall be conveyed before any justice of the peace to be dealt with according to law"; and section 79 provides: "And whereas offences may be committed against this Act by persons whose names are unknown . . . be it therefore enacted, that it shall be lawful for . . . or any other person witnessing the commission of the offence, without any other authority than this Act, to seize and detain such unknown person who shall commit any such offence, and take him forthwith before any justice of the peace," &c.

Horace Avory (with him Kenrick and Gregory), for the appellant.—The respondent was clearly guilty of an assault upon the appellant. Stopping the bicycle and thereby throwing the rider to the ground is an assault, because it is an arrest and unless it can be justified it is an assault. We contend it cannot be justified, either at common law or under any statutory authority. At common law a police-constable can arrest without a warrant a person who has committed a felony or a person whom he reasonably suspects to have committed a felony, or where there is a breach of the peace going on; but generally, and apart from these cases, the power to arrest without warrant must—if it exist at all—be given by statute. As a general rule where an offence, as in the present case, is punishable on summary conviction, there is no power to apprehend unless such power is expressly given by statute, and this has been construed very strictly: Jones v. Owen, 2 Dow. & Ry. 600; Codd v. Cabe, 1 Ex. D. 352, 24 W. R. Dig. 86. At common law the respondent cannot justify, and he cannot do so under the statute, because the 85th section of the Act of 1888 merely declares that bicycles are to be carriages within the Highway Acts, but it does not say that for breaches of the regulations contained in that section, the power to apprehend given in sections 78 and 79 of the Act of 1835 are to be included. The statute gives no such power to apprehend, and to incorporate the provisions of the Act of 1835 giving power to arrest would be adding a new clause to the Act. This is a new offence created by the Local Government Act, 1888, and the section which creates the offence provides the remedy to be followed, and in such cases it is a general rule of law that that remedy alone can be followed.

He referred to Reg. v. Eaton, 59 J. P. 506.

Foote, for the respondent.—This is an offence which from its very nature must be committed when it is dark, and therefore, unless there is a power to stop the offender so as to ascertain his name and address, the provisions of the statute would be wholly useless. I rely on the word "additional" in the 85th section of the Act of 1888. That means that the regulations therein laid down are to be additional to those contained in section 78 of the Act of 1835, and the powers given by those sections are to be deemed incorporated with the regulations in section 85, which are said to be additional. Section 78 of the Act of 1835 gives power to arrest without a warrant persons committing any of the specified offences, and section 79 gives power to seize and detain offenders whose names are unknown. These powers of arrest are applicable to cases coming under section 85 of the Act of 1888. Again, if we look at the intention of the constable, this was not an assault at all, as all the definitions of assault go upon the ground that there must be an intention to do a corporal hurt: Bacon's Abr., title "Assault" and "Battery"; Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown; Coward v. Baddeley, 7 W. R. 466, 4 H. & N. 478. All that is contended for here is the right to stop, and that is not an assault. To convict a person criminally of an assault it must be shown that there was a criminal intention, which was wanting in this case.

Avory, in reply.

COLLINS, J.—I have come to the conclusion in this case that the argument of the appellant must prevail, as it seems to me that section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, in the passage which declares bicycles to be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Acts, does not include the power to apprehend offenders which is given by section 78 of the Highway Act, 1835.

The question arises in this way: The appellant was riding a bicycle on the highway without having a light attached thereto in such manner as is required by section 85, sub-section 1 (a), of the Local Government Act, 1888, which provides that during certain hours of the night a person "riding or being upon such carriage shall carry attached to the carriage a lamp, which shall be so constructed and placed as to exhibit a light in the direction in which he is proceeding." No doubt the appellant failed to comply with that provision, and the respondent called upon him to stop, which he did not do, and the respondent then stopped him in the way described in the case.

The question is whether that justified the respondent in stopping him as he did. It was contended for the appellant that the respondent had no authority in law for so stopping and arresting the appellant for this offence, unless such authority was given by statute, and that such arrest of the appellant was in law an assault. I agree with that contention, and in my opinion this was an assault, and I think that a summons for assault was properly taken out if the respondent had no statutory authority for so acting. The question therefore comes to this, whether we can find such statutory authority. Referring to the Highway Act of 1835, section 78 deals with offences committed on the highway by drivers and owners of carts and carriages, and the section proceeds to say, "every driver so offending shall and may, by the authority of this Act, be apprehended, with or without warrant, by any person who shall see such offence committed." Section 79 goes on to say that if the person committing the offence is unknown "any person witnessing the commission of the offence" may, "without any other authority than this Act, seize and detain such unknown person." Those being the provisions of the Highway Act upon this point, we come to section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which says that bicycles are hereby declared to be carriages, and certain additional regulations are introduced. It is contended that this provision incorporates the powers as to arrest contained in section 78 of the Act of 1835, and that is the main point we have to deal with, and in doing so we have to remember that we are dealing with a question which involves the liberty of the subject, as the person was arrested here, and we have, therefore, to construe the Act with the greatest care. It seems to me that we cannot adopt the contention put forward for the respondent. The Legislature thought it necessary for some purposes to say in section 85 that bicycles should be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Acts, and then it proceeds to make special regulations, the first of which is the one I have read and which is now in question.

There is nothing in that section which incorporates the powers of arrest given by the Act of 1835. The section for the first time creates the offence and deals with it, and introduces the section of the Highway Act, 1835, in a matter which does not contain this offence; and this section—the only section which creates the offence—does not give the power to arrest, but provides a special remedy in sub-section 2, which is the remedy to be followed. I think, therefore, the justices were wrong, and that the case must be sent back to them.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. The words of the later Act are not wide enough to do that which the respondent contends for. To do that would be in effect to add another provision to the statute.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) — May 10.

In re EVANS.

Bankruptcy—Proof—Interest—Promissory note—Principal and surety—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Schedule II., r. 20—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 5.

A surety to a promissory note who has paid the note at maturity may prove in the bankruptcy of the principal debtor for interest on the sum paid from the date of payment to the date of the receiving order.

Motion by a creditor in the bankruptcy by way of appeal from the rejection of part of his proof by the trustee.

On January 4, 1893, the bankrupt and the creditor signed a joint and several promissory note for £65, payable two months after date. When the note became due in March the bankrupt was unable to meet it, and it was paid by the applicant.

The receiving order was made in November, 1896; and the creditor proved in the bankruptcy for £74 12s. 6d., being £65 for principal money and £9 12s. 6d. for interest thereon from the date of payment to the date of the receiving order.

The trustee admitted the proof for £65, but rejected the claim for interest.

The creditor now moved by way of appeal from that decision.

Arthur Powell, for the creditor.—The creditor is entitled to this interest under the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 57, whereby the holder of a bill can recover from any party liable on the bill the amount of the bill and interest thereon from the date of maturity. The creditor here has paid the bill, and is in the position of holder, and has all the holder's rights. I also rely upon the case of Petre v. Duncombe, 20 L. J. Q. B. 242, where a surety who had had to pay an annuity was held entitled to recover interest on such payments in an action against the grantor of the annuity on whose behalf he had had to pay.

A. Neilson (C. C. Scott with him), for the trustee, relied upon rule 20 of Schedule II. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. This sum was not payable by virtue of a written instrument at a certain time, nor was any demand in writing made for it giving the debtor notice that interest would be claimed from the date of such demand; consequently, by reason of rule 20, the creditor cannot prove for interest. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 5, does not apply where the principal debtor's estate is being administered in bankruptcy.

Arthur Powell replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think that a surety who pays the amount of a promissory note to the principal creditor, and then sues the principal debtor, is entitled to recover, not only the amount of principal which he has paid, but also interest on the same from the date of payment. This follows, in my opinion, from section 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856: "Every person who, being surety for the debt or duty of another, or being liable with another for any debt or duty, shall pay such debt . . . shall be entitled to stand in the place of the creditor, and to use all the remedies . . . of the creditor in any action or other proceeding at law or in equity in order to obtain from the principal debtor . . . indemnification for the advances made and the loss sustained by the person who shall have so paid such debt." But whether that be so or not, it is impossible in bankruptcy that a proof should depend on the time of payment. What I mean is, that if a surety pays after proof by the principal creditor, his proof would be identical with the proof of the principal creditor, and would include the interest proved for by the principal creditor. It is desirable that he should be placed in a similar position; and if I were to deal with this question as one of discretion, and not of law, I should be disposed to allow him interest.

My attention has been called to rule 20 of Schedule II. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which seems to me merely to embody the provisions of section 28 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), as to interest. It does not add to or take away anything from the provisions of that section. The result is that no interest can be allowed unless the debt or a sum was payable at a certain time by virtue of a written instrument, or unless a demand for it has been made in writing. Here there was no demand in writing, but it was suggested on behalf of the surety that, by virtue of section 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, the right of the surety is a right on an instrument in writing—namely, on the promissory note. I take that view of the matter, and I think that under the circumstances I am entitled to allow the applicant to prove for interest on the sum he paid on the note from the time of such payment to the date of the receiving order.

The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Gaming—Betting—Reserved enclosure on racecourse—"Place"—"Using a place" for betting purposes—Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 3.

The defendants were the owners and occupiers of a racecourse, in which was a reserved enclosure, about a quarter of an acre in area, railed off from the rest of the racecourse. The public were admitted to the enclosure upon payment, and every person so admitted was entitled to walk about and stand in any part of it. Among those who paid for admission were a number of professional betting men, called bookmakers, who were admitted on the same terms as the rest of the public. The bookmakers when in the enclosure called out the odds they were prepared to bet against each horse, and were prepared to bet, and did bet, such odds with anyone who was desirous to bet, either on credit or upon the amount of the stake being deposited with the bookmaker. No bookmaker had any right, interest, or control in or over any part of the enclosure; he did not confine himself to any fixed spot in the enclosure, nor did he use any such apparatus as a desk, stool, umbrella, or tent, though any particular bookmaker was usually to be found in or near the same part of the enclosure. Betting of the same kind had been carried on by bookmakers in similar enclosures since the beginning of the century.

Held (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that the enclosure was not a "place used" by the bookmakers for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and that therefore the defendants did not permit the same to be so used within the meaning of section 3 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853.

Appeal from the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., in favour of the plaintiff, at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by a shareholder in the defendant company, who were the owners and occupiers of Kempton Park Racecourse, for an injunction to restrain the company opening or keeping a certain enclosure on the racecourse for the purpose of persons using the enclosure for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of money being received by such persons using the same as deposits made on horse-races, and from otherwise carrying on their business in a manner contrary to the provisions of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and of their memorandum of association, and from expending moneys of the company in the conduct of such illegal business.

In their defence the company alleged that the enclosure was not a "place" within the meaning of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and they denied that the enclosure was opened or kept for the purposes alleged, and that the bookmakers who frequented it were "persons using the same" within the meaning of the Act; they admitted that a considerable amount of betting was carried on by bookmakers in the enclosure, but under such circumstances that it was not illegal; and they alleged that at the time of the passing of the Act similar betting had been for many years previously habitually carried on in racecourse enclosures, and had since been carried on until recently without the intervention of the authorities.

The admissions of fact are fully stated in the judgments of Lord Esher, M.R., and the other judges.

Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., held that the case was not distinguishable from Hawke v. Dunn, 45 W. R. 359, [1897] 1 Q. B. 579, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5, 1897. — The following judgments were read:—

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an appeal from a pro forma decision of the Lord Chief Justice in a case tried before him without a jury. The action was brought against the Kempton Park Racecourse Co. by an alleged shareholder in it, asking for an injunction against the company to forbid them from continuing knowingly and wilfully to permit certain persons to use a certain enclosure belonging to the company illegally within the meaning of the Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119). The facts are to be collected from admissions made in writing and verbally at the trial before the Lord Chief Justice, and in certain particulars given between the parties before the trial and used as evidence at the trial, and treated as true in fact and undisputed.

As to these particulars Mr. Asquith, who argued the plaintiff's case as well and earnestly as it could be, said, in opening the case before the Lord Chief Justice: "I am instructed that, after a careful investigation, the facts stated in the particulars may be assumed to be correctly stated." It has been suggested to me that the facts stated in the tenth particular as to the former usage on racecourses is not correct. I think it is impossible for the Court of Appeal properly to adopt any such suggestion, and I venture to say that I am convinced that the statement is absolutely correct. From the sources I have named the facts of the case were ascertained to be as follows: The company are the owners of the Kempton Park Racecourse and of certain stands and enclosures on the racecourse. There are several stands, and each stand has an enclosure in front of it, open to the stand, but railed off from the rest of the racecourse by iron railings. One of these enclosures is known as the Reserved Enclosure. Admission is given to that enclosure and its stand to anyone who applies and makes a payment of £1 for and in respect of such admission. Every person so admitted is entitled to walk and stand in the enclosure and every part of it, and to sit in the stands. No part of the enclosure or stand can be, or is, reserved by anyone for his own use when not actually there. Many persons pay for admission to such enclosure and stand upon such terms, and amongst them are many professional betting men called bookmakers, who pay the same amount as others for their admission and who are admitted on the same terms as the others. The bookmakers when in the enclosure shout out the odds they are prepared to bet against each and every horse in a race, and for a certain time they bet such odds with everyone who desires to bet and who is ready, if required, to deposit with the bookmaker the amount which he bets against the bookmaker, so that the bookmaker, in case the horse against which he bets does not win, keeps the money he took on deposit, but if the horse does win he undertakes to pay the odds he bet against the horse. The bookmaker goes to the races and into the enclosure for the purpose of betting in the way described with everyone who will bet with him. The bookmaker bets as a matter of business. To bet in the way described is his business. The businesses of the various bookmakers are as against each other rival and competing, and the business of each bookmaker is independent of that of every other bookmaker. No one of them assumes to exercise or does exercise any manner of exclusive use of any part of the enclosure, but walks or stands in the enclosure and every part of it in the same manner and on the same terms as every other person in the enclosure. The description above given of the betting carried on at Kempton races is a full and accurate account and description of the betting which is carried on not only at Kempton races in the Reserved Enclosure, but in all racecourse enclosures in which betting takes place. By the tenth particular it was alleged that at the time of the passing of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, such enclosures were in like manner frequented by bookmakers, and betting transactions of precisely the same character were therein openly and habitually carried on by them, and had been so carried on since the beginning of the present century.

It is upon these facts that the plaintiff on the record asks for the injunction he claims against the defendants. He insists that upon these facts the judge who tried the case ought to have found that the company, the owners of the reserved enclosure, did knowingly and wilfully permit the enclosure to be used by persons other than the company—namely, the bookmakers—in a manner made illegal by the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. It is impossible to say that the company opened, kept, or used the enclosure for the purpose of the company betting with persons resorting thereto. It is impossible to say that the bookmakers or any bookmaker opened or kept the enclosure at all. The question must be whether the bookmakers or some or one was or were permitted to use and did use the enclosure illegally within the meaning of and therefore contrary to the statute. This proposition raises three questions: First, is such an enclosure such a place as can come within the meaning of the statute? Secondly, if yes, was the enclosure so used by anybody as to make the enclosure or any part of it a place illegally used within the meaning of the statute? Thirdly, if it was used illegally, was such use knowingly and wilfully permitted by the company? If all these three propositions are to be answered against the company, the injunction ought to be granted. If any one of them is answered in favour of the company, the injunction ought not to be granted. In this case it is clear that the company must have known what was habitually done in the enclosure. If, then, what was done was illegal, the third proposition must be answered against the company. If what was done was not illegal, the third proposition must be answered in favour of the company. They cannot be said to have permitted what did not exist. This reduces the discussion to the first and second propositions.

In order to determine the first and second propositions and their importance, it is necessary in the first place to determine what is the true construction of the statute. In order to construe the statute the court is bound to consider the condition of things existing immediately before and at the time of the passing of the statute which are dealt with by the statute. The court is bound in this case to consider, amongst other things, the things stated in the tenth particular. The statute commences with a preamble which, in my opinion, is not repealed: "Whereas a kind of gaming has of late sprung up by the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receiving of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices," &c. The mischief described is not gaming by betting nor gaming by receiving money in advance, but by such betting being brought about or rendered more easy by the opening of places called betting houses or offices. It is not betting, whatever may be its kind, which, independent of locality, is struck at, but it is the providing of a locality for particular kinds of betting which is the mischief to be dealt with. Then the enacting parts of the statute commence thus: "For the suppression thereof be it enacted," &c. "Thereof" does not mean "for the suppression of betting"; it refers to the recited mischief of betting in the new manner of betting—that is, by the manner of opening of places called betting houses or offices, which is a manner which brings about betting or makes it more easy for many to bet. Then the enactment proceeds, and the description of the locality is enlarged beyond the description of it in the preamble. It describes not only a place called a betting house or office, but says, "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used." Still it is a kind of locality which can be opened, kept, or used. And in section 2 this locality, called a house, room, or place, is one which can be taken and deemed to be a common gaming house, in which persons not gaming may be found; into which the police may force entrance by breaking into it; and in which they may arrest and search persons found in it, though those persons are in it without any purpose of gaming at all. Taking into account the mischief indicated in the preamble, and the description of the locality in the enacting part of the statute, the locality being a necessary part of the offence, and the word "place" being indefinite, and so indefinitely large that it must have some limitation, I can see no reason why the rule of construction as to the interpretation of general words in a statute following particular or more limited words should not be applied. That rule requires an interpretation of the general words limiting them to matters or things of the same kind, as to the mischief being dealt with, as the previous words; but an interpretation as wide as the limitation just described will admit. Applying this rule of interpretation to the present statute, it seems to me that the place must be a place used for betting, which can for the purpose of betting be not unreasonably deemed to be a place of the same kind as a house, office, or room used for the purpose of betting. It need not be a building built like a house, room, or office; it need not be a covered place; it need not be railed off, or boarded off, so as to prevent physical access to it except through a particular part of the railing or boarding; but it must be a defined space, capable from its condition of being used by a person who desires so to use it as if it were his house, room, or office, used by him as such for his betting business. I think that the Reserved Enclosure described and existing in this case was, in consequence of its structural condition, a defined space, capable of being used by a person desirous of so using it as if it were his house, room, or office, used as such for his betting business.

Then arises the second question, whether any person did so use the enclosure as to enable the court to say that he used it as if it were his house, office, or room, used by him as such for his betting business. Now, there are and must be some essential rights of a person using a place as his house, his office, or his room, different from the rights as to it of persons who are not using it as their house, office, or room. He must have some right of user peculiar to himself and exclusive of their rights, if any. A man cannot be said to be using a room as his room or office if, when he comes to it, he finds it full of people, even if they have come to see him or to deal with him, and yet he has no right to say, "Make way or room for me to come into my room or office." A man cannot be said to be using a table as his table if any person who can find room at the table has as much right as he has to come to it and use it in any way such person thinks fit. The user by a person of a place as if it were his room or office necessarily implies some exclusive right in him as against some other persons. He may have partners in the room, or he may use part of the room as his office, whilst others have an independent right to use another part of the room as their office; but the part of the room or place which can be said in any reasonable sense to be used by him as his office must be a part which he claims to use and does use exclusively as his against some people. Applying that rule to the enclosure in question, the facts seem to me to show that no one of the bookmakers described in the evidence does claim to use and does use any part of the enclosure as his part of it exclusively as against any one. To say that he uses or claims to use the spot of ground on which he is at the moment standing as his room, office, or place exclusively as against all the world, as if it were his room or office, is beyond all reason. So long, therefore, as an enclosure on a racecourse is used only as this enclosure was used, it cannot, in my opinion, be said to be a place used contrary to the prohibitions or subject to the penalties imposed by the statute. If an enclosuse on a racecoure or elsewhere is used only as this enclosure was, no one can properly hold that the enclosure is being illegally used contrary to the statute. As matter of law, there is no legal evidence to bring it within the statute. If any other circumstance is added and relied upon in any other case, the whole case must then be considered subject to the rule I have laid down.

It follows that I do not agree with the interpretation put upon the statute or the application made of it to the facts in the case of Hawke v. Dunn. It seems to me that the learned judges in that case did not rightly determine what kind of user of the place will bring it within the prohibition of the statute. Their judgment is open to this criticism, that, according to it, if a bookmaker makes what the judgment calls a ready-money bet in a place which it is possible to use so as to make it a prohibited place within the statute, the mere fact of his so doing makes it a prohibited place. And it seems to me that this conclusion is founded on the view mentioned in the judgment that one of the practices deemed to be objectionable was the practice of ready-money betting, wherever such betting was made, without reference to the locality in which such bet was made. With that view I cannot, as I have said, agree. I may repeat that, in my opinion, the mischief aimed at was not gaming by betting nor gaming by receiving money in advance, but by such betting being brought about or rendered more easy by the opening or keeping or using a place for the purpose of making, as a matter of business, such bets.

The other cases which have been cited before us must be considered, if this judgment of mine is correct, as instances to which the rule now laid down must be applied. I cannot undertake by ingenuity to explain any of them away. I think that my present view of the statute is what I substantially stated, though not so elaborately, in Bows v. Fenwick, 22 W. R. 804, L. R. 9 C. P. 339. Whether the statute was in that case rightly applied to what was called an umbrella may be doubtful. If the thing was really a tent I should think the decision right; if the thing was really an ordinary umbrella I think the decision was wrong. In Snow v. Hill, 33 W. R. 475, 14 Q. B. D. 588, I think that A. L. Smith, L.J., took the the same view of the statute as I had done in Bows v. Fenwick, and do now. I think that the case of Gallaway v. Maries, 30 W. R. 151, 8 Q. B. D. 275—the case of a betting man standing on a stool to bet—was, with deference, wrongly decided. I must say that I think Eastwood v. Miller, 22 W. R. 799, L. R. 9 Q. B. 440, was wrong. The defendant occupied the field and charged people for entering it. But I cannot see that he used it for the purpose of betting himself at all. I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This action is brought by a shareholder of a company to restrain it from carrying on its business in a manner alleged by the plaintiff to be illegal—viz., contrary to the provisions of what is now shortly called the Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119). An injunction had been granted by the Lord Chief Justice on the authority of Hawke v. Dunn, a considered and unanimous decision of a Divisional Court, and which the Lord Chief Justice considered himself compelled to follow. No objection was taken before him nor before us that the court had no jurisdiction to grant an injunction to restrain the commission of what is a criminal offence if the plaintiff is right. It has been assumed, and perhaps rightly, that the court has jurisdiction to protect the shareholders of a company from a misapplication by the company of its property, although such misapplication may be punishable as a criminal offence. I shall also assume such jurisdiction and leave this point open for decision when raised and insisted on.

The present case was decided on admitted facts, and one of those facts—viz., what was common practice in 1853—is very important. The particulars describe in detail the enclosure complained of and the use made of it, and in the tenth particular it is stated that "at the time of the passing of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, such enclosures were in like manner frequented by bookmakers, and betting transactions of precisely the same character were therein openly and habitually carried on by them and had been so carried on since the beginning of the present century." I presume that this statement could be proved, if not admitted, and that it is admitted simply to save the expense of formal proof.

With these preliminary observations I proceed to consider the statute on which the case really turns. The title, if part of the Act, the preamble, and the first twelve sections are all material; the other sections throw no light on them. An examination of the statute from its commencement to the end of section 12 shows—(1) that the object of the Legislature was, if possible, to suppress a kind of gaming which had then lately (in 1853) sprung up, and which is described in the preamble; (2) that in order to attain this object betting houses and other places are prohibited and are declared to be common nuisances and to be gaming houses within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, sections 1 and 2; (3) that penalties are imposed on those who keep such places and those who in any way advertize them (sections 3, 4, and 7); (4) that places suspected of being such as are prohibited may be broken into and persons in them may be arrested, and all documents found therein and relating to racing or betting may be seized (sections 11 and 12). The Act, in short, is aimed at betting houses and at those who keep them; it is not aimed at betting anywhere nor at persons who go to betting houses to bet with those who keep them. The language of sections 1 and 3 in some respects goes much further than that of the preamble, and, when clear and unambiguous, effect must be given to the wider language of the enacting sections. For example, the preamble mentions only "the opening of places called betting houses or offices and the receipt of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses and offices or by other persons acting on their behalf," whilst section 1 plainly prohibits not only the opening but the keeping and using of such places and betting with persons resorting thereto, whether they pay money in advance or not. The language of the prohibition being in these respects plain and unambiguous, it cannot be properly restricted by the language of the preamble. But when it becomes necessary to ascertain what sort of places other than betting houses, rooms, or offices were aimed at, there is much more difficulty. No person can bet except in some place or other, and whenever he bets in any place he uses that place for betting. To construe "other place" or "place" in its ordinary sense of any and every place where persons can or do bet would involve an absolute prohibition of betting, and would have rendered it quite unnecessary to specify betting houses, rooms, or offices. But the Legislature clearly did not intend to prohibit and have not prohibited all betting, nor even all betting by persons who deposit their stakes. Some limitation must therefore be put on the expression "other place" or "place," and the real difficulty is to discover, first, what sort of place is prohibited; and, secondly, to determine whether the enclosure with which we have to deal on the present occasion is such a place.

The language of the Act itself indicates what sort of place was aimed at by the Legislature, although no definition of the word "place" is to be found in the Act. The places aimed at are described as "places called betting houses or offices" (see the preamble); they are referred to as "house, office, room, or other place" (section 1); as some place to which persons do or can resort for betting (section 1); as some place where the business of betting is carried on (sections 1, 3, and 4); as some place used as a betting house or office, and which can be forcibly entered under a magistrate's warrant, or an order of the Commissioners of Police (sections 11, 12); as some place which can be advertised as a betting place (section 7); as some place which can be reasonably regarded as a common nuisance (section 1); and which it is not absurd to treat as a gaming house within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 (section 2). The sort of place aimed at can be gathered, though not very distinctly, from the language then used; and it appears to me reasonably clear that a betting house or office is the type of place which the Legislature had in view; and that no place is within the Act which is so unlike a betting house or office as not to resemble it otherwise than by being a place where some persons sometimes bet or even go to bet. I cannot bring myself to think that a place which is so unlike a betting house or office as an ordinary English racecourse is within the Act at all. This was the view taken by the Scotch court in Henretty v. Hart, 13 Court of Sess. Cas. (Court of Justiciary), 4th series, 9, cited by Mr. Walton. On the other hand there may be betting houses or offices or other places of that sort on a heath or anywhere where people congregate to see a race or any other exhibition. There may be a betting booth, or enclosure, or ring, or place, not easy to describe by any appropriate name, which sufficiently conforms to the type of a betting house or office as to be hit by the Act; and I am not prepared to say that the cases of Shaw v. Morley, 16 W. R. 763, L. R. 3 Ex. 137; Bows v. Fenwick; and Gallaway v. Maries, were decided on any erroneous principle.

The desk the stool and umbrella, and the wooden box which had to be considered in those cases were held to conform to the type of a betting office and to be prohibited accordingly. These cases seem to me to go to the very verge of the law in the application of the principle on which they were decided. Doggett v. Catterns, 13 W. R. 160, 17 C. B. N. S. 669, in Ex. Ch., 13 W. R. 390, 19 C. B. N. S. 765, turned on sections 4 and 5 of the statute, and the actual decision does not assist us. There was so much difference of opinion about the meaning of a "place" that the case is a very unreliable guide on that head. Eastwood v. Miller and Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, 23 W. R. 547, L. R. 10 Q. B. 102, are the only other cases prior to Hawke v. Dunn which I think it necessary to notice. Both were cases stated by magistrates who found that the grounds then in question were places within the Act. The court, therefore, had only to say whether there was evidence to justify such a finding, and the court decided that there was. The court came to the conclusion that it could not say as a matter of law that the magistrates were wrong. But bearing this in mind Eastwood v. Miller seems to have been merely a case of betting at a pigeon match, and went too far. In Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield there were several circumstances to justify the finding of the magistrates—viz., the connection of the grounds with the house, the desks and stools, and clerks, which, if inside the house instead of outside, would have made the case an easy one. It would have been going too far to say that there was no evidence there to support the finding of the magistrates.

Having pointed out to the best of my ability what sort of betting place is prohibited, I pass on to consider whether the Reserved Enclosure with which we have to deal is the kind of place aimed at by the Legislature. It is a place where any one can go who chooses to pay £1; where bookmakers and others resort for betting purposes; where bets are made for money deposited as well as on credit, and where many persons go without betting or intending to bet, but simply to see the race and their friends and acquaintances. The place does not, in my judgment, come up to the type of a betting house or office such as the Legislature has prohibited. This conclusion is, in my opinion, strengthened by the preamble and by the statement as to the long existence and use of such enclosures as these before 1853. Having regard to this statement and to the preamble and to the ambiguity of the word "place" in the enacting clauses, I am unable to construe the Act as aimed at or as including such an enclosure as this is. This conclusion is further strengthened by the fact that such enclosures so used were not supposed to be illegal until the last two or three years. As regards the case of Hawke v. Dunn, I am of opinion that it was wrongly decided, and that sufficient attention was not paid to the type of place which the Legislature was aiming at. The decision can, in my judgment, only be supported by treating the Act as an Act for the suppression of betting instead of an Act for the suppression of betting in a particular description of place. The appeal ought to be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants.

LOPES, L.J.—The plaintiff claims an injunction against the defendant company to restrain them from using or knowingly permitting to be used a certain enclosure at Kempton Park, known as the Reserved Enclosure, for betting purposes, and from carrying on their business in a manner contrary to the provisions of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and contrary to their memorandum of association, and from expending the assets of the company in and about the conduct of of such illegal business.

The case was heard before the Lord Chief Justice (Lord Russell of Killowen), and he granted the injunction, acting upon the recent decision in Hawke v. Dunn. The use of the enclosure for the purposes alleged, and the knowledge of the defendants that it was so used was admitted, but it was contended that the enclosure was not a "place" within the meaning of the statute. The enclosure in question is uncovered, and is about a quarter of an acre in extent. The public are admitted indiscriminately to this enclosure on making the required payment; some are professional bookmakers, others go there for the purpose of backing horses with the professional bookmakers, and others do not bet at all. The bookmakers go there as a portion of the general public, and on the same terms in all respects. They have no special rights, privileges, or control beyond those possessed by the general public, who frequent the enclosure. The bookmaker does not confine himself to any fixed spot in the enclosure, nor does he use anything brought on, or fixed to, the soil, such as a desk, stool, umbrella, or box, but is generally to be found in or near to the same part of the enclosure. No betting lists are exhibited.

Is this enclosure "a place" within the meaning of the Betting Houses Act, 1853?

Betting per se is not illegal, and is only made illegal by the Act of 1853 if carried on in prohibited places.

The Act of 1853 is a penal statute, and must be construed strictly; by which I mean that the court, in construing such a statute, must see that the thing charged is an offence within the plain meaning of the words used, so as to carry out the true intention of the Legislature. I accept the statement, and have no doubt of its accuracy—namely, that at the time of the passing of the Act of 1853 betting of the same character as that complained of in this case had for many years previously been habitually and notoriously carried on on racecourses and in enclosures on racecourses, and has since that time been so carried on until quite recently without any suggestion of its being illegal.

I now approach the Act of 1853. It is called an Act for the Suppression of Betting Houses. The title, it is true, is no part of the Act, but, as was said by Jessel, M.R., in Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511, it is always in the roll, and may be looked at in order to remove any ambiguity in the words of the Act. It cannot be used to control the express provisions of an Act, yet, if there be in those provisions anything admitting of a doubt, the title of the Act is a matter proper to be considered in order to assist in the interpretation of the Act, and thereby to give to the doubtful language in the body of the Act a meaning consistent, rather than at variance, with the clear title of the Act.

Applying this rule to the present case, it is not too much to say that it shows the words "place" or "other place" was intended to have a restricted or limited meaning, otherwise the title of the Act might have been "An Act for the Suppression of Betting Places."

Again, look at the preamble. "Whereas a kind of gaming has of late sprung up tending to the injury and demoralization of improvident persons by the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receiving of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices, or by other persons acting on their behalf, on their promises to pay money on events of horse races and the like contingencies." The only places mentioned are betting houses or offices, and the demoralization is said to be caused by a kind of gaming "of late sprung up." There is no mention of racecourses, though horse-races are evidently in the mind of the Legislature. Betting on racecourses and in enclosures on racecourses had existed for years, and could not be said to be "a kind of gaming of late sprung up." On the other hand, betting in betting houses was new, and was in 1853 regarded as an evil to be remedied. The rule is that when the words of the enactment are clear the preamble is to be disregarded, but when the words are equivocal effect is to be given to it to the extent that it shows what the Legislature are intending, and if general language is used in the enactment which it is clear must have been intended to have some limitation put upon it, the preamble may be used to indicate to what particular instances the enactment is intended to apply.

It cannot be said that "place" or "other place" was intended to include all places; if so, it would amount to this, that the Act was passed to suppress betting, for no person, so far as I know, can bet without occupying a place, if it is only the place upon which he is at the time standing; and, if he bets, he uses that place for betting.

Both the title of the Act and the preamble of the the Act indicate some limitation to be put on the words "place" or "other place."

But what limitation? That is to be gathered from the words used in the first four sections of the Act, "house, office, room, or other place," and "house, office, room, or place." Surely the doctrine of noscitur a sociis or ejusdem generis is applicable here. That doctrine may be thus expressed—namely, where there are general words following particular and specific words, the general words must be confined to things of the same kind as those specified. A good illustration of what I mean is the case of Powell v. Boraston, 13 W. R. 465, 18 C. B. N. S. 175, where it was held that "other building" to qualify for the parliamentary franchise under section 27 of the Reform Act, 1832, must be something substantial and ejusdem generis with the preceding words, "house, warehouse, counting-house, shop." I cannot hold that an open racecourse or open enclosure in a racecourse is ejusdem generis with house, office, or room—an enclosure where there is no structure of any kind, nothing built upon or fixed into the soil, and no appropriation of any fixed spot, and to which the public are indiscriminately admitted.

But if we further examine the statute we shall find further indications that this statute was never intended to apply to racecourses or enclosures in racecourses used for betting. By section 2 the place struck at is to be deemed to be a common gaming house within the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and may be indicted as such. How could an enclosure in a racecourse by any stretch of the imagination be deemed to be a gaming house? Section 7, again, does not seem applicable to an enclosure on a racecourse, but rather to something like a house, office, or room, which can be advertized. Then, again, section 11, authorizing police constables to enter by force "whether by breaking doors or otherwise," and to search and to seize all lists, cards, or other documents relating to betting found in such house or premises, points rather to betting houses or places resembling a house, room, or office rather than an open enclosure in a racecourse. Section 12 is very significant. It enables a commissioner of police to authorize any superintendent of police to enter any house, office, room, or place if he suspects that such office, room, or place is kept or used—as what?—as a betting house or office. How could this enclosure be used as a betting house or office? I cannot think that a place so unlike a house, office, or room as the enclosure can have been contemplated by the Act. If this enclosure is within the Act, why not the whole racecourse? Why not any place where a man stands and bets? So to hold would be equivalent to holding that betting anywhere and everywhere is illegal, and would make it difficult to understand why the Act of Parliament specified any places.

The Act was intended to strike at betting houses or something resembling a betting house where betting was carried on, but was not intended to interfere with betting on racecourses such as had been carried on for very many years before the passing of the Act. If the contention of the respondent is correct, the Act of 1853 should have been entitled an Act, not for the suppression of betting houses, but for the suppression of betting. In my judgment Hawke v. Dunn was wrongly decided. That case has carried the law further than any of the previous cases and cannot be supported.

I think it unnecessary to refer at any length to the previous authorities. They are all distinguishable from the present case. The cases most relied on by the respondents were the cases of a desk, stool, umbrella, and box placed upon or fixed in the locus in quo. I do not believe that in any of those cases a conviction would have taken place if the desk, stool, umbrella, or box had not been present, and the court had been asked to hold the locus in quo prohibited under the Act without such accessories. There is no desk, stool, umbrella, or box in this enclosure, and, as I have said before, nothing that can be said to have any resemblance to a house, room, or office used for betting. Whether the construction of the statute was not somewhat strained in these cases to which I have last referred it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to decide. In Galloway v. Maries, which was heard by Grove, J., and myself, and which was the box case, I felt great hesitation in holding that a wooden box such as described could be a place within the meaning of the Act, but considered that I was bound by previous decisions. Each case must depend upon its own particular circumstances, and it is not difficult to imagine something placed on a racecourse which, without being a house, room, or office, would so resemble them and so partake of their nature when used for betting purposes as to come within the meaning of the Act.

I do not attempt to define what is a "place"; all I say is—and that I say without hesitation—that this enclosure is not a place within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

No point has been made that an injunction will not lie to restrain the commission of a criminal offence. I believe that it will lie when its object is to protect the shareholders of a company from any misapplication of its property, although such application may be punishable as a criminal offence. The appeal will be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This action is brought to review in a court of appeal a judgment given in the Queen's Bench Division in the case of Hawke v. Dunn, and the real question to be determined, disregarding the form in which the action is brought, is whether a professional bookmaker, who carries on his business in the accustomed manner, moving about an enclosure at a race-meeting betting with those of the public who are desirous of betting with him, sins against the provisions of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, entitled "An Act for the Suppression of Betting Houses."

If such bookmaker sins against the Act, so do all owners of racecourses who knowingly and wilfully permit such bookmaker to carry on his calling in the enclosures thereat, and each, whether bookmaker or owner of a racecourse, is liable to fine or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not exceeding six calendar months, and any person who may happen to be within the enclosure when a professional bookmaker is there plying his calling is liable to be arrested and searched and taken before a justice of the peace.

Although the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 19), in one particular deals with this Act of 1853, as also does the Short Titles Act of 1892 (55 Vict. c. 10), they are wholly immaterial to the present case, and the Act of 1853 must be construed as if those Acts had not been passed and the question had arisen shortly after the Royal Assent had been given to the Act of 1853 upon the 20th of August of that year.

Before I turn to this Act, upon the true construction of which the decision of this case entirely depends, I must point out that prior to the time of its passing all kinds of betting, whether by professional bookmakers or by the public, were perfectly legal, no matter where the bets were made, or whether carried on upon credit or by the payment of money by way of deposit on bets, which is called "ready-money betting."

In the year 1845 the Legislature had enacted by the Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18, that all contracts or agreements by way of gaming or wagering should thereafter be null and void and incapable of being enforced in any court of law or equity, so that bets after the passing of the Act of 1845 won upon horse-races or other events became mere debts of honour incapable of being enforced, but the bet itself or betting in general, whether upon credit or by way of ready-money, wherever carried on, was in no way made illegal, the only disability attaching thereto being that money won by betting could not be recovered if the loser did not choose to pay. Thus far the Legislature had gone, and so matters stood at the time when the Act for the suppression of betting houses came to be passed in 1853.

The material facts of this case, which are admitted to be correct, are as follows: At Kempton Park Racecourse there is a piece of ground of about a quarter of an acre in extent, known as the Reserved Enclosure, which is enclosed by iron rails. Persons are admitted to this enclosure on race-days varying in number from 500 to 2,000, amongst whom there are always professional bookmakers varying from 100 to 200 in number. These bookmakers are admitted to this enclosure as members of the general public and upon the same terms, both as to payment and re-admission. These bookmakers have no rights, interest, or control in or over the enclosure, nor have they any special rights or privileges therein. Each bookmaker is accompanied by a clerk. The bookmakers do not confine themselves to any fixed spot in the enclosure, nor do they use any such apparatus as a desk, stool, umbrella, or tent, though any particular bookmaker is usually to be found in or near the same spot of the enclosure. In this enclosure these bookmakers carry on their business in competition with each other, betting with those of the public who are within the enclosure and who may be desirous of betting with them, whether upon credit or by way of ready-money betting. It is also admitted to be the fact that from the commencement of the present century—that is, for at least half a century before the passing of the Betting Houses Act of 1853—and down to the present time enclosures at race-meetings similar to that at Kempton Park have been frequented by bookmakers who have therein openly and habitually carried on betting transactions of precisely the same character as those carried on by the bookmakers in the present case—that is, upon credit and by way of ready money, and that until recently there had been no suggestion that such betting was illegal.

These being the facts of this case, I come to the question—What kind of betting has the Act of 1853 for the first time made illegal? It cannot be said that it has made betting upon horse-racing or other events per se illegal, for it has done nothing of the kind, and when I turn to the preamble of the Act, which in my opinion must first be read, there is no obscurity as to what the Legislature aimed at when it passed the Act in question. I pause here to see whether in this part of the Act (which, be it remembered, is the part in which the Legislature has declared the object it had in view in passing the Act) it can be said that the business of a professional bookmaker, when carried on by him in an enclosure at a race-meeting in the ordinary way in the circumstances above stated, was aimed at by the Legislature, and was the mischief it intended to put down. Assuredly it cannot be so said. First of all the business of a professional bookmaker at a race-meeting, whether on credit or for ready money, was not "a kind of gaming which had of late sprung up." It was as old as the present century. Secondly, bookmakers at a race-meeting ordinarily open no places called betting houses or offices or anything equivalent to them, nor as owners or occupiers of such houses or offices do they receive money in advance. Thirdly, it will be noticed that this then well-known business of a professional bookmaker at race-meetings is not mentioned in this preamble, and it will not be found alluded to throughout the Act.

It appears to me when this part of the Act is considered, that the then well-known business of professional bookmakers at race-meetings was not only not aimed at by the Legislature, but was purposely omitted, for it is inconceivable, if the object of the Legislature was to bring the accustomed business of professional bookmakers at race-meetings within the meshes of the Act, which business for upwards of half a century had been notoriously carried on thereat throughout the kingdom, that the preamble should have confined (and, as I think, studiously confined) the declared object of the Act to a kind of gaming which had then of late sprung up by the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receipt of money in advance by the owners and occupiers thereof. Moreover, it appears to me to be out of all reason to think that this Act for the suppression of betting houses and offices was aimed at the owners of racecourses who permitted their enclosures to be used in the then well-known and accustomed manner. Mr. Asquith in a very excellent argument for the plaintiff sought to get rid of the effect of this preamble by making his point upon a later part of the Act, which I have hereafter to deal with.

Now, what effect has the preamble of an Act of Parliament when the Act has to be construed? I do not doubt that if the words of the enacting part of an Act of Parliament are clear and unambiguous they must be construed according to their ordinary meaning, even although by so doing the Act is extended beyond what is shown to be its object by its preamble. But the preamble must always play an important part in the construction of a statute. Dyer, C.J., calls the preamble of a statute "A key to open the minds of the makers of the Act and the mischiefs which they intended to redress": Stowel v. Zouch, Plowden 353, at p. 369. Lord Coke said, "The rehearsall or preamble of the statute is a good meane to find out the meaning of the statute and as it were a key to open the understanding thereof": Co. Littleton, 79*a*; see also 4 Institutes 330. And Lord Tenterden, when delivering the considered judgment of the Court of King's Bench in Halton v. Cove, 1 B. & Ad. 538, at p. 558, thus sums up the matter. He says: "It is very true, as was argued for the plaintiff, that the enacting words of an Act of Parliament are not always to be limited by the words of the preamble, but must in many instances go beyond it. Yet, on a sound construction of every Act of Parliament, I take it the words in the enacting part must be confined to that which is the plain object and general intention of the Legislature in passing the Act, and that the preamble affords a good clue to discover what that object was." Mr. Asquith's contention is that the enacting parts of the Act of 1853 are such that they clearly extend the Act beyond the limited objects declared in its preamble, and that bookmakers carrying on their business within enclosures at race-meetings in the ordinary way are within the enacting parts of the Act notwithstanding its preamble, and he must admit, if this be so, that owners of racecourses who knowingly and wilfully permit such business to be carried on within their enclosures are equally liable with the professional bookmaker to fine or imprisonment.

Then what is it that this Act of 1853 in its enacting parts has enacted? By section 1 it enacts—firstly, that, "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, . . . or of any person having the care or management, or in any manner conducting the business thereof, betting with persons resorting thereto"—that is, betting either on credit or by way of ready money; secondly, "or" (that is, no house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used) "for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as and for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse-race or other race." This in express terms hits what is in the preamble—namely, betting by way of deposit.

This section does go beyond the preamble in this, that it embraces and renders illegal betting by way of credit, which is not within the preamble, as also betting by way of ready money, which is within the preamble, but only, be it observed, if either takes place in the prohibited premises. There are also other words in the enacting section which I will refer to hereafter. These two classes of betting were held to be distinct offences by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Collins, J., in Bond v. Plumb, 42 W. R. 222, [1894] 1 Q. B. 169. This first section, thirdly, enacts that "every house, office, room, or other place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid or any of them"—that is, for betting on credit or by way of ready money, "is hereby declared to be a common nuisance and contrary to law."

Section 2 enacts that "every house, room, office, or place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid or any of them shall be taken and deemed to be a common gaming house within the meaning of" the Act of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), "to amend the law concerning games and wagers." If a house is proved to be a common gaming house, all persons found therein may be arrested, searched, and brought before a justice of the peace, and every owner or keeper of such house and every person having the care or management thereof is liable to a maximum penalty of £100 or six months' imprisonment with or without hard labour.

Section 11 appears to me to have practically the same effect as section 2, and it gives express power of entry into any house, office, room, or place kept or used as a betting house or office, and, if necessary, to use force for making such entry whether by breaking doors or otherwise, and it also gives express powers of arrest and search therein.

Section 12 gives similar powers to the metropolitan police within the metropolis.

So much for the sections relating to the premises on which betting is prohibited by the Act.

I now come to section 3, which deals with the persons owning, occupying, or using the same. This section makes the doing of three things criminal, and subjects the offender to penalties similar to those above-mentioned. The first offence is for "any person who, being owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same" to open, keep, or use the same for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto—this is, upon credit or by way of ready money. The second able by action or suit against the company under the latter section.

Then we find on the 6th of June, 1885, a letter was written enclosing to each holder a warrant called a "deferred warrant" for interest from the 1st of July, 1883, to the 31st of December, 1884. I have one of these warrants before me now. It does not seem to me that the issue of those warrants operated as a satisfaction of the claim for interest. If it did it may be that a fresh cause of action was created. In either case the cause of action is in respect of a specialty debt, and is not within the Statute of Limitations but of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833. In my judgment the issue of the warrant did not operate as a satisfaction of the cause of action, and therefore as the original cause of action was statutory the same period of limitation applies as in the case of a specialty debt, and the period is therefore twenty years and not six years, and the Statute of Limitations does not therefore apply.

I see nothing in the scheme which would lead me to suppose that the issue and acceptance of the debenture warrant operated, as has been suggested, as a simple contract and not as a specialty debt. The respondents are therefore entitled to be paid these sums of interest.

HATTON (Appellant) v. TREEBY (Respondent). (a.)

Local government—Highway—Bicycle—Bicyclist riding at night without a light—Power of police constable to stop—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 85—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), ss. 78, 79.

Section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which declares bicycles to be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Act, and lays down additional regulations (as to having lighted lamps at night and as to the sounding of a bell) to be observed by the riders of the same, does not include the power given in sections 78 and 79 of the Highway Act, 1835, to apprehend without a warrant; and, therefore, a police-constable who sees a person offending against such regulations by riding at night without a lighted lamp, and who, in order to ascertain the name and address of the offender, who refuses to stop, lays hold of and stops the bicycle, and thereby throws the rider off the bicycle, commits an assault upon such offender.

Case stated by justices of the peace in and for the county of Somerset.

The appellant was summoned to appear at a petty sessions held at Keynsham on the 26th of February, 1897, by the respondent (a police-constable of the county of Somerset) for having committed an offence against section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, by riding his bicycle on the highway at Keynsham without carrying a lamp attached so constructed and placed as to exhibit a light in the direction in which he was proceeding.

The charge against the appellant was proved, and he was fined 2s. 6d.

The appellant had also summoned the respondent for that he, the respondent, did unlawfully assault and beat the appellant by pushing him or causing him to fall from his bicycle which he was then and there riding on the highway.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The complaint of the appellant was that the respondent had stopped him by catching hold of his bicycle and thereby causing him to fall off.

It was proved and found as a fact that the respondent was acting as a police officer on duty on the 17th of January, and that about 10 p.m. on that day he saw the appellant approaching him riding a bicycle; he saw that the appellant had no light attached to his bicycle, and he thereupon called the appellant to stop in order that he might ascertain his name and address, and to prevent a continuance of the offence. The appellant and a witness who was riding with him stated that they did not hear the call, and the justices did not find as a fact that they did. The appellant failed to stop, and thereupon the respondent caught hold of the handle-bar of the bicycle, and the appellant fell to the ground, such fall being occasioned by the act of the respondent in catching hold of the bicycle.

The justices found as a fact that the respondent did not know the name or address of the appellant, and they were of opinion that the appellant's name and address could not have been ascertained in any other way than by stopping him, and that in so stopping him the respondent was acting in pursuance of his duty, and that he used no more force than was necessary.

The justices were of opinion that, as the appellant was committing an offence punishable on summary conviction in view of the police-constable (the respondent), he, the respondent, was justified in stopping him and did stop him in order to prevent a continuance of the offence, and for the purpose of ascertaining his name and address; and they dismissed the complaint against the respondent.

The question for the court was whether the justices were right in dismissing the complaint of the appellant.

Section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), provides: (1) "Bicycles, tricycles, velocipedes, and other similar machines are hereby declared to be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Acts; and the following additional regulations shall be observed by any person or persons riding or being upon such carriage:

"(a) During the period between one hour after sunset and one hour before sunrise, every person riding or being upon such carriage shall carry attached to the carriage a lamp, which shall be so constructed and placed as to exhibit a light in the direction in which he is proceeding, and so lighted and kept lighted as to afford adequate means of signalling the approach or position of the carriage;" and the second of such regulations had reference to the sounding of a bell or whistle so as to give warning of the approach of the carriage.

(2) "Any person summarily convicted of offending against the regulations made by this section shall, for each and every such offence, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding forty shillings."

Section 78 of the Highways Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), specifies a number of offences by drivers of wagons, carts, or other carriages upon highways, and proceeds: "And every such driver offending in either of the said cases shall and may, by the authority of this Act, with or without any warrant, be apprehended by any person who shall see such offence committed, and shall be conveyed before any justice of the peace to be dealt with according to law"; and section 79 provides: "And whereas offences may be committed against this Act by persons whose names are unknown . . . be it therefore enacted, that it shall be lawful for . . . or any other person witnessing the commission of the offence, without any other authority than this Act, to seize and detain such unknown person who shall commit any such offence, and take him forthwith before any justice of the peace," &c.

Horace Avory (with him Kenrick and Gregory), for the appellant.—The respondent was clearly guilty of an assault upon the appellant. Stopping the bicycle and thereby throwing the rider to the ground is an assault, because it is an arrest and unless it can be justified it is an assault. We contend it cannot be justified, either at common law or under any statutory authority. At common law a police-constable can arrest without a warrant a person who has committed a felony or a person whom he reasonably suspects to have committed a felony, or where there is a breach of the peace going on; but generally, and apart from these cases, the power to arrest without warrant must—if it exist at all—be given by statute. As a general rule where an offence, as in the present case, is punishable on summary conviction, there is no power to apprehend unless such power is expressly given by statute, and this has been construed very strictly: Jones v. Owen, 2 Dow. & Ry. 600; Codd v. Cabe, 1 Ex. D. 352, 24 W. R. Dig. 86. At common law the respondent cannot justify, and he cannot do so under the statute, because the 85th section of the Act of 1888 merely declares that bicycles are to be carriages within the Highway Acts, but it does not say that for breaches of the regulations contained in that section, the power to apprehend given in sections 78 and 79 of the Act of 1835 are to be included. The statute gives no such power to apprehend, and to incorporate the provisions of the Act of 1835 giving power to arrest would be adding a new clause to the Act. This is a new offence created by the Local Government Act, 1888, and the section which creates the offence provides the remedy to be followed, and in such cases it is a general rule of law that that remedy alone can be followed.

He referred to Reg. v. Eaton, 59 J. P. 506.

Foote, for the respondent.—This is an offence which from its very nature must be committed when it is dark, and therefore, unless there is a power to stop the offender so as to ascertain his name and address, the provisions of the statute would be wholly useless. I rely on the word "additional" in the 85th section of the Act of 1888. That means that the regulations therein laid down are to be additional to those contained in section 78 of the Act of 1835, and the powers given by those sections are to be deemed incorporated with the regulations in section 85, which are said to be additional. Section 78 of the Act of 1835 gives power to arrest without a warrant persons committing any of the specified offences, and section 79 gives power to seize and detain offenders whose names are unknown. These powers of arrest are applicable to cases coming under section 85 of the Act of 1888. Again, if we look at the intention of the constable, this was not an assault at all, as all the definitions of assault go upon the ground that there must be an intention to do a corporal hurt: Bacon's Abr., title "Assault" and "Battery"; Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown; Coward v. Baddeley, 7 W. R. 466, 4 H. & N. 478. All that is contended for here is the right to stop, and that is not an assault. To convict a person criminally of an assault it must be shown that there was a criminal intention, which was wanting in this case.

Avory, in reply.

COLLINS, J.—I have come to the conclusion in this case that the argument of the appellant must prevail, as it seems to me that section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, in the passage which declares bicycles to be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Acts, does not include the power to apprehend offenders which is given by section 78 of the Highway Act, 1835.

The question arises in this way: The appellant was riding a bicycle on the highway without having a light attached thereto in such manner as is required by section 85, sub-section 1 (a), of the Local Government Act, 1888, which provides that during certain hours of the night a person "riding or being upon such carriage shall carry attached to the carriage a lamp, which shall be so constructed and placed as to exhibit a light in the direction in which he is proceeding." No doubt the appellant failed to comply with that provision, and the respondent called upon him to stop, which he did not do, and the respondent then stopped him in the way described in the case.

The question is whether that justified the respondent in stopping him as he did. It was contended for the appellant that the respondent had no authority in law for so stopping and arresting the appellant for this offence, unless such authority was given by statute, and that such arrest of the appellant was in law an assault. I agree with that contention, and in my opinion this was an assault, and I think that a summons for assault was properly taken out if the respondent had no statutory authority for so acting. The question therefore comes to this, whether we can find such statutory authority. Referring to the Highway Act of 1835, section 78 deals with offences committed on the highway by drivers and owners of carts and carriages, and the section proceeds to say, "every driver so offending shall and may, by the authority of this Act, be apprehended, with or without warrant, by any person who shall see such offence committed." Section 79 goes on to say that if the person committing the offence is unknown "any person witnessing the commission of the offence" may, "without any other authority than this Act, seize and detain such unknown person." Those being the provisions of the Highway Act upon this point, we come to section 85 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which says that bicycles are hereby declared to be carriages, and certain additional regulations are introduced. It is contended that this provision incorporates the powers as to arrest contained in section 78 of the Act of 1835, and that is the main point we have to deal with, and in doing so we have to remember that we are dealing with a question which involves the liberty of the subject, as the person was arrested here, and we have, therefore, to construe the Act with the greatest care. It seems to me that we cannot adopt the contention put forward for the respondent. The Legislature thought it necessary for some purposes to say in section 85 that bicycles should be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Acts, and then it proceeds to make special regulations, the first of which is the one I have read and which is now in question.

There is nothing in that section which incorporates the powers of arrest given by the Act of 1835. The section for the first time creates the offence and deals with it, and introduces the section of the Highway Act, 1835, in a matter which does not contain this offence; and this section—the only section which creates the offence—does not give the power to arrest, but provides a special remedy in sub-section 2, which is the remedy to be followed. I think, therefore, the justices were wrong, and that the case must be sent back to them.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. The words of the later Act are not wide enough to do that which the respondent contends for. To do that would be in effect to add another provision to the statute.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) — May 10.

In re EVANS.
Ex parte DAVIES. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Interest—Promissory note—Principal and surety—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Schedule II., r. 20—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 5.

A surety to a promissory note who has paid the note at maturity may prove in the bankruptcy of the principal debtor for interest on the sum paid from the date of payment to the date of the receiving order.

Motion by a creditor in the bankruptcy by way of appeal from the rejection of part of his proof by the trustee.

On January 4, 1893, the bankrupt and the creditor signed a joint and several promissory note for £65, payable two months after date. When the note became due in March the bankrupt was unable to meet it, and it was paid by the applicant.

The receiving order was made in November, 1896; and the creditor proved in the bankruptcy for £74 12s. 6d., being £65 for principal money and £9 12s. 6d. for interest thereon from the date of payment to the date of the receiving order.

The trustee admitted the proof for £65, but rejected the claim for interest.

The creditor now moved by way of appeal from that decision.

Arthur Powell, for the creditor.—The creditor is entitled to this interest under the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 57, whereby the holder of a bill can recover from any party liable on the bill the amount of the bill and interest thereon from the date of maturity. The creditor here has paid the bill, and is in the position of holder, and has all the holder's rights. I also rely upon the case of Petre v. Duncombe, 20 L. J. Q. B. 242, where a surety who had had to pay an annuity was held entitled to recover interest on such payments in an action against the grantor of the annuity on whose behalf he had had to pay.

A. Neilson (C. C. Scott with him), for the trustee, relied upon rule 20 of Schedule II. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. This sum was not payable by virtue of a written instrument at a certain time, nor was any demand in writing made for it giving the debtor notice that interest would be claimed from the date of such demand; consequently, by reason of rule 20, the creditor cannot prove for interest. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, s. 5, does not apply where the principal debtor's estate is being administered in bankruptcy.

Arthur Powell replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think that a surety who pays the amount of a promissory note to the principal creditor, and then sues the principal debtor, is entitled to recover, not only the amount of principal which he has paid, but also interest on the same from the date of payment. This follows, in my opinion, from section 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856: "Every person who, being surety for the debt or duty of another, or being liable with another for any debt or duty, shall pay such debt . . . shall be entitled to stand in the place of the creditor, and to use all the remedies . . . of the creditor in any action or other proceeding at law or in equity in order to obtain from the principal debtor . . . indemnification for the advances made and the loss sustained by the person who shall have so paid such debt." But whether that be so or not, it is impossible in bankruptcy that a proof should depend on the time of payment. What I mean is, that if a surety pays after proof by the principal creditor, his proof would be identical with the proof of the principal creditor, and would include the interest proved for by the principal creditor. It is desirable that he should be placed in a similar position; and if I were to deal with this question as one of discretion, and not of law, I should be disposed to allow him interest.

My attention has been called to rule 20 of Schedule II. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which seems to me merely to embody the provisions of section 28 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), as to interest. It does not add to or take away anything from the provisions of that section. The result is that no interest can be allowed unless the debt or a sum was payable at a certain time by virtue of a written instrument, or unless a demand for it has been made in writing. Here there was no demand in writing, but it was suggested on behalf of the surety that, by virtue of section 5 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, the right of the surety is a right on an instrument in writing—namely, on the promissory note. I take that view of the matter, and I think that under the circumstances I am entitled to allow the applicant to prove for interest on the sum he paid on the note from the time of such payment to the date of the receiving order.

The appeal must therefore be allowed.

The defendants were the owners and occupiers of a racecourse, in which was a reserved enclosure, about a quarter of an acre in area, railed off from the rest of the racecourse. The public were admitted to the enclosure upon payment, and every person so admitted was entitled to walk about and stand in any part of it. Among those who paid for admission were a number of professional betting men, called bookmakers, who were admitted on the same terms as the rest of the public. The bookmakers when in the enclosure called out the odds they were prepared to bet against each horse, and were prepared to bet, and did bet, such odds with anyone who was desirous to bet, either on credit or upon the amount of the stake being deposited with the bookmaker. No bookmaker had any right, interest, or control in or over any part of the enclosure; he did not confine himself to any fixed spot in the enclosure, nor did he use any such apparatus as a desk, stool, umbrella, or tent, though any particular bookmaker was usually to be found in or near the same part of the enclosure. Betting of the same kind had been carried on by bookmakers in similar enclosures since the beginning of the century.

Appeal from the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., in favour of the plaintiff, at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by a shareholder in the defendant company, who were the owners and occupiers of Kempton Park Racecourse, for an injunction to restrain the company opening or keeping a certain enclosure on the racecourse for the purpose of persons using the enclosure for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of money being received by such persons using the same as deposits made on horse-races, and from otherwise carrying on their business in a manner contrary to the provisions of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and of their memorandum of association, and from expending moneys of the company in the conduct of such illegal business.

In their defence the company alleged that the enclosure was not a "place" within the meaning of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and they denied that the enclosure was opened or kept for the purposes alleged, and that the bookmakers who frequented it were "persons using the same" within the meaning of the Act; they admitted that a considerable amount of betting was carried on by bookmakers in the enclosure, but under such circumstances that it was not illegal; and they alleged that at the time of the passing of the Act similar betting had been for many years previously habitually carried on in racecourse enclosures, and had since been carried on until recently without the intervention of the authorities.

The admissions of fact are fully stated in the judgments of Lord Esher, M.R., and the other judges.

Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., held that the case was not distinguishable from Hawke v. Dunn, 45 W. R. 359, [1897] 1 Q. B. 579, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5, 1897. — The following judgments were read:—

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an appeal from a pro forma decision of the Lord Chief Justice in a case tried before him without a jury. The action was brought against the Kempton Park Racecourse Co. by an alleged shareholder in it, asking for an injunction against the company to forbid them from continuing knowingly and wilfully to permit certain persons to use a certain enclosure belonging to the company illegally within the meaning of the Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119). The facts are to be collected from admissions made in writing and verbally at the trial before the Lord Chief Justice, and in certain particulars given between the parties before the trial and used as evidence at the trial, and treated as true in fact and undisputed.

As to these particulars Mr. Asquith, who argued the plaintiff's case as well and earnestly as it could be, said, in opening the case before the Lord Chief Justice: "I am instructed that, after a careful investigation, the facts stated in the particulars may be assumed to be correctly stated." It has been suggested to me that the facts stated in the tenth particular as to the former usage on racecourses is not correct. I think it is impossible for the Court of Appeal properly to adopt any such suggestion, and I venture to say that I am convinced that the statement is absolutely correct. From the sources I have named the facts of the case were ascertained to be as follows: The company are the owners of the Kempton Park Racecourse and of certain stands and enclosures on the racecourse. There are several stands, and each stand has an enclosure in front of it, open to the stand, but railed off from the rest of the racecourse by iron railings. One of these enclosures is known as the Reserved Enclosure. Admission is given to that enclosure and its stand to anyone who applies and makes a payment of £1 for and in respect of such admission. Every person so admitted is entitled to walk and stand in the enclosure and every part of it, and to sit in the stands. No part of the enclosure or stand can be, or is, reserved by anyone for his own use when not actually there. Many persons pay for admission to such enclosure and stand upon such terms, and amongst them are many professional betting men called bookmakers, who pay the same amount as others for their admission and who are admitted on the same terms as the others. The bookmakers when in the enclosure shout out the odds they are prepared to bet against each and every horse in a race, and for a certain time they bet such odds with everyone who desires to bet and who is ready, if required, to deposit with the bookmaker the amount which he bets against the bookmaker, so that the bookmaker, in case the horse against which he bets does not win, keeps the money he took on deposit, but if the horse does win he undertakes to pay the odds he bet against the horse. The bookmaker goes to the races and into the enclosure for the purpose of betting in the way described with everyone who will bet with him. The bookmaker bets as a matter of business. To bet in the way described is his business. The businesses of the various bookmakers are as against each other rival and competing, and the business of each bookmaker is independent of that of every other bookmaker. No one of them assumes to exercise or does exercise any manner of exclusive use of any part of the enclosure, but walks or stands in the enclosure and every part of it in the same manner and on the same terms as every other person in the enclosure. The description above given of the betting carried on at Kempton races is a full and accurate account and description of the betting which is carried on not only at Kempton races in the Reserved Enclosure, but in all racecourse enclosures in which betting takes place. By the tenth particular it was alleged that at the time of the passing of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, such enclosures were in like manner frequented by bookmakers, and betting transactions of precisely the same character were therein openly and habitually carried on by them, and had been so carried on since the beginning of the present century.

It is upon these facts that the plaintiff on the record asks for the injunction he claims against the defendants. He insists that upon these facts the judge who tried the case ought to have found that the company, the owners of the reserved enclosure, did knowingly and wilfully permit the enclosure to be used by persons other than the company—namely, the bookmakers—in a manner made illegal by the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. It is impossible to say that the company opened, kept, or used the enclosure for the purpose of the company betting with persons resorting thereto. It is impossible to say that the bookmakers or any bookmaker opened or kept the enclosure at all. The question must be whether the bookmakers or some or one was or were permitted to use and did use the enclosure illegally within the meaning of and therefore contrary to the statute. This proposition raises three questions: First, is such an enclosure such a place as can come within the meaning of the statute? Secondly, if yes, was the enclosure so used by anybody as to make the enclosure or any part of it a place illegally used within the meaning of the statute? Thirdly, if it was used illegally, was such use knowingly and wilfully permitted by the company? If all these three propositions are to be answered against the company, the injunction ought to be granted. If any one of them is answered in favour of the company, the injunction ought not to be granted. In this case it is clear that the company must have known what was habitually done in the enclosure. If, then, what was done was illegal, the third proposition must be answered against the company. If what was done was not illegal, the third proposition must be answered in favour of the company. They cannot be said to have permitted what did not exist. This reduces the discussion to the first and second propositions.

In order to determine the first and second propositions and their importance, it is necessary in the first place to determine what is the true construction of the statute. In order to construe the statute the court is bound to consider the condition of things existing immediately before and at the time of the passing of the statute which are dealt with by the statute. The court is bound in this case to consider, amongst other things, the things stated in the tenth particular. The statute commences with a preamble which, in my opinion, is not repealed: "Whereas a kind of gaming has of late sprung up by the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receiving of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices," &c. The mischief described is not gaming by betting nor gaming by receiving money in advance, but by such betting being brought about or rendered more easy by the opening of places called betting houses or offices. It is not betting, whatever may be its kind, which, independent of locality, is struck at, but it is the providing of a locality for particular kinds of betting which is the mischief to be dealt with. Then the enacting parts of the statute commence thus: "For the suppression thereof be it enacted," &c. "Thereof" does not mean "for the suppression of betting"; it refers to the recited mischief of betting in the new manner of betting—that is, by the manner of opening of places called betting houses or offices, which is a manner which brings about betting or makes it more easy for many to bet. Then the enactment proceeds, and the description of the locality is enlarged beyond the description of it in the preamble. It describes not only a place called a betting house or office, but says, "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used." Still it is a kind of locality which can be opened, kept, or used. And in section 2 this locality, called a house, room, or place, is one which can be taken and deemed to be a common gaming house, in which persons not gaming may be found; into which the police may force entrance by breaking into it; and in which they may arrest and search persons found in it, though those persons are in it without any purpose of gaming at all. Taking into account the mischief indicated in the preamble, and the description of the locality in the enacting part of the statute, the locality being a necessary part of the offence, and the word "place" being indefinite, and so indefinitely large that it must have some limitation, I can see no reason why the rule of construction as to the interpretation of general words in a statute following particular or more limited words should not be applied. That rule requires an interpretation of the general words limiting them to matters or things of the same kind, as to the mischief being dealt with, as the previous words; but an interpretation as wide as the limitation just described will admit. Applying this rule of interpretation to the present statute, it seems to me that the place must be a place used for betting, which can for the purpose of betting be not unreasonably deemed to be a place of the same kind as a house, office, or room used for the purpose of betting. It need not be a building built like a house, room, or office; it need not be a covered place; it need not be railed off, or boarded off, so as to prevent physical access to it except through a particular part of the railing or boarding; but it must be a defined space, capable from its condition of being used by a person who desires so to use it as if it were his house, room, or office, used by him as such for his betting business. I think that the Reserved Enclosure described and existing in this case was, in consequence of its structural condition, a defined space, capable of being used by a person desirous of so using it as if it were his house, room, or office, used as such for his betting business.

Then arises the second question, whether any person did so use the enclosure as to enable the court to say that he used it as if it were his house, office, or room, used by him as such for his betting business. Now, there are and must be some essential rights of a person using a place as his house, his office, or his room, different from the rights as to it of persons who are not using it as their house, office, or room. He must have some right of user peculiar to himself and exclusive of their rights, if any. A man cannot be said to be using a room as his room or office if, when he comes to it, he finds it full of people, even if they have come to see him or to deal with him, and yet he has no right to say, "Make way or room for me to come into my room or office." A man cannot be said to be using a table as his table if any person who can find room at the table has as much right as he has to come to it and use it in any way such person thinks fit. The user by a person of a place as if it were his room or office necessarily implies some exclusive right in him as against some other persons. He may have partners in the room, or he may use part of the room as his office, whilst others have an independent right to use another part of the room as their office; but the part of the room or place which can be said in any reasonable sense to be used by him as his office must be a part which he claims to use and does use exclusively as his against some people. Applying that rule to the enclosure in question, the facts seem to me to show that no one of the bookmakers described in the evidence does claim to use and does use any part of the enclosure as his part of it exclusively as against any one. To say that he uses or claims to use the spot of ground on which he is at the moment standing as his room, office, or place exclusively as against all the world, as if it were his room or office, is beyond all reason. So long, therefore, as an enclosure on a racecourse is used only as this enclosure was used, it cannot, in my opinion, be said to be a place used contrary to the prohibitions or subject to the penalties imposed by the statute. If an enclosuse on a racecoure or elsewhere is used only as this enclosure was, no one can properly hold that the enclosure is being illegally used contrary to the statute. As matter of law, there is no legal evidence to bring it within the statute. If any other circumstance is added and relied upon in any other case, the whole case must then be considered subject to the rule I have laid down.

It follows that I do not agree with the interpretation put upon the statute or the application made of it to the facts in the case of Hawke v. Dunn. It seems to me that the learned judges in that case did not rightly determine what kind of user of the place will bring it within the prohibition of the statute. Their judgment is open to this criticism, that, according to it, if a bookmaker makes what the judgment calls a ready-money bet in a place which it is possible to use so as to make it a prohibited place within the statute, the mere fact of his so doing makes it a prohibited place. And it seems to me that this conclusion is founded on the view mentioned in the judgment that one of the practices deemed to be objectionable was the practice of ready-money betting, wherever such betting was made, without reference to the locality in which such bet was made. With that view I cannot, as I have said, agree. I may repeat that, in my opinion, the mischief aimed at was not gaming by betting nor gaming by receiving money in advance, but by such betting being brought about or rendered more easy by the opening or keeping or using a place for the purpose of making, as a matter of business, such bets.

The other cases which have been cited before us must be considered, if this judgment of mine is correct, as instances to which the rule now laid down must be applied. I cannot undertake by ingenuity to explain any of them away. I think that my present view of the statute is what I substantially stated, though not so elaborately, in Bows v. Fenwick, 22 W. R. 804, L. R. 9 C. P. 339. Whether the statute was in that case rightly applied to what was called an umbrella may be doubtful. If the thing was really a tent I should think the decision right; if the thing was really an ordinary umbrella I think the decision was wrong. In Snow v. Hill, 33 W. R. 475, 14 Q. B. D. 588, I think that A. L. Smith, L.J., took the the same view of the statute as I had done in Bows v. Fenwick, and do now. I think that the case of Gallaway v. Maries, 30 W. R. 151, 8 Q. B. D. 275—the case of a betting man standing on a stool to bet—was, with deference, wrongly decided. I must say that I think Eastwood v. Miller, 22 W. R. 799, L. R. 9 Q. B. 440, was wrong. The defendant occupied the field and charged people for entering it. But I cannot see that he used it for the purpose of betting himself at all. I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This action is brought by a shareholder of a company to restrain it from carrying on its business in a manner alleged by the plaintiff to be illegal—viz., contrary to the provisions of what is now shortly called the Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119). An injunction had been granted by the Lord Chief Justice on the authority of Hawke v. Dunn, a considered and unanimous decision of a Divisional Court, and which the Lord Chief Justice considered himself compelled to follow. No objection was taken before him nor before us that the court had no jurisdiction to grant an injunction to restrain the commission of what is a criminal offence if the plaintiff is right. It has been assumed, and perhaps rightly, that the court has jurisdiction to protect the shareholders of a company from a misapplication by the company of its property, although such misapplication may be punishable as a criminal offence. I shall also assume such jurisdiction and leave this point open for decision when raised and insisted on.

The present case was decided on admitted facts, and one of those facts—viz., what was common practice in 1853—is very important. The particulars describe in detail the enclosure complained of and the use made of it, and in the tenth particular it is stated that "at the time of the passing of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, such enclosures were in like manner frequented by bookmakers, and betting transactions of precisely the same character were therein openly and habitually carried on by them and had been so carried on since the beginning of the present century." I presume that this statement could be proved, if not admitted, and that it is admitted simply to save the expense of formal proof.

With these preliminary observations I proceed to consider the statute on which the case really turns. The title, if part of the Act, the preamble, and the first twelve sections are all material; the other sections throw no light on them. An examination of the statute from its commencement to the end of section 12 shows—(1) that the object of the Legislature was, if possible, to suppress a kind of gaming which had then lately (in 1853) sprung up, and which is described in the preamble; (2) that in order to attain this object betting houses and other places are prohibited and are declared to be common nuisances and to be gaming houses within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, sections 1 and 2; (3) that penalties are imposed on those who keep such places and those who in any way advertize them (sections 3, 4, and 7); (4) that places suspected of being such as are prohibited may be broken into and persons in them may be arrested, and all documents found therein and relating to racing or betting may be seized (sections 11 and 12). The Act, in short, is aimed at betting houses and at those who keep them; it is not aimed at betting anywhere nor at persons who go to betting houses to bet with those who keep them. The language of sections 1 and 3 in some respects goes much further than that of the preamble, and, when clear and unambiguous, effect must be given to the wider language of the enacting sections. For example, the preamble mentions only "the opening of places called betting houses or offices and the receipt of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses and offices or by other persons acting on their behalf," whilst section 1 plainly prohibits not only the opening but the keeping and using of such places and betting with persons resorting thereto, whether they pay money in advance or not. The language of the prohibition being in these respects plain and unambiguous, it cannot be properly restricted by the language of the preamble. But when it becomes necessary to ascertain what sort of places other than betting houses, rooms, or offices were aimed at, there is much more difficulty. No person can bet except in some place or other, and whenever he bets in any place he uses that place for betting. To construe "other place" or "place" in its ordinary sense of any and every place where persons can or do bet would involve an absolute prohibition of betting, and would have rendered it quite unnecessary to specify betting houses, rooms, or offices. But the Legislature clearly did not intend to prohibit and have not prohibited all betting, nor even all betting by persons who deposit their stakes. Some limitation must therefore be put on the expression "other place" or "place," and the real difficulty is to discover, first, what sort of place is prohibited; and, secondly, to determine whether the enclosure with which we have to deal on the present occasion is such a place.

The language of the Act itself indicates what sort of place was aimed at by the Legislature, although no definition of the word "place" is to be found in the Act. The places aimed at are described as "places called betting houses or offices" (see the preamble); they are referred to as "house, office, room, or other place" (section 1); as some place to which persons do or can resort for betting (section 1); as some place where the business of betting is carried on (sections 1, 3, and 4); as some place used as a betting house or office, and which can be forcibly entered under a magistrate's warrant, or an order of the Commissioners of Police (sections 11, 12); as some place which can be advertised as a betting place (section 7); as some place which can be reasonably regarded as a common nuisance (section 1); and which it is not absurd to treat as a gaming house within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 (section 2). The sort of place aimed at can be gathered, though not very distinctly, from the language then used; and it appears to me reasonably clear that a betting house or office is the type of place which the Legislature had in view; and that no place is within the Act which is so unlike a betting house or office as not to resemble it otherwise than by being a place where some persons sometimes bet or even go to bet. I cannot bring myself to think that a place which is so unlike a betting house or office as an ordinary English racecourse is within the Act at all. This was the view taken by the Scotch court in Henretty v. Hart, 13 Court of Sess. Cas. (Court of Justiciary), 4th series, 9, cited by Mr. Walton. On the other hand there may be betting houses or offices or other places of that sort on a heath or anywhere where people congregate to see a race or any other exhibition. There may be a betting booth, or enclosure, or ring, or place, not easy to describe by any appropriate name, which sufficiently conforms to the type of a betting house or office as to be hit by the Act; and I am not prepared to say that the cases of Shaw v. Morley, 16 W. R. 763, L. R. 3 Ex. 137; Bows v. Fenwick; and Gallaway v. Maries, were decided on any erroneous principle.

The desk the stool and umbrella, and the wooden box which had to be considered in those cases were held to conform to the type of a betting office and to be prohibited accordingly. These cases seem to me to go to the very verge of the law in the application of the principle on which they were decided. Doggett v. Catterns, 13 W. R. 160, 17 C. B. N. S. 669, in Ex. Ch., 13 W. R. 390, 19 C. B. N. S. 765, turned on sections 4 and 5 of the statute, and the actual decision does not assist us. There was so much difference of opinion about the meaning of a "place" that the case is a very unreliable guide on that head. Eastwood v. Miller and Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, 23 W. R. 547, L. R. 10 Q. B. 102, are the only other cases prior to Hawke v. Dunn which I think it necessary to notice. Both were cases stated by magistrates who found that the grounds then in question were places within the Act. The court, therefore, had only to say whether there was evidence to justify such a finding, and the court decided that there was. The court came to the conclusion that it could not say as a matter of law that the magistrates were wrong. But bearing this in mind Eastwood v. Miller seems to have been merely a case of betting at a pigeon match, and went too far. In Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield there were several circumstances to justify the finding of the magistrates—viz., the connection of the grounds with the house, the desks and stools, and clerks, which, if inside the house instead of outside, would have made the case an easy one. It would have been going too far to say that there was no evidence there to support the finding of the magistrates.

Having pointed out to the best of my ability what sort of betting place is prohibited, I pass on to consider whether the Reserved Enclosure with which we have to deal is the kind of place aimed at by the Legislature. It is a place where any one can go who chooses to pay £1; where bookmakers and others resort for betting purposes; where bets are made for money deposited as well as on credit, and where many persons go without betting or intending to bet, but simply to see the race and their friends and acquaintances. The place does not, in my judgment, come up to the type of a betting house or office such as the Legislature has prohibited. This conclusion is, in my opinion, strengthened by the preamble and by the statement as to the long existence and use of such enclosures as these before 1853. Having regard to this statement and to the preamble and to the ambiguity of the word "place" in the enacting clauses, I am unable to construe the Act as aimed at or as including such an enclosure as this is. This conclusion is further strengthened by the fact that such enclosures so used were not supposed to be illegal until the last two or three years. As regards the case of Hawke v. Dunn, I am of opinion that it was wrongly decided, and that sufficient attention was not paid to the type of place which the Legislature was aiming at. The decision can, in my judgment, only be supported by treating the Act as an Act for the suppression of betting instead of an Act for the suppression of betting in a particular description of place. The appeal ought to be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants.

LOPES, L.J.—The plaintiff claims an injunction against the defendant company to restrain them from using or knowingly permitting to be used a certain enclosure at Kempton Park, known as the Reserved Enclosure, for betting purposes, and from carrying on their business in a manner contrary to the provisions of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and contrary to their memorandum of association, and from expending the assets of the company in and about the conduct of of such illegal business.

The case was heard before the Lord Chief Justice (Lord Russell of Killowen), and he granted the injunction, acting upon the recent decision in Hawke v. Dunn. The use of the enclosure for the purposes alleged, and the knowledge of the defendants that it was so used was admitted, but it was contended that the enclosure was not a "place" within the meaning of the statute. The enclosure in question is uncovered, and is about a quarter of an acre in extent. The public are admitted indiscriminately to this enclosure on making the required payment; some are professional bookmakers, others go there for the purpose of backing horses with the professional bookmakers, and others do not bet at all. The bookmakers go there as a portion of the general public, and on the same terms in all respects. They have no special rights, privileges, or control beyond those possessed by the general public, who frequent the enclosure. The bookmaker does not confine himself to any fixed spot in the enclosure, nor does he use anything brought on, or fixed to, the soil, such as a desk, stool, umbrella, or box, but is generally to be found in or near to the same part of the enclosure. No betting lists are exhibited.

Is this enclosure "a place" within the meaning of the Betting Houses Act, 1853?

Betting per se is not illegal, and is only made illegal by the Act of 1853 if carried on in prohibited places.

The Act of 1853 is a penal statute, and must be construed strictly; by which I mean that the court, in construing such a statute, must see that the thing charged is an offence within the plain meaning of the words used, so as to carry out the true intention of the Legislature. I accept the statement, and have no doubt of its accuracy—namely, that at the time of the passing of the Act of 1853 betting of the same character as that complained of in this case had for many years previously been habitually and notoriously carried on on racecourses and in enclosures on racecourses, and has since that time been so carried on until quite recently without any suggestion of its being illegal.

I now approach the Act of 1853. It is called an Act for the Suppression of Betting Houses. The title, it is true, is no part of the Act, but, as was said by Jessel, M.R., in Sutton v. Sutton, 31 W. R. 369, 22 Ch. D. 511, it is always in the roll, and may be looked at in order to remove any ambiguity in the words of the Act. It cannot be used to control the express provisions of an Act, yet, if there be in those provisions anything admitting of a doubt, the title of the Act is a matter proper to be considered in order to assist in the interpretation of the Act, and thereby to give to the doubtful language in the body of the Act a meaning consistent, rather than at variance, with the clear title of the Act.

Applying this rule to the present case, it is not too much to say that it shows the words "place" or "other place" was intended to have a restricted or limited meaning, otherwise the title of the Act might have been "An Act for the Suppression of Betting Places."

Again, look at the preamble. "Whereas a kind of gaming has of late sprung up tending to the injury and demoralization of improvident persons by the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receiving of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices, or by other persons acting on their behalf, on their promises to pay money on events of horse races and the like contingencies." The only places mentioned are betting houses or offices, and the demoralization is said to be caused by a kind of gaming "of late sprung up." There is no mention of racecourses, though horse-races are evidently in the mind of the Legislature. Betting on racecourses and in enclosures on racecourses had existed for years, and could not be said to be "a kind of gaming of late sprung up." On the other hand, betting in betting houses was new, and was in 1853 regarded as an evil to be remedied. The rule is that when the words of the enactment are clear the preamble is to be disregarded, but when the words are equivocal effect is to be given to it to the extent that it shows what the Legislature are intending, and if general language is used in the enactment which it is clear must have been intended to have some limitation put upon it, the preamble may be used to indicate to what particular instances the enactment is intended to apply.

It cannot be said that "place" or "other place" was intended to include all places; if so, it would amount to this, that the Act was passed to suppress betting, for no person, so far as I know, can bet without occupying a place, if it is only the place upon which he is at the time standing; and, if he bets, he uses that place for betting.

Both the title of the Act and the preamble of the the Act indicate some limitation to be put on the words "place" or "other place."

But what limitation? That is to be gathered from the words used in the first four sections of the Act, "house, office, room, or other place," and "house, office, room, or place." Surely the doctrine of noscitur a sociis or ejusdem generis is applicable here. That doctrine may be thus expressed—namely, where there are general words following particular and specific words, the general words must be confined to things of the same kind as those specified. A good illustration of what I mean is the case of Powell v. Boraston, 13 W. R. 465, 18 C. B. N. S. 175, where it was held that "other building" to qualify for the parliamentary franchise under section 27 of the Reform Act, 1832, must be something substantial and ejusdem generis with the preceding words, "house, warehouse, counting-house, shop." I cannot hold that an open racecourse or open enclosure in a racecourse is ejusdem generis with house, office, or room—an enclosure where there is no structure of any kind, nothing built upon or fixed into the soil, and no appropriation of any fixed spot, and to which the public are indiscriminately admitted.

But if we further examine the statute we shall find further indications that this statute was never intended to apply to racecourses or enclosures in racecourses used for betting. By section 2 the place struck at is to be deemed to be a common gaming house within the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and may be indicted as such. How could an enclosure in a racecourse by any stretch of the imagination be deemed to be a gaming house? Section 7, again, does not seem applicable to an enclosure on a racecourse, but rather to something like a house, office, or room, which can be advertized. Then, again, section 11, authorizing police constables to enter by force "whether by breaking doors or otherwise," and to search and to seize all lists, cards, or other documents relating to betting found in such house or premises, points rather to betting houses or places resembling a house, room, or office rather than an open enclosure in a racecourse. Section 12 is very significant. It enables a commissioner of police to authorize any superintendent of police to enter any house, office, room, or place if he suspects that such office, room, or place is kept or used—as what?—as a betting house or office. How could this enclosure be used as a betting house or office? I cannot think that a place so unlike a house, office, or room as the enclosure can have been contemplated by the Act. If this enclosure is within the Act, why not the whole racecourse? Why not any place where a man stands and bets? So to hold would be equivalent to holding that betting anywhere and everywhere is illegal, and would make it difficult to understand why the Act of Parliament specified any places.

The Act was intended to strike at betting houses or something resembling a betting house where betting was carried on, but was not intended to interfere with betting on racecourses such as had been carried on for very many years before the passing of the Act. If the contention of the respondent is correct, the Act of 1853 should have been entitled an Act, not for the suppression of betting houses, but for the suppression of betting. In my judgment Hawke v. Dunn was wrongly decided. That case has carried the law further than any of the previous cases and cannot be supported.

I think it unnecessary to refer at any length to the previous authorities. They are all distinguishable from the present case. The cases most relied on by the respondents were the cases of a desk, stool, umbrella, and box placed upon or fixed in the locus in quo. I do not believe that in any of those cases a conviction would have taken place if the desk, stool, umbrella, or box had not been present, and the court had been asked to hold the locus in quo prohibited under the Act without such accessories. There is no desk, stool, umbrella, or box in this enclosure, and, as I have said before, nothing that can be said to have any resemblance to a house, room, or office used for betting. Whether the construction of the statute was not somewhat strained in these cases to which I have last referred it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to decide. In Galláway v. Maries, which was heard by Grove, J., and myself, and which was the box case, I felt great hesitation in holding that a wooden box such as described could be a place within the meaning of the Act, but considered that I was bound by previous decisions. Each case must depend upon its own particular circumstances, and it is not difficult to imagine something placed on a racecourse which, without being a house, room, or office, would so resemble them and so partake of their nature when used for betting purposes as to come within the meaning of the Act.

I do not attempt to define what is a "place"; all I say is—and that I say without hesitation—that this enclosure is not a place within the meaning of the Act of Parliament.

No point has been made that an injunction will not lie to restrain the commission of a criminal offence. I believe that it will lie when its object is to protect the shareholders of a company from any misapplication of its property, although such application may be punishable as a criminal offence. The appeal will be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This action is brought to review in a court of appeal a judgment given in the Queen's Bench Division in the case of Hawke v. Dunn, and the real question to be determined, disregarding the form in which the action is brought, is whether a professional bookmaker, who carries on his business in the accustomed manner, moving about an enclosure at a race-meeting betting with those of the public who are desirous of betting with him, sins against the provisions of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, entitled "An Act for the Suppression of Betting Houses."

If such bookmaker sins against the Act, so do all owners of racecourses who knowingly and wilfully permit such bookmaker to carry on his calling in the enclosures thereat, and each, whether bookmaker or owner of a racecourse, is liable to fine or imprisonment with or without hard labour for not exceeding six calendar months, and any person who may happen to be within the enclosure when a professional bookmaker is there plying his calling is liable to be arrested and searched and taken before a justice of the peace.

Although the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 19), in one particular deals with this Act of 1853, as also does the Short Titles Act of 1892 (55 Vict. c. 10), they are wholly immaterial to the present case, and the Act of 1853 must be construed as if those Acts had not been passed and the question had arisen shortly after the Royal Assent had been given to the Act of 1853 upon the 20th of August of that year.

Before I turn to this Act, upon the true construction of which the decision of this case entirely depends, I must point out that prior to the time of its passing all kinds of betting, whether by professional bookmakers or by the public, were perfectly legal, no matter where the bets were made, or whether carried on upon credit or by the payment of money by way of deposit on bets, which is called "ready-money betting."

In the year 1845 the Legislature had enacted by the Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18, that all contracts or agreements by way of gaming or wagering should thereafter be null and void and incapable of being enforced in any court of law or equity, so that bets after the passing of the Act of 1845 won upon horse-races or other events became mere debts of honour incapable of being enforced, but the bet itself or betting in general, whether upon credit or by way of ready-money, wherever carried on, was in no way made illegal, the only disability attaching thereto being that money won by betting could not be recovered if the loser did not choose to pay. Thus far the Legislature had gone, and so matters stood at the time when the Act for the suppression of betting houses came to be passed in 1853.

The material facts of this case, which are admitted to be correct, are as follows: At Kempton Park Racecourse there is a piece of ground of about a quarter of an acre in extent, known as the Reserved Enclosure, which is enclosed by iron rails. Persons are admitted to this enclosure on race-days varying in number from 500 to 2,000, amongst whom there are always professional bookmakers varying from 100 to 200 in number. These bookmakers are admitted to this enclosure as members of the general public and upon the same terms, both as to payment and re-admission. These bookmakers have no rights, interest, or control in or over the enclosure, nor have they any special rights or privileges therein. Each bookmaker is accompanied by a clerk. The bookmakers do not confine themselves to any fixed spot in the enclosure, nor do they use any such apparatus as a desk, stool, umbrella, or tent, though any particular bookmaker is usually to be found in or near the same spot of the enclosure. In this enclosure these bookmakers carry on their business in competition with each other, betting with those of the public who are within the enclosure and who may be desirous of betting with them, whether upon credit or by way of ready-money betting. It is also admitted to be the fact that from the commencement of the present century—that is, for at least half a century before the passing of the Betting Houses Act of 1853—and down to the present time enclosures at race-meetings similar to that at Kempton Park have been frequented by bookmakers who have therein openly and habitually carried on betting transactions of precisely the same character as those carried on by the bookmakers in the present case—that is, upon credit and by way of ready money, and that until recently there had been no suggestion that such betting was illegal.

These being the facts of this case, I come to the question—What kind of betting has the Act of 1853 for the first time made illegal? It cannot be said that it has made betting upon horse-racing or other events per se illegal, for it has done nothing of the kind, and when I turn to the preamble of the Act, which in my opinion must first be read, there is no obscurity as to what the Legislature aimed at when it passed the Act in question. I pause here to see whether in this part of the Act (which, be it remembered, is the part in which the Legislature has declared the object it had in view in passing the Act) it can be said that the business of a professional bookmaker, when carried on by him in an enclosure at a race-meeting in the ordinary way in the circumstances above stated, was aimed at by the Legislature, and was the mischief it intended to put down. Assuredly it cannot be so said. First of all the business of a professional bookmaker at a race-meeting, whether on credit or for ready money, was not "a kind of gaming which had of late sprung up." It was as old as the present century. Secondly, bookmakers at a race-meeting ordinarily open no places called betting houses or offices or anything equivalent to them, nor as owners or occupiers of such houses or offices do they receive money in advance. Thirdly, it will be noticed that this then well-known business of a professional bookmaker at race-meetings is not mentioned in this preamble, and it will not be found alluded to throughout the Act.

It appears to me when this part of the Act is considered, that the then well-known business of professional bookmakers at race-meetings was not only not aimed at by the Legislature, but was purposely omitted, for it is inconceivable, if the object of the Legislature was to bring the accustomed business of professional bookmakers at race-meetings within the meshes of the Act, which business for upwards of half a century had been notoriously carried on thereat throughout the kingdom, that the preamble should have confined (and, as I think, studiously confined) the declared object of the Act to a kind of gaming which had then of late sprung up by the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receipt of money in advance by the owners and occupiers thereof. Moreover, it appears to me to be out of all reason to think that this Act for the suppression of betting houses and offices was aimed at the owners of racecourses who permitted their enclosures to be used in the then well-known and accustomed manner. Mr. Asquith in a very excellent argument for the plaintiff sought to get rid of the effect of this preamble by making his point upon a later part of the Act, which I have hereafter to deal with.

Now, what effect has the preamble of an Act of Parliament when the Act has to be construed? I do not doubt that if the words of the enacting part of an Act of Parliament are clear and unambiguous they must be construed according to their ordinary meaning, even although by so doing the Act is extended beyond what is shown to be its object by its preamble. But the preamble must always play an important part in the construction of a statute. Dyer, C.J., calls the preamble of a statute "A key to open the minds of the makers of the Act and the mischiefs which they intended to redress": Stowel v. Zouch, Plowden 353, at p. 369. Lord Coke said, "The rehearsall or preamble of the statute is a good meane to find out the meaning of the statute and as it were a key to open the understanding thereof": Co. Littleton, 79*a*; see also 4 Institutes 330. And Lord Tenterden, when delivering the considered judgment of the Court of King's Bench in Halton v. Cove, 1 B. & Ad. 538, at p. 558, thus sums up the matter. He says: "It is very true, as was argued for the plaintiff, that the enacting words of an Act of Parliament are not always to be limited by the words of the preamble, but must in many instances go beyond it. Yet, on a sound construction of every Act of Parliament, I take it the words in the enacting part must be confined to that which is the plain object and general intention of the Legislature in passing the Act, and that the preamble affords a good clue to discover what that object was." Mr. Asquith's contention is that the enacting parts of the Act of 1853 are such that they clearly extend the Act beyond the limited objects declared in its preamble, and that bookmakers carrying on their business within enclosures at race-meetings in the ordinary way are within the enacting parts of the Act notwithstanding its preamble, and he must admit, if this be so, that owners of racecourses who knowingly and wilfully permit such business to be carried on within their enclosures are equally liable with the professional bookmaker to fine or imprisonment.

Then what is it that this Act of 1853 in its enacting parts has enacted? By section 1 it enacts—firstly, that, "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, . . . or of any person having the care or management, or in any manner conducting the business thereof, betting with persons resorting thereto"—that is, betting either on credit or by way of ready money; secondly, "or" (that is, no house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used) "for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as and for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse-race or other race." This in express terms hits what is in the preamble—namely, betting by way of deposit.

This section does go beyond the preamble in this, that it embraces and renders illegal betting by way of credit, which is not within the preamble, as also betting by way of ready money, which is within the preamble, but only, be it observed, if either takes place in the prohibited premises. There are also other words in the enacting section which I will refer to hereafter. These two classes of betting were held to be distinct offences by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Collins, J., in Bond v. Plumb, 42 W. R. 222, [1894] 1 Q. B. 169. This first section, thirdly, enacts that "every house, office, room, or other place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid or any of them"—that is, for betting on credit or by way of ready money, "is hereby declared to be a common nuisance and contrary to law."

Section 2 enacts that "every house, room, office, or place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid or any of them shall be taken and deemed to be a common gaming house within the meaning of" the Act of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), "to amend the law concerning games and wagers." If a house is proved to be a common gaming house, all persons found therein may be arrested, searched, and brought before a justice of the peace, and every owner or keeper of such house and every person having the care or management thereof is liable to a maximum penalty of £100 or six months' imprisonment with or without hard labour.

Section 11 appears to me to have practically the same effect as section 2, and it gives express power of entry into any house, office, room, or place kept or used as a betting house or office, and, if necessary, to use force for making such entry whether by breaking doors or otherwise, and it also gives express powers of arrest and search therein.

Section 12 gives similar powers to the metropolitan police within the metropolis.

So much for the sections relating to the premises on which betting is prohibited by the Act.

I now come to section 3, which deals with the persons owning, occupying, or using the same. This section makes the doing of three things criminal, and subjects the offender to penalties similar to those above-mentioned. The first offence is for "any person who, being owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same" to open, keep, or use the same for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto—this is, upon credit or by way of ready money. The second offence is for "any person who being the owner or occupier of any house, room, office, or other place" to "knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept, or used by any other person for the purposes aforesaid or either of them"—that is, betting on credit or by way of ready money. And the third offence is for any person to have the care or management of or in any manner assist in conducting the business of any house, office, room, or place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid or either of them, which means the assisting in the conduct of the business of a betting house for carrying on betting either on credit or for ready money. Neither this section nor the Act prohibits persons (other than professional bookmakers) resorting to betting houses for the purpose of betting therein, though if found therein they are liable to arrest and search and to be taken before a justice of the peace.

When the preamble and these sections of the Act are read together, as they must be in order to understand the true scope of the Act, in my judgment the enacting sections have reference to the opening, keeping, and using of betting houses, offices, and rooms, "or other places" akin or equivalent thereto, wherein the business of a betting house or betting office is carried on.

There are words in the enacting sections which are not to be found in the preamble, for instance, the words "room or other place," "any person using the same," "any person having the management of the business," but these words were inserted, in my judgment, not for the purpose of extending the operation of the Act, and of embracing cases not within its operation, but for the better carrying out the object intended, and reaching every kind of evasion which might otherwise have been attempted, and that this was the view of Lush, J., will be seen upon reference to a passage in his judgment in the case of Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, in which passage I entirely agree. In my opinion when the Legislature added throughout the enacting sections of the Act the words "other place" or "place," and abstained from defining, as it did, what those words should mean, it did so, not for the purpose of extending the ambit of the Act, but in order to leave it to the court, as each case arose, to determine whether the individual charged was or was not in fact attempting to evade and evading the Act by carrying on the business of a betting house in a "place" akin or equivalent to that of a betting house or office, though not actually in a house or office. It is for this purpose that the words "room," "other place," "place," "any person using the same," "any person having the management of the same" were added.

If a person carries on the business of betting in a place akin to that of a betting house, whether such place is set up upon a racecourse or elsewhere, then he is guilty of the betting made illegal by the Act, for he is then carrying on the business of a betting house in a prohibited place. It is the user of the prohibited place for the business of betting which is struck at by the Act.

This, in my judgment, is the true construction of the Act for the suppression of betting houses. The Scotch case of Henretty v. Hart, cited by Mr. Joseph Walton, supports my view of the Act.

I now come to those cases decided upon the Act which in my view have an important bearing upon this case. There are but three cases in the books during the forty-four years the Act of 1853 has been in operation in which professional bookmakers at race-meetings have been proceeded against under the Act. In each the bookmaker was convicted, but the grounds upon which the convictions were upheld are most significant.

The first case is that of Shaw v. Morley, which related to a plot of ground outside the enclosure at Doncaster race-stand upon which had been erected a wooden structure of five feet high fronting two ways, one to the course, the other to the enclosure. It was covered with green baize and had boards used as desks fronting each way. Upon this structure were the words "William Nicholl, of Nottingham," and papers partly printed and partly written with the names of races, horses, and betting prices. The betting lists so exhibited had on them the odds upon and against each horse in each race which William Nicholl, the proprietor of the structure, was willing to bet. The appellant Shaw transacted the betting business so carried on at one frontage of this structure for Nicholl. Kelly, C.B., Martin, B., and Pigott, B., held that what Shaw was doing was within the 3rd section of the Act, and quite rightly, for what he was doing was in truth and in fact carrying on the business of a betting house or office, if not in a betting house, office, or room, at any rate in a place akin or equivalent thereto, and was therefore carrying on betting in a prohibited place. If Shaw had not been convicted because he was not in fact using a betting house or office, the Act would clearly have been evaded, for, as I have said, a man may well set up and use a betting house or office or other place akin or equivalent thereto upon a racecourse and carry on the business of a betting house thereat.

The next case is that of Bows v. Fenwick. This case went a step in advance of the last, but was really decided upon similar grounds. In this case a professional bookmaker upon the Roodee at Chester during the races stood upon a stool 2ft. 6in. high over which was a large umbrella, capable of covering several persons, upon which was painted "G. Bows, Victoria Club, Leeds," which umbrella was fixed into the ground with a spike. There was also a card exhibited on which were the words, "We pay all bets first past the post." The court, which consisted of Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett, J., and Denman, J., held that the business so carried on by the bookmaker was within section 3 of the Act of 1853, because the bookmaker was carrying on his business in a fixed and ascertained place, per Lord Coleridge, C.J.; because "the kind of gaming prohibited by the Act was the opening and keeping a place for the purpose of gaming or betting with persons resorting thereto—a 'fixed place' . . . whether on a racecourse or elsewhere," per Brett, J.; because "there was a piece of ground ascertained and appropriated by the appellant for carrying on his proceedings," per Denman, J. The ratio decidendi of these learned judges appears to me to be that the evidence showed that the appellant was carrying on his business of betting within a prohibited place—that is, a place akin or equivalent to that of a betting house or office, and that this was the inference which they drew from the facts proved. I do not dissent from this inference, but I think that it is the limit to which the provisions of the Act can be extended.

The last case is that of Gallaway v. Maries. In this case the court went further, and, with submission, I think went too far. In this case a bookmaker, together with a companion, carried on his business of betting at Four Oaks Park Races within the enclosure, the companion standing upon a small wooden box unattached to the ground. The court (Grove, J., and Lopes, J.) held this to be within section 3 of the Act of 1853, Grove, J., because the box defined a certain spot, Lopes, J., with much doubt, after pointing out that placing down a piece of matting and standing upon it would have been the same thing, but, thinking himself governed by Bows v. Fenwick, assented to upholding the conviction.

I cannot think that the correct inference was drawn—namely, that this appellant was keeping or using a place akin or equivalent to a betting house or office. But whatever may be said of these three cases, there is this undeniable fact apparent in each, that not one of the eight learned judges who respectively decided them (Kelly, C.B., Martin, B., Pigott, B., Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett, J., Denman, J., Grove, J., and Lopes, J.) would have held the convicted bookmaker to have brought himself within the Act of 1853 had it not been for the special user he had made of the particular desk, the stool and umbrella, and the box. It is immaterial whether the right inference was drawn or not from the proved facts of these cases; the point, and a most important point it is, is that not one of these learned judges would have held the point tenable that professional bookmakers by using an enclosure at a race-meeting, as they did in the present case, had brought themselves within the Act of 1853, and had it not been for the special user which had been made of the desk, the umbrella and stool, and the box in these cases, the convictions would obviously have been quashed. There is therefore a formidable consensus of judicial opinion to be set-off against the opinion of the five learned judges who decided in the present year the case of Hawke v. Dunn.

I do not propose to deal with the numerous cases which have arisen about the user of rooms at public-houses by betting men when carrying on their business of betting with persons resorting thereto, for the words "house" and "room" are specifically mentioned in the Act as two of the prohibited places when used by a betting man for carrying on the business of betting therein, and in my judgment these cases have no application to betting in an enclosure at a racecourse in the usual way as in the present case.

There are, however, two cases decided in 1874 to which I must refer. The first is Eastwood v. Miller. In this case the occupier of enclosed grounds containing nearly four acres was charged that he did unlawfully use a certain place—to wit, a field—for the purpose of betting on a certain pigeon-shooting match for money contrary to 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, s. 3.

It is true that professional bookmakers were present, but Lush, J., apparently took the question to be whether the appellant "used or permitted the place to be used for the purpose of betting," and Archibald, J., said: "There are two questions—first, whether this is a place; and, secondly, whether it was permitted to be used for the purpose of betting." I must point out that if this was the question there was no offence committed, for it cannot be contended that owning, occupying, keeping, or using a place for persons betting therein inter se is any offence within the Act. It is, too, remarkable that neither of the cases of Shaw v. Morley, in 1868, nor of Bows v. Fenwick, of the 4th of May, 1874, were called to the attention of the court. It may be that the latter case had not, upon the 3rd of June, 1874, when Eastwood v. Miller was decided, been published in the reports, and it should be also noticed that Eastwood v. Miller was only argued on one side. If this decision decided that a professional bookmaker moving about a four-acre field betting with persons desirous of betting with him is using a place akin or equivalent to a betting house or office, I respectfully say that in my judgment the decision is wrong.

The other case is that of Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, in which the appellant was charged with keeping and wilfully permitting a cricket ground, of which he was occupier, to be used by certain persons for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. Fifteen or twenty professional bookmakers stood on chairs and stools in different spots betting with different persons and had each a man behind him recording the bets. The magistrate convicted the appellant, and the Court of Queen's Bench (Blackburn, Lush, and Mellor, JJ.) held that they were right. If this conviction had been supported upon the inference drawn in Bows v. Fenwick I should have had nothing to say to it, but it does not appear to have been so. Blackburn, J., said: "By section 3 it is made an offence in the owner or occupier to permit the place to be kept or used for the purpose of betting. It must be taken on the statement of the case that the appellant was well aware of what was going on. . . . The magistrate was therefore right in saying that the appellant did permit the place to be used for betting." To use or to permit a place to be used for the purpose of betting, as before pointed out, is no offence at all, but to use or to permit a betting house, office, room, or other place akin or equivalent thereto to be used for the purpose of carrying on the business of a betting house or office is the offence created by the Act, and what is rendered illegal. If this case decides that professional bookmakers moving about a field betting with those of the public who are willing to bet with them are carrying on the business of a betting house in a place akin or equivalent to that of a betting house or office, I do not agree with it, and I think, if this be so, that this decision, as well as Eastwood v. Miller, is wrong.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., and I, in the case of Snow v. Hill, held that the appellant, who was charged with "being a person using a certain place" (to wit, a reserved portion of a field) "unlawfully did use the said place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto," was not within the Act of 1853, because he exercised his business of bookmaker upon no ascertained piece of ground—in other words, upon no premises akin or equivalent to a betting house or office as in Shaw v. Morley, Bows v. Fenwick, and as had been held in Gallaway v. Maries, and we followed the more recent cases in preference to Eastwood v. Miller and Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, decided in 1874.

It is a mistake to say, as Mr. Justice Hawkins said in Reg. v. Preedy, 17 Cox C. C. 433, and again in Hawke v. Dunn, that we decided Snow v. Hill upon the ground that there was no evidence that the bookmaker was carrying on the business of a bookmaker, but was only carrying on betting as one of the public. The view taken by Lindley, L.J., of Snow v. Hill in Liddell v. Lofthouse, 44 W. R. 349, [1896] 1 Q. B. 295, is correct, and I also entirely agree in his judgment therein when he drew the inference and held that the hoarding in that case was a "place" within the meaning of the Act. What Lindley, L.J., said of the case of Doggett v. Catterns I also agree with, and have nothing to add thereto.

For the reasons above I am of opinion that to use an enclosure at a race-meeting as it was used in the present case is not the user of a place akin or equivalent to a betting house or betting office, which is what is prohibited by the Act.

In my judgment the case of Hawke v. Dunn was not correctly decided, and the court was not justified in extending the meaning of the Act, which it did by in reality striking out the dominant words "house," "office," and room," and relying upon the words "other place" as if they were the dominant words of the section. If this construction of the Act be correct the dominant words of the Act are mere surplusage, which is a construction I cannot adopt, and in my judgment this appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I have the misfortune to differ in this case from my learned brothers, but as I have formed an opinion differing from them I feel bound to give my reasons at considerable, but I hope not undue, length.

The facts admitted in this case so far as they appear material are as follows: The "Reserved Enclosure" as it is called is part of the lands called the Kempton Park Racecourse, owned and occupied by the defendant company, and does not exceed a quarter of an acre in area. Its linear dimensions appear to be about 40 yards by 30. At one end, being that most distant from the actual racecourse, it consists of raised tiers of seats covered over with a roof forming part of the grand stand. The rest of the enclosure is fenced off from the adjoining land by iron rails, but is not covered in. Professional betting men or bookmakers frequent the enclosure on race days in numbers varying from 100 to 200. The whole number of persons admitted to the enclosure on race days varies from 500 to 2,000. The bookmakers attend for the purpose of carrying on their business there in manner described in the particulars. Of other members of the public frequenting the enclosure the greater number go there for the purpose of backing horses with bookmakers, but a certain number do not bet at all. The bookmaker in the enclosure invariably carries on the practice of betting there as described in the particulars. He does not confine himself to any fixed spot in the enclosure, nor does he use any such apparatus as a desk, stool, umbrella, or tent, though any particular bookmaker is usually to be found in or near the same part of the enclosure. With a few exceptions, when betting takes place on future events, the betting is confined to betting on the races of the day; and no betting commences on any individual race before the names of the horses which are going to run in that race are announced on the telegraph board, usually about a quarter of an hour before the time appointed for the race to be run. Such betting is known as post betting, and continues in most cases till the fall of the flag, when the horses start, and bets are frequently made while the race is being run. Members of the general public are generally backers, and each selects as a rule one horse which he desires to back. In general it is the object of the bookmaker to back the field against as many horses as possible. These general propositions are, however, subject to important exceptions, as pointed out in the particulars.

The practice of calling out the odds which he will give or take in respect of a particular horse is largely adopted by every bookmaker betting in the enclosure for the purpose of attracting the attention of backers. No person in the enclosure is admitted with or has any greater or less right to act as a bookmaker than any other person, although in fact and practice the limited number of persons who do act in that capacity collectively form the market for such bets as the rest of the public or the backers wish to make.

Some bookmakers carry on a ready-money business in the enclosure—that is, they usually require the backer to deposit his stake in respect of the bet at the time the bet is made. Others do the greater part of their business on credit—that is to say, no money is deposited on either side, but they only do business in this way with persons whom they know to be of good credit. Should any person unknown to them offer to bet with them, they would either decline to bet or require such person to deposit his stake. All the above facts are to be found in the pleadings or particulars, and are taken and admitted to be true. In their defence the defendant company denied that it knowingly and wilfully permitted the enclosure to be used for the purpose alleged, but before the Lord Chief Justice, and again before the Court of Appeal, it was distinctly admitted that the defendant company, knowing the facts as to the user of the enclosure above referred to, went on admitting persons to the enclosure and charging them a fee of £1 for admission thereto, and in that sense permitted the user. On this admission it would seem that the defendant company does in law permit the user, such as is shown in the particulars, of the enclosure.

As a sort of supplement to the particulars there is an important statement of fact with reference to what has taken place in other enclosures, which so far as is necessary will be dealt with hereafter, when the effect of the preamble is considered. On the admitted facts the following observations occur. The area of the enclosure does not equal that of many rooms that might be mentioned. If there was an average attendance of bookmakers (150) the whole area (about 1,200 yards) would afford on an average for each bookmaker, if they distributed themselves evenly, about 8 superficial yards, the area of only a very small room or office of 8ft. by 9ft. If, however, as is probable, the bookmakers were to take their positions on the outside of the enclosure as being the place where they would be most easily found, there would not be a lineal yard for each bookmaker. It is true that the position of a particular bookmaker in the enclosure is not fixed to any particular spot or indicated by any mark, but as he is usually to be found in or near the same part of the enclosure it seems plain that he must practically confine himself to a space in the enclosure not exceeding the dimensions of a very small room. During the quarter of an hour or so within which the betting on a particular race is practically confined, the inference must be that for practical purposes he may be as easily found by those who look for him as though he were all the tim - seated at a desk or standing on a box or platform of his own. During the same time his opportunities of betting with persons who resort to the enclosure and their chance of finding him to bet with will be as great as if he were in a house, room, or office.

Lastly, subject to the question whether the enclosure is a "place" within the meaning of the Act, it is plain that the kind of betting carried on there is that which was struck at by the Act, for the bookmakers not only bet with persons resorting to the enclosure, but receive deposits on promises to pay, though the practice is subject to the limitations mentioned in the particulars. Passing on to the questions that have been argued on the appeal, it seems that the three main points for decision are: (1) Whether the enclosure is a place within the meaning of the Act; (2) whether it is kept or permitted to be used by the defendant company for any purpose forbidden by the Act; (3) whether there is anything in the Act from which it can safely be inferred that such an enclosure was intended to be excepted. Having regard to the admission made at the trial, the second point seems to depend upon the question whether within the meaning of the Act the enclosure is used by the bookmakers frequenting it.

It will be convenient to deal first with the enacting clauses which must govern, unless there be some ambiguity which makes it permissible to refer to the preamble. Section 1 contains the leading enactment which has to be construed. Leaving out words inapplicable to the present case, the section provides that "no house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose . . . any person using the same for betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received on behalf of a person using the same as a consideration for a promise to pay money on any event relating to any horse-race." It is reasonably plain from the enacting clauses that the very general word "place" as used here must receive some limitation. If a man were to use within the meaning of the Act every place on which he happened to stand when he made a bet or received a deposit, the operation of the statute would prevent any person carrying on the business of a bookmaker or perhaps any betting at all. A place, however, need not be a house, office, or room. Such a construction would be equivalent to striking it out of the Act. It is said that it must be ejusdem generis with house, office, or room. But the difficulty in such a case is to determine the genus which is to comprize as species all the cases that have to be dealt with, and as that can only be gathered from the Act taken as a whole not much if any assistance can be obtained from the ejusdem generis doctrine. It will be safer and easier, and at the same time sufficient for the present case, to indicate some place that must be included rather than to attempt a definition to cover all places that ought to be included in the Act. The words "other place" being obviously introduced to supplement the words house, office, or room, it would be wrong to exclude any place the use of which involves exactly the same mischief.

Perhaps it would be safe to say that no place should be excluded to which in a reasonable sense persons can resort with a reasonable business probability of being brought into contact there for practical betting purposes with a person or persons using it for betting with those who do resort to it if the latter choose to bet. At any rate it would seem clear that mere variation in the physical condition of a place accessible as a place of resort—as, for instance, whether the place is or is not covered for the time being wholly or partially by a roof—cannot form the test for determining whether it falls within the Act or not. An uncovered yard whether or not included within the curtilage of a house, an uncovered skating-rink or skittle alley, a piece of building ground for the time being either entirely vacant or with buildings in no way covered in, are all cases in which the mischief and nuisance arising from their being used for the purposes forbidden by the Act would be in no way increased by covering them in or mitigated by their being left uncovered. The same thing may be said of the way in which a place is bounded, except perhaps that an enclosure surrounded by an open railing or a place unenclosed but capable otherwise of identification may be more of a nuisance than one which is entirely fenced off by walls of masonry from the view of, and so as to prevent interference from within with the outside public. If an enclosure similar in all respects to that which is being dealt with in this case were found to be used in a town for purposes similar to those for which the Reserved Enclosure is used it would seem impossible to contend that it would not be a place within the meaning of the Act.

Secondly, with reference to user, it is plain that the same rules which apply to houses and rooms must apply in general to places which are not houses or rooms but still are within the Act. Now, it seems impossible to say that a man does not use a house or a room which as a whole is set apart by the owner or occupier or permitted by him to be used for purposes forbidden by the Act unless he confines himself to one spot in the house or room as the case may be. The house may contain many rooms or the room be very large, but the man is using the house or room when he uses any part of it, and the Act has in it nothing to suggest that absolute fixity of position or any other localization of the user, than is involved by the boundaries of the house or room itself, is necessary.

Again, it seems impossible to say that the user of a house or room to fall within the Act must be an exclusive user by one person of the whole or any particular part. First of all, this would involve the change of the more general phrase "any person using" into the more restricted phrase "the person using," for which there is no warrant. But further, such a construction of the Act would leave it open to avoid its operation in a vast number of cases though the mischief struck at remained or was increased. It seems impossible to contend successfully that the use of a house or room with the permission of the owner and occupier by one professional betting man is more of a nuisance or otherwise more objectionable than a similar use by more than one either jointly or one competing with another at the same time. Indeed, the more men permitted to use the house or room at the same time the greater would be the nuisance and the greater the probability of mischief. The same considerations must in general apply to any place not being in a house or room which is brought within the meaning of the Act. But several objections to this construction as applicable to the present case have been urged. It is said that section 2, which provides that every place kept or used for the purposes aforesaid or any of them shall be taken and deemed to be a common gaming house within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1845, shows that "place" should be confined to something in the nature of a house and that the section cannot properly be applied to an enclosure open to the sky. But the words "taken and deemed" are usually employed to indicate that the thing spoken of is not in itself the thing which for the purpose of attracting to it certain legal incidents it is to be deemed to be. Then it is said that is impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended to attach the incidents of a common gaming house to such a place as the Reserved Enclosure. The proper way of ascertaining the intention is by construing the words used, and it cannot be doubted that the Legislature intended to attach those incidents to any place within the meaning of the Act, including the cases of uncovered places in towns already referred to. Of course, in determining the meaning of the word "place," section 2 may be looked at as well as any other part of the Act. But, whatever validity such an argument might have in the case of an entire racecourse, which may extend over many acres and be resorted to by thousands or tens of thousands of persons who never bet at all, and many and indeed most of whom may never come into contact with a bookmaker at all, it cannot outweigh the reasons for considering as a place within the Act the Reserved Enclosure which contains on an average not less than one bookmaker out of every ten persons resorting to it, whilst the greater number of the persons not bookmakers go there for the purpose of backing horses with bookmakers. "Places" which are not houses may, under the provisions of the Gaming Act, 1845, itself, be gaming houses. Sections 11 and 12 of the Act under discussion show that it was the deliberate intention of the Legislature to apply the main provisions of the Gaming Act to places within the Act, and if, as is extremely unlikely, these sections which are in the main intended to procure evidence in cases of suspicion were to be put in force in a case like that of the Reserved Enclosure the minority who attend without any intention of betting would only have themselves to thank for any resulting inconvenience occasioned to them.

Thirdly, it is said that the Act was not intended to apply to betting on racecourses at all. If by this is meant only that ordinary betting whether between persons who are not professional betting men or between professional betting men who in no way attach themselves to a place for the purpose of betting with those who resort thereto, it is apparently true, not only of racecourses, but of all other parts of the country. But then the objection has no reference to the state of facts on which the court is called upon to adjudicate. But if it means that every sort of betting is permissible provided only that it takes place on a racecourse the objection plainly goes too far. The enacting part of the Act contains no reference direct or indirect to racecourses at all. It would seem to be impossible to contend successfully that the defendant company might lawfully permit a house, room, or office on the racecourse to be used by a bookmaker for purposes forbidden by the Act, though apparently there would be no reason why they should not have done so if the Act had not been passed. Or again, that a bookmaker might take up his stand at a place on a racecourse outside an enclosure and there carry on his business without removing from the spot, though probably such a practice prevailed at the passing of the Act and had done so ever since bookmakers came into existence as a class. When once it appears that the Act is applicable in some cases to owners and occupiers of racecourses as well as to other owners and occupiers the contention becomes one for a partial exception only—that is to say, an exception of enclosures for betting purposes, which certainly is a difficult one to support and could not be made out unless there can be shown to be a material distinction between them and other parts of racecourses. The title and preamble have been relied upon for this purpose. The title may be dealt with shortly. With reference to Acts passed as this was before 1854, when the practice of the House of Commons was altered by Standing Order 34, which for the first time authorized the House in Committee to amend the title, there is a great preponderance of authority in favour of the proposition that the title forms no part of the Act and cannot even be looked at for the purpose of construing the Act: see Maxwell on Statutes, 2nd ed., pp. 50, 51, and cases there cited. But this question need not be gone into further, because in the present case it is quite plain that the Act is not confined to the purpose indicated by the title. The preamble no doubt stands on a different footing since it does form part of the Act. But there are numerous instances in which the enacting clauses have gone upon their true construction beyond the scope of the preamble and yet have not been controlled by it, and the true rule seems to be that the preamble cannot be resorted to for the purpose of controlling the enacting clauses either by restricting the scope of them or by enlarging it, and cannot be relied upon unless it be in itself clear and precise in meaning and there is some ambiguity in the enacting clauses themselves which may be cleared up by it. Of course cases will arise where it may be difficult to determine whether the enacting clauses do or do not present such an ambiguity as to require or admit the explanatory operation of the preamble, but the above examination of the enacting part of the Act seems to show that independently of the preamble there could be no reasonable doubt as to the construction. Even if it be admissible, great care is required in drawing conclusions from it. The recital is "Whereas a kind of gaming has of late sprung up tending to the injury and demoralization of improvident persons by the opening of places called betting houses or offices and the receiving of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices or by other persons acting on their behalf on their promises to pay money on the events of horse-races and the like contingencies." Then follow the words "For the suppression thereof be it enacted, &c."

Now, it is clear that the enacting clauses do go beyond the preamble in many particulars of importance—e.g., by including within the prohibition of the statute some places which are not houses or offices and also by including houses, offices, and places where money is received in advance, not by or on behalf of the owners or occupiers, but by persons using the houses, &c., and also by including the receipt by any of the same persons not only of money but also of any valuable thing, and also by extending them (i.e., the owners' or occupiers' promises to pay money) to promises by any of the aforesaid persons to give any valuable thing or to secure the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing. There can be no doubt that these extensions of the operation of the Act, all of which are to be found in section 1, were intentional and deliberate and could not be affected or controlled by the preamble, though it mentions none of them. Why, then, should it be held that the equally plain enactment of the same section whereby every house, office, room, or place opened, kept, or used for the purposes mentioned, or any of them, is declared to be a common nuisance and contrary to law should be subject to the exception of places whether on a racecourse or elsewhere which had been for a considerable time so opened, kept, or used. No doubt the preamble mentions that a kind of gaming had of late sprung up. These words, however, would be sufficiently satisfied by the great and notorious increase shortly before the passing of the Act of the kind of gaming referred to without its being necessary to interpret them as asserting that it had not previously been known. But even assuming that no betting houses or offices had existed otherwise than within the vague period covered by the words "of late," which would be a very strong assumption to make if we are also to assume that the same kind of gaming had been openly and notoriously carried on in racecourse enclosures for more than half-a-century, it would be going far beyond the principle which has hitherto been applied to the control by the preamble of the enacting clause if it were held that places which otherwise would fall within the enacting clauses are to be excepted because they have long been opened, kept, or used for the forbidden purposes. The respondents rely upon a statement introduced at the end of the particulars to the effect that the description of the betting carried on in the Reserved Enclosure applies not only to that enclosure. It is there said that at the time of the passing of the Act of 1853 such enclosures were in like manner frequented the bookmakers and betting transactions of precisely the same character were therein openly and habitually carried on by them, and had been so carried on since the beginning of the present century. This statement requires careful consideration before it can safely be acted upon. The first observation that occurs upon it is that it is a wholly one-sided one in the sense that it deals with racecourse enclosures only and not with other places at all; in other words, it affords no means of judging how far the practice was exceptional. It gives no information as to the practice of bookmakers outside the enclosure. It would be a singular thing if long before the passing of the Act, and, indeed, from an early period after they came into existence as a class, bookmakers did not do what they certainly were doing notwithstanding the Act very soon after its passing, as appears by reported cases—namely, appropriate on the racecourse places where they could carry on their business. If they were so doing, the only distinction that could be suggested between enclosures and other places on racecourses appropriated by bookmakers would be that in the former the betting would be more concentrated and the bookmakers more easy to find. The reasonable inference seems to be that enclosures were used to supply a felt want for a more convenient place for the bookmakers to carry on their already established business in, and thereby to make a profit to the owners rather than that they preceded and afforded the example for the business of betting in outside places on the racecourses. Taking the words "since the beginning of the present century" literally and according to their primary meaning and contrasting them with the words "ever since," which occur immediately afterwards, they do not involve a statement that the practice began with the century or at any definite time before the commencement of the Act. The omission of the word "ever" may have been intentional, and then the statement becomes as vague with reference to time as the preamble itself of the Act, and no argument can be founded on it. There can be no reason why the parties to the action should not be kept strictly to the statements which they deliberately prepare. If, however, by straining the language the statement is construed as fixing the commencement of the practice referred to as far back as the beginning of the century, the statement so construed entirely differs in its nature from the admissions contained in the particulars as to matters within the knowledge of the parties to the action. It becomes an assertion of fact as to a period far beyond living memory, and the court has no knowledge of the evidence on which it is founded and no means of judging as to its accuracy. It would be unfortunate if the decision of an important question of construction were to depend upon a statement which may turn out seriously to exaggerate the length of time during which the practice referred to had existed before the passing of the Act. It would seem, however, that even on the construction last referred to the statement, though accurate, would afford no ground for exempting racecourse enclosures from the operation of the Act. The application of it must depend upon the assumption that the promoters of the Act and the members of the Legislature generally knew of the facts contained in the statement relating to such enclosures, and with that knowledge intended by the words used in the preamble to exclude them. But if that knowledge and intention both existed it is almost impossible to give any sufficient reason why some more direct language was not used in order to make the intention clear. It is quite a common thing for a preamble to contain a statement of the occasion which has led to the necessity for legislation without exhaustively describing the legislation intended, and that has been already shown to be the case with reference to this preamble and section 1 of this Act. Further, if the Legislature had intended to leave unaffected cases in which the kind of betting struck at had gone on for a long time, the natural thing would have been to limit a time for that purpose, and not to leave so important a question to be determined on the vague phrase "of late sprung up." It could hardly be contended with success that a betting-house otherwise clearly within the Act would escape the operation of it by being shown to have been opened for forty or fifty years before the passing of the Act, and the same considerations ought to be applied to all places within the meaning of the Act, as there is nothing to make a distinction in this respect between one place and another.

I have thought it better down to this point to confine myself to a consideration of the Act itself and to express my own individual opinion on the construction of the Act independently of the decided cases, partly because there is no case binding upon this court, and partly in order to avoid the danger of losing sight of the Act itself in considering the decisions upon it. Those decisions are, however, of great importance, and I now proceed shortly to refer to them.

First, as to place there is a remarkable consensus of opinion, when the cases are examined, and in my judgment no single case which, when properly understood, would conflict with the interpretation which I have above suggested. Doggett v. Catterns has been thought to be a decision that a place under a clump of trees, without any mark of appropriation by the betting man charged, cannot be a place within the meaning of the Act. This is shown by Lindley and Kay, L.JJ., in Liddell v. Lofthouse not to be the case, the decision having turned upon the construction of section 4 of the Act, which was held not to apply to a man using a place independently of the owner or occupier. In that case not only Erle, C.J., and Keating, J., in the court below, but a majority of the judges in the Exchequer chamber—namely, Pollock, C.B., Crompton and Blackburn, JJ., and Channell, B., thought that the place in question would be a place within the meaning of the Act if it could have had an owner or occupier. Snow v. Hill, decided by Coleridge, C.J., and A. L. Smith, J., in 1885, was relied upon both in Hawke v. Dunn, the case against which the appeal is in substance brought and on this appeal, but there was in that case, so far as the report shows, no evidence of the kind of betting struck at by the Act. For anything that appeared in Snow v. Hill the defendant, who did not confine himself to any particular part of the racecourse, but was walking about making bets, may have been not a professional bookmaker, betting with persons resorting to the place, but an ordinary member of the public making casual bets. Shaw v. Morley, decided by Kelly, C.B., and Martin and Pigott, BB., in 1868, was a clear decision that an uncovered place on a racecourse might be an office or place within the meaning of the Act. Bows v. Fenwick, decided by Coleridge, C.J., and Brett and Denman, J.J., in 1874, was a decision that a place on the Chester racecourse, identified only by a stool and umbrella, was a "place" within the meaning of the Act. Gallaway v. Maries, decided by Grove and Lopes, JJ., in 1881, was a case only differing from Bows v. Fenwick in the fact that the means of identifying the place was a loose box—obviously, I think, an immaterial distinction. Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, decided by Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, JJ., in 1874, was one brought against the occupying tenant of a cricket ground (used not only for cricket, but for foot-racing, games, and sports) for permitting the user of the enclosure for betting with persons resorting thereto. The evidence showed that from fifteen to twenty professional bookmakers stood on chairs and stools in different spots, calling out the odds and betting with different persons and receiving deposits. Any one of these bookmakers might, within the principles of the cases already cited, have been convicted of using the place where they stood for illegal purposes, and the conclusion arrived at by the court that the defendant, who knowingly permitted such user, was guilty of an offence under the Act seems to me an inevitable one. In my judgment none of the last three cases referred to can have depended upon the character of the umbrella, box, or stool, and the only way in which the existence of those articles was material was as affording evidence that the bookmaker practically confined himself to a place where he could be readily found. Eastwood v. Miller, relied upon in Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield, was decided by Lush and Archbold, JJ., in 1874, and treated a place 3a. 3r. 25p. in area as a place within the meaning of the Act. In that case there are expressions of both the learned judges to the effect that the size of the place cannot be of importance. It is not necessary to rely upon those expressions or to discuss them. The evidence showed that there were at least two bookmakers betting and receiving deposits, and the fair inference would be that they would so far confine themselves to one spot as to be capable of being found when the race was over, and that I think would be enough to justify the decision. With regard to the Scotch case of Henretty v. Hart I will only say that I cannot reconcile the reasoning of the two learned judges, Young and Clerk, L.JJ., with the decision in Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield before referred to, and that I prefer to rely upon that judgment. I concur more nearly with the reasoning of Lord Craighill, the dissentient judge, in Henretty v. Hart. Finally, the case of Liddell v. Lofthouse, already mentioned and decided by Lindley and Kay, L.JJ., in 1896, shows that a place is not less a place within the meaning of the Act because the betting man using it has not placed any mark of his own upon it.

Secondly, as to user, the cases above referred to are authorities also as to this point, and I need only refer in addition to decisions as to user in the following cases which I think important for the decision of the question before the court. The first is Reg. v. Preedy, decided by Hawkins, J., in 1888, in which that learned judge goes through all the authorities and explains the meaning of user in accordance with what I have above indicated. The others are Hornsby v. Raggett, 40 W. R. 111, [1892] 1 Q. B. 20, decided by Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ., in 1891, and M'William v. Dawson, 56 J. P. 182, decided in the same year by the same learned judges, and in which it was held that a man used a tap-room or bar in a public-house for betting, though he did not confine himself to any particular part of it.

Thirdly, as to the exemption claimed, the only case in which the precise point whether enclosures like the Reserved Enclosure as distinguished from other places on racecourses are exempted by implication from the Act is that of Hawke v. Dunn. I concur in substance with the reasoning of the judges in that case contained in the judgment of Hawkins, J. But almost all the cases decided under the Act, and especially all those where bookmakers have been convicted for carrying on their business on racecourses, are directly applicable to enclosures unless a substantial and material difference between the enclosure and other ascertained places on racecourses can be made out; but though the preamble has been frequently referred to it has never seemed to occur to anyone concerned that it made the length of time during which the practice charged has been carried on in any way relevant.

On the above considerations I have arrived at the conclusion that the Reserved Enclosure is a place within the meaning of the Act, that it is permitted to be used by the defendant company for purposes forbidden by the Act, and that the plaintiff as a shareholder is entitled to the injunction asked for. The result would be, according to my individual opinion, that the appeal should be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—After the exhaustive judgments which have been delivered, little remains for me beyond expressing my own opinion. The facts have been fully stated; the Act of Parliament has been examined closely, and its provisions have been stated, analysed, discussed, criticized, and considered. For myself I have gone through a similar course of investigation. What I propose to do is to deal only with the more salient points and to state the conclusion at which I have arrived. The case was heard by the Lord Chief Justice, (Lord Russell of Killowen) on the admissions contained in the particulars and also on the additional admissions made at the Bar, the just inference from which appears to be that which the Lord Chief Justice was prepared to draw—namely, that the defendants knowingly and wilfully permit the Reserved Enclosure to be used for the purposes for which it is actually used. The correctness of the admissions was not in any way called in question before the Lord Chief Justice; they could not be questioned, nor were they questioned, in the argument before us. It is satisfactory to know that Mr. Asquith was instructed to say, and did say, in his opening before the Lord Chief Justice, that on a careful investigation the facts stated in the particulars may be assumed to be correctly stated. He said that the sole object of the action, so far as he was instructed, was to obtain the decision of the highest court in the country upon what is undoubtedly a very important question of law.

The question really is a mixed question of fact and law. It appears to be this: Is the Reserved Enclosure described in the particulars, and used for the purposes therein stated on the days when the races are held, a "place" within the prohibition of the Act of 1853? The two points—(1) the nature of the place, and (2) the nature of the user—although properly made the subject of separate consideration, must in the result be dealt with together in combination in order to arrive at a just conclusion. It appears to me to be incorrect to ask whether the enclosure is excluded; the right question is whether it is included. As the statute creates a criminal offence, it is incumbent on those who allege that the offence has been committed, to show affirmatively that it has been committed. I am not here relying on the old rule that penal statutes ought to be construed strictly. I think that all statutes ought to be construed reasonably; but at the same time I think that the Judicature ought to be on its guard against holding that certain acts are a criminal offence against a statute, unless it is reasonably plain that those acts do amount to the offence within the meaning of the Legislature as disclosed by the statute itself and such surrounding circumstances as are properly admissible in evidence. The state of the law when the Act of 1853 was passed was this: The Legislature had before it in 1845 the question of betting. By the Act then passed it deliberately refrained from declaring betting illegal; it contented itself with making the contract of betting void, and taking away any right of action to recover a bet lost. The law stood thus when the Act of 1853 was passed: It was lawful for a man to bet, to bet habitually and systematically, and to carry on a business of betting whether on credit or by way of deposit; there was no difference in law between making a single or occasional bet and being a professional bookmaker. The law as to betting was not altered by the Act of 1853 except only by the special prohibitions contained in that statute. On that statute it is plain that betting of itself is not made illegal. Betting or not betting a man must be in some place, and it is clear that the word "place" in that Act has not the general meaning of any or every place. Some particular kind of place is aimed at; what that is must be discovered from the statute itself. It is plain on the statute that the persons, not being the bookmakers, who resort to the "place" are not liable to the penalties of fine and imprisonment imposed by the Act, but they are liable to what may be justly described as the degradation of being arrested and searched and taken before a magistrate. Consequently, if the plaintiff's contention be right, all persons who are found in this enclosure during the races, or, at all events, while the betting as described is going on, are liable to this treatment, although they are present for the mere purpose of seeing the races or their friends and acquaintances, and have no thought of making a bet. I am unable to think that this point is disposed of by saying that before the betting begins they may safely remain, but that directly it begins they must go, or submit to the risk of being molested by the police.

Coming a little more closely to the language of the statute, I pass by the title, on which I place no reliance. It appears to me that no argument could be founded on the title which is not more plainly indicated by the preamble. Here we come to the old question of what is the true relation of the preamble to the enactments themselves. Undoubtedly it is a settled rule that the preamble cannot be made use of to control the enactments themselves where they are expressed in clear and unambiguous terms. But it has been well said that the preamble is a key to the statute and that it affords a clue to the scope of the Act; these statements, however, are subordinate to the settled rule above referred to. The contest and the difficulty arise directly you begin to apply these rules to the particular statute. The effect of the preamble must vary according to the greater or less ambiguity of the enacting words and the distinctive language of the preamble itself. Two things, I think, are clear on the interpretation of this statute; first, the preamble states in unambiguous language the principal mischief for the suppression of which the Act was passed; and, secondly, the word "place" in the enactments is not used in its most comprehensive sense and is to that extent, at all events, ambiguous.

Now I refer to one point in the preamble. It shows that the kind of gaming intended to be suppressed was a kind which had then lately sprung up. I read the words "of late" in the preamble as referring to something which had sprung up during the eight years' interval after 1845, when the Legislature had considered the question of betting; but, whether this be so or not, it is impossible to read the words as relating to a practice which had been going on since the beginning of the century at all racecourse enclosures. Here the fact stated in the tenth clause of the particulars is of great importance. The practice of the bookmakers and the betting transactions of the same character as those which take place in this Reserved Enclosure had been carried on in similar enclosures throughout the country from the beginning of the century, not secretly, but openly and habitually. It is inconceivable that these practices, notorious as they must have been, should have been unknown to the Legislature when they passed the Act of 1853, and it is difficult to suppose that, if they had intended to suppress them, some direct and unmistakable words relating to them should not have been found in the Act; yet there are no such words. It is just worthy of mention that, although the Act has been in operation for nearly forty-four years, it is only recently that a suggestion has been made that these practices in the racecourse enclosures are illegal and render the enclosures themselves prohibited places. During this long period the informers, an alert race, have been asleep, the magistrates somnolent, and the police supine, if this recent suggestion be well founded. But, of course, this is but a mere observation, and affords no answer to the charge if the recent discovery is a real discovery of the true intentions of the Legislature.

Lord Justice Lindley has already given a careful analysis of the Act. I think it correct and shall not repeat it. The Act contains no definition of the word "place"; the absence of such definition I take to be intentional. The Legislature meant, in my opinion, each case to be dealt with on its own facts, and it seems to me that we ought not to attempt to define what the Legislature has purposely left undefined. The enactments certainly go beyond the preamble. The view I take is this: the Legislature, having before it the leading idea of suppressing the opening of betting houses or offices and the receiving of money in advance by the owners of such houses or offices or by other persons acting on their behalf, foresaw the necessity of employing in the enactments other words which would prevent evasion and subterfuges, and has framed the enactments accordingly: see the judgment of Lush, J., in Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield. But after careful examination of the sections I am unable to find any sufficiently disclosed intention to enlarge the general ambit of the Act. The business of a bookmaker is not prohibited; by itself it is still lawful; dropping for the moment, but not forgetting, the amplifying words, the gist of the offence aimed at appears to me to be the using of a house, room, or office or other place as presently explained for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto.

In the enactments the general and ambiguous word "place" is always preceded by the words "house, office, room" or "house, room, office"; it has sometimes the word "other" prefixed and sometimes not. Nothing turns on the omission of the word "other" where this omission occurs. The leading idea and the standard description are to be found in the words "house, room, and office"; the place is something of the same kind taken in connection with the user. The ordinary rule of construction sometimes called "ejusdem generis" sometimes "noscitur a sociis" applies. "Place" must mean something of the same kind; something which conforms to the leading idea conveyed by the words with which it is associated. Plainly the enclosure is not a "house" nor a "room" nor an "office." The word "office" in this connection appears to me to have the most comprehensive meaning and the largest import of the three unambiguous words. What are the characteristics, the usual fittings up, or accessories of an "office"? A desk, a table, a chair, and things of that description. Now, in this enclosure the bookmakers have no apparatus of that kind. There are certain structures which, in my opinion, fall within the Act wherever set up or found; a booth, a tent, and an umbrella fixed in the ground by a spike, which is but a kind of tent, are all within the meaning of "place" when it is used for the purposes indicated. A movable structure on wheels, such as those in which merchants conduct their business of lading and unlading ships in the docks of Liverpool, mentioned by Martin, B., in Shaw v. Morley, is a good example of an office or place within the Act. The fact of such an office or place being set up and used by the bookmaker on a racecourse would not take it out of the Act; a racecourse is nowhere mentioned in it.

Now, it was pressed upon us by Mr. Asquith in his able argument that the bookmakers do, in fact, use this enclosure as the place where they separately carry on their betting businesses as described in the particulars, but the question is whether they use the enclosure as a betting house, room, or office, or as a place conformable to the leading idea conveyed by the three standard words. I think that they do not.

The enclosure is visited by two thousand persons on attractive race-days, of whom two hundred are bookmakers. The bookmakers and their clerks and the general public are all admitted to the enclosure without distinction and on the same terms. Many of the general public bet with the bookmakers; some do not bet with them at all, they go merely to see the races or to meet their friends and acquaintances. The bookmakers have no special right or privilege within the enclosure; no particular part of the enclosure is assigned or allotted to them. They carry on their betting in competition. Although each bookmaker may generally be found near the same place, he has no special right to the place he occupies temporarily; if he moves from it, as he does, any member of the general public may take the place he has quitted. He has no fixed or ascertained place within the enclosure; he cannot claim any particular station; he has no individual control over the place he occupies beyond such as every one else within the enclosure has over the place he occupies for the time being. The term "spot" was employed in the argument; I discard the word altogether, it is not found in the statute.

Some of the principal authorities have already been stated and dealt with at length. I shall confine myself to expressing my opinion upon them. No doubt there has been considerable difference in the judicial opinions expressed on the construction of this Act. The Act is so drawn as almost to invite difference of opinion—certainly so as to give rise to it. I think that the following cases were rightly decided—namely, Shaw v. Morley, Bows v. Fenwick, and Snow v. Hill. From Doggett v. Catterns, in which there was much divergence of opinion, I am unable to obtain any safe guidance. I think that Eastwood v. Miller and Haigh v. Town Council of Sheffield carry the statute beyond its true limit. I am prepared to go as far as Bows v. Fenwick, the case of the umbrella with a spike; possibly Gallaway v. Maries, the case of the box (simply), may be supported on the same ground, but it is open to question. I concur with A. L. Smith, L.J., in what he has said about the opinions of the eight judges who decided the cases of Shaw v. Morley, Bows v. Fenwick, and Snow v. Hill. Their method of reasoning on the statute is inconsistent with the decision in Hawke v. Dunn.

My conclusion is that the construction put upon the Act by the plaintiff's counsel does not give the proper effect to the dominant words "house, room, or office," and further, I am satisfied that the Legislature has not manifested in the enacting part of the Act a clear intention of declaring illegal such an enclosure as this is and used as it is used.

For the above reasons I think that the appeal ought to be allowed; and for the same reasons that the decision in Hawke v. Dunn ought to be overruled.

SMITH v. SMITH. (a.)

Divorce—Practice—Application for rehearing, whether to be made to Divisional Court or to Court of Appeal—Trial without a jury—Divorce Rules, 1865, r. 62—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 1.

An application for leave to serve notice of motion for a rehearing of a petition for divorce must, if the petition was heard by a judge without a jury, be made to a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, and not to the Court of Appeal.

Original motion by Mrs. M. A. Smith for leave to serve notice of motion for a rehearing of her petition for divorce.

The petition was heard in March, 1897, before Barnes, J., without a jury, and the time allowed by the rules for making an application for a rehearing had expired.

The question was whether the application ought to be made to the Court of Appeal or to a Divisional Court.

Rule 62 of the Divorce Rules, 1865 (as amended in 1887), provides that applications for a new trial of issues of fact tried by a jury, or for a rehearing of a cause, shall be made to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 1, provides that every motion for a new trial or to set aside a verdict, finding, or judgment in any cause or matter in the High Court in which there has been a trial thereof, or of any issue therein, with a jury, shall be heard and determined by the Court of Appeal, and not by a Divisional Court of the High Court.

The applicant's solicitors had consulted the registrar, who had advised them that their application ought to be made to the Court of Appeal.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I do not think the Court of Appeal has any jurisdiction in this case. The proper court for the applicant to apply to is a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division. The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, applies only to applications for new trials and rehearings in cases which have been tried with a jury. The case of Wilkins v. Wilkins, 44 W. R. 305, [1896] P. 108, is not in any way inconsistent with that view. So far as the present case is concerned, there is nothing to alter the effect of rule 62 of the Divorce Rules, which still applies in such circumstances. I think justice will be done by making no order on the motion.

SMALL AND OTHERS v. UNITED KINGDOM MUTUAL MARINE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Insurance, marine—Mortgage of shares in ship—Policy on ship—Right of mortgagee to sue on policy—Mortgagor master of ship—Barratry of master.

The plaintiff advanced a sum of money to a person who was about to purchase certain shares in a ship upon the terms that the latter should be appointed captain, and that the advance should be secured by a mortgage of the borrower's shares in the ship, and that an insurance should be effected on the ship to cover the plaintiff's interest as mortgagee. A policy on the ship was accordingly effected by the ship's husband "as well in their own names as for and in the name or names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain in part or in all." The policy covered a loss by perils of the sea and by barratry of the master. The mortgagor was appointed captain, and the ship was lost through his barratrous act. In an action on the policy,

Held, that, as the plaintiff's interest in the ship was covered by the policy, he was entitled to recover, the causa proxima of the loss being a peril of the sea; and, further, that, if the mortgagor was appointed captain by the plaintiff as well as by the co-owners, the wrongful act of the captain was barratrous as against the plaintiff, and the latter could recover as for a loss by barratry.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J.; reported [1897] 2 Q. B. 42, 45 W. R. Dig. 74.

The action was brought by the executors of Samuel Small to recover for a total loss upon a policy of marine insurance alleged to have been effected on his behalf with the defendant association on the ship James Livesey.

The defence was that the policy had been made for and on behalf of Wilkes, the master of the ship, and that the vessel had been wilfully cast away by Wilkes.

It was ordered that the question should be first tried whether, assuming the alleged barratrous conduct of the master, that was a defence to the action, the trial of the question as to the truth of the charge against the master being reserved until after the preliminary question had been disposed of.

Wilkes was the son-in-law of Samuel Small, and had applied to Small for an advance to enable him to purchase, with two co-owners, the ship James Livesey, of which he was to be appointed captain. Wilkes was to have twenty-four sixty-fourth shares in the ship.

Small agreed to lend Wilkes £700 upon having his advance secured by a mortgage of Wilkes' shares in the ship, and his solicitors were instructed to act for him in obtaining from Wilkes the mortgage and such other securities as they thought necessary.

The solicitors informed Wilkes that the advance would not be made unless, in addition to the mortgage, satisfactory arrangements were made to cover Small's interest as mortgagee by insurance.

The solicitors in the first instance stipulated that the policies of insurance should be handed to them to be deposited with Small's securities; but Wilkes pointed out that the insurances on the ship were to be effected through Carlsen, Nielsen, & Co., who were to act as ship's husbands, and that the co-owners would not consent to their parting with the policies. Upon Wilkes' promise that the insurances should be effected for Small, the solicitors did not insist upon a deposit of the policies. The ship was afterwards covered by insurances effected through Carlsen, Nielsen, & Co. upon the instructions of Wilkes and his co-owners, the policies being effected by Carlsen, Nielsen, & Co., "as well in their own names as for and in the name or names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all," and the perils insured against including perils of the sea and barratry of the master or mariners. During the currency of the policies the ship became a total loss.

Mathew, J., came to the conclusion that the insurance was effected to cover the interests of Small as mortgagee and of Wilkes as mortgagor; and, further, that Small took part in placing Wilkes in the position of master. He gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

J. A. Hamilton and Lord Robert Cecil (Joseph Walton, Q.C., with them) for the defendants.—The mortgagee did not insure his own interest as a separate interest. There was an insurance on the ship taken out by Wilkes, so far as his share was concerned, on behalf of himself and his mortgagee. The mortgagee can only claim on that policy through Wilkes, and as the defendants have a defence against Wilkes, they have a defence against his mortgagee who claims under him. If the mortgagee recovers on the policy, Wilkes will benefit by it, as the money recovered will go towards satisfying the mortgage. By section 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the mortgagee does not become the owner of the ship, but the mortgagor remains the owner, and there can be no barratry against the mortgagee who stands in no better position than his mortgagor.

They referred to Hobbs v. Hannam, 3 Camp. 93.

T. G. Carver and W. E. Lloyd, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The plaintiffs, who are the executors of Small, are suing the defendants upon a policy of insurance on ship for a total loss by the perils insured against. The plaintiffs can only sue if the policy was made on behalf of Small. They could sue under the statute if the policy had been assigned to Small. But there has been no assignment here. The plaintiffs claim on the ground that Small was a party to the policy. The first question therefore is, Was Small a party to the policy? Mathew, J., came to the conclusion upon the facts that, by arrangement between Wilkes and Small, Wilkes was to get an insurance on the ship for and on behalf of Small so as to cover Small's interest as mortgagee. It is clear that Small, as mortgagee, had an insurable interest in the ship. If the ship were lost, his interest in the ship as mortgagee would be lost too. He could no doubt sue the mortgagor for the money lent, but his interest in the ship would be gone. Therefore Small was insured against the perils covered by the policy to the extent of his interest in the ship, and it was clear that the interests of mortgagor and mortgagee were distinct interests. The mortgagee claimed his interest, not through the mortgagor, but as a distinct interest. If that were the only relation between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, the mortgagee would have nothing to say to the sailing of the ship. The mortgagee would sue upon the policy to the extent of his interest in the ship. If he had nothing to say to the captain, the captain's acts were the same as the acts of a stranger. If a stranger was guilty of some wrongful act, and the sea in consequence got into the ship and the ship were lost, in insurance law the causa proxima of the loss would be the coming in of the sea. There would then be a loss by a peril of the sea. The wrongful act would not be the causa proxima of the loss, and the mortgagee would recover on the policy as upon a loss by a peril of the sea, and not as upon a loss by barratry. The wrongful act of a stranger, as the captain in the case supposed was, would not affect the mortgagee. If, on the other hand, the captain was the mortgagee's captain, then the captain was guilty of misconduct called barratry against the persons who appointed him. Before the policy was effected, Small agreed to advance Wilkes the money, knowing that he was to be captain of the ship, and Mathew,

J., has found that Small took part in placing Wilkes in the position of captain. Therefore Wilkes was to be captain for and on behalf of Small, as well as of the co-owners. That being so, the wrongful act was that of the captain, as against those who appointed him, and in this view the plaintiffs can recover under the clause in the policy as for a loss by barratry of the master. In either view, therefore, the judgment is right.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The real point appears to me to be this—if Small was the assignee of Wilkes, any defences that could be raised against Wilkes would be available against Small. The plaintiffs, however, do not sue upon the ground that Small was the assignee of Wilkes, but they sue upon a policy effected by Wilkes for Small. It seemed that Wilkes had not the money to pay for his shares in the ship, and Small advanced him £700, taking a mortgage of Wilkes' shares in the ship, upon the terms that Wilkes was to be the captain of the ship, and that a policy should be effected for Small to cover his advance. Accordingly a policy was effected with the defendants by Carlsen, Nielsen, & Co., "as well in their own names as for and in the name or names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all." In my opinion Small would have been entitled to sue upon that policy in his own name, and therefore his executors are entitled to sue. That being so, how does the wrongful act of the captain affect Small? Small had nothing to do with the wrongful act of Wilkes, and he was entitled to sue upon the policy for the loss of the ship by a peril of the sea, and the defendants cannot set up the wrongful act of Wilkes as any answer to that claim. There is another ground upon which we can decide this case. Mathew, J., held, and I think rightly, that Small took part in appointing Wilkes captain of the ship, and that therefore the barratrous act of Wilkes was a barratrous act against Small as well as against the other co-owners. The plaintiffs can therefore sue upon the clause in the policy covering barratry of the captain. The judgment was therefore right.

HILL v. ROWLANDS. (a.)

Mortgage—Right to redeem—Second mortgagee—Order nisi for foreclosure, with liberty to redeem—Chief clerk's certificate finding six months' interest due to first mortgagee—Second mortgagee seeking to redeem on payment only of interest to date.

Where an order for foreclosure directed (in the usual form) that the second mortgagee should be at liberty to redeem on payment to the first mortgagee within six calendar months after the date of the chief clerk's certificate of what should be certified to be due, and the chief clerk's certificate included (in the usual way) interest to the end of the six calendar months so allowed for redemption:

Held, that the second mortgagee was not entitled to have the premises reconveyed to him on payment, before the expiration of the six months, of the principal and costs, together with interest merely to the date of payment, but that payment of interest for the full period of six months was necessary.

Appeal from Romer, J.

In 1895 the plaintiffs, the first mortgagees of certain property, commenced an action to enforce their security. On the 27th of March, 1896, after the plaintiffs had taken possession of the mortgaged property, an order in the usual form was made for a foreclosure nisi. The order reserved to the second mortgagees liberty to redeem on paying to the plaintiffs, within six calendar months after the date of the certificate, and at such time and place as should be appointed, what should be certified to be due to the plaintiffs. In November, 1896, the mortgagor's trustee in bankruptcy (to whom a further period for redemption had been given by the order) paid off the second mortgagee, who thereupon reconveyed to him the mortgaged property, subject only to the first mortgage. On the 5th of May, 1897, the chief clerk made his certificate, certifying the amount which was due to the plaintiffs for principal and interest to the date of the certificate and for their taxed costs, and also for the further interest which would become due to the plaintiffs during the period of six calendar months allowed to the second mortgagee for redemption. The mortgagor's trustee in bankruptcy, in whom the rights of the second mortgagee were now vested, desired to pay off the mortgage debt and interest before the expiration of the period allowed for redemption. He therefore, on the 12th of June, 1897, gave notice of motion that the plaintiffs might be ordered to reconvey the mortgaged property to him upon payment by him of the principal moneys and interest found due to the date of the certificate, together with interest from the date of the certificate down to the date of the service of the notice of motion. Romer, J., held that the trustee in bankruptcy was bound by the certificate, and could not redeem except on payment of the full sum found due by the certificate. His lordship therefore refused the motion with costs. The trustee in bankruptcy appealed.

Macnaghten, Q.C., and H. Wace, for the appeal, cited Smith v. Smith, 40 W. R. 32, [1891] 3 Ch. 550; Paynter v. Carew, 2 W. R. 345, Kay, Appendix xxxvi.; and In re Alcock, Prescott v. Phipps, 23 Ch. D. 372.

Levett, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This application has certainly the merit of novelty; but it is so entirely contrary to the settled practice of the court, and so contrary also to the principles by which we are always guided, that it cannot possibly succeed. I am not going to say anything about whether a mortgagor can or cannot stop a foreclosure suit before decree by tendering the money with interest to date. There seems to be some authority that he can. I express no opinion about that. I will assume that he could. But we are not now dealing with anything before judgment, but with a judgment and what has been done under it. The judgment is express. It is a judgment in the ordinary form for foreclosure of the mortgage, and it has reference to the sum which shall be found due on the chief clerk taking the accounts and making his certificate in the ordinary form. The certificate has now been made in the ordinary way, and the sum found due includes six months' interest. Now, after all that, the mortgagor comes and says that his tender need not be on the terms upon which by the order he is entitled to redeem; he does not want to pay to the mortgagee what has been found due by the certificate, but he proposes to tender less. The mortgagor justifies that contention in this way. He says that the certificate has included interest for six months, and that the inclusion of that six months' interest was a concession to the mortgagor. It was giving him six months to redeem; but it was also an advantage to the mortgagee, because the mortgagee does not know whether he will have any money to invest or not. That period has been settled on considerations of convenience to both parties, and the mortgagor, when he comes to redeem under a judgment, must comply with the terms of the judgment, whatever his rights might have been if he had tendered the money before judgment. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I am not so familiar with matters of this kind as my learned brothers, but it seems to me clear that the certificate determines the rights of the parties. Now, the certificate which gives the mortgagee six months' interest in lieu of notice, and gives him six months to find an investment for his money. As to how the case might stand if payment had been made before judgment, with interest up to the date of payment, I express no opinion.

CHITTY, L.J.—I think that, when examined on principle, the appeal fails. The contention of the appellants is peculiar. It is that upon payment of what is certified by the chief clerk to be due for principal and costs, with interest to the date of payment, the mortgagor is discharged. Now, according to the usual form the sum to be certified is a sum composed of principal, interest, and costs down to the date of the certificate, six months' interest, according to the invariable practice of the court, being added for the period of six months after the certificate. It has always been upon payment of that sum that the reconveyance or redemption is to take place. The order is quite specific in giving six calendar months, and the mortgagor may make his payment at any time within that period, but he must pay the sum mentioned in the certificate. It is the established practice of the court, and is never departed from, that the mortgagor has a period of six months within which he can redeem. Here certain proceedings have taken place—the judgment and the certificate—and the reason, if one has to seek for a reason, is that the mortgagor has six months to find the money, and the mortgagee has a like period which he can usefully employ in looking out for a new security. I think the settled practice ought not to be departed from. Although foreclosures have been going on for centuries, there is no authority for the appellants' contention.

Appeal dismissed.

In re ROSS'S CHARITY. (a.)

Charity—Ecclesiastical charity—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 14, 70, 75.

A testatrix charged certain lands with the payment of £3 a year, to be paid on the feast day of St. Thomas the Apostle to the churchwardens of A., to be laid out by them in the purchase of flannel petticoats, stockings, or gowns to be given to six old and poor widows of the said parish whom they should judge to be the properest objects to receive the same, with preference to those who, not being disabled by infirmity or sickness, were most constant in their attendance on the public services of the church.

Held, that this was not an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1894, and that new trustees might be appointed under section 14 of that Act by the parish council, in the place of the churchwardens.

Petition.

Mary Ross by her will, in 1799, charged certain lands with the payment of £3 a year, to be paid on the feast day of St. Thomas the Apostle in every year for ever to the churchwardens of the parish of Bishop's Hatfield, to be laid out by them in the purchase of flannel petticoats, stockings, or gowns, to be given as soon as might be to six old and poor widows of the said parish of Bishop's Hatfield whom they should judge to be the properest objects to receive the same, with preference to those who, not being disabled by infirmity or sickness, were most constant in their attendance on the public services of the church.

The Local Government Act, 1894, s. 14, sub-section 2, enacts that "where overseers of a rural parish as such are, either alone or jointly with any other persons, trustees of any parochial charity, such number of the councillors of the parish or other persons, not exceeding the number of the overseer trustees, as the council may appoint, shall be trustees in their place, and, when the charity is not an ecclesiastical charity, this enactment shall apply as if churchwardens as such were specified therein as well as the overseers."

The question whether Mary Ross's Charity came within this provision was referred to the Charity Commissioners in accordance with the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 70, sub-section (2). The Charity Commissioners determined that (1) "the said charity was not an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of section 75 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1894; (2) an appointment under section 14 (2) of the said Act by the parish council of the above-mentioned parish (being a rural parish) of trustees in the place of the churchwardens is valid."

The churchwardens presented this petition by way of appeal from the Charity Commissioners.

Lord Robert Cecil, for the petitioners.—Section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1894, says what an "ecclesiastical charity" includes. This is clearly an ecclesiastical charity, and the parish council has no power to appoint trustees.

He cited Shore v. Wilson, 9 Cl. & F. 355; Attorney-General v. Calvert, 23 Beav. 248, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 13.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the Charity Commissioners.—This is an eleemosynary charity; attendance at church is not, in the view of the commissioners, a test of church membership: Attorney-General v. St. John's Hospital, Bath, 24 W. R. 913, 2 Ch. D. 554.

Lord R. Cecil replied.

NORTH, J.—The charity is not an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of the Local Government Act, 1894, which was defined by section 75 as including a charity the endowment whereof was held, amongst other purposes, "for the benefit of any particular church or denomination, or any members thereof as such." The words of the trust constitute beyond all doubt what is called an eleemosynary charity, in respect of which the general rule is that the court does not look at all at the religion of the founder. This is clearly shown by the case of Attorney-General v. Calvert; but there is nothing to prevent a founder, if he desires to do so, from limiting the objects of his bounty to those of a particular religion, but in that case there must be some clear indication of such an intention. Here there is nothing to show that the charity is to be confined in that way. It is said that the charity is one for the benefit of members of the Established Church "as such." The will does not say in terms that the charity is to be in favour of members of the Church of England; but there are said to be three indications of such an intention—(1) the annuity is to be paid to the churchwardens; (2) it is to be paid to them upon a festival of the Church; and (3) a preference is to be shown in favour of those most constant in attending the services of the church. In my opinion none of these indications suffice to show that the benefit of the charity was intended to be confined to members of the Church of England. Malins, V.C., held that the fact that the master of a hospital was to be a clergyman did not cause the benefit to be confined to members of the Church of England. Directing payment on St. Thomas's Day, again, is merely equivalent to directing payment on the 21st of December. The preference given to those who attend church most regularly does not confine the gift to members of the Church of England, for the preference only comes in in cases of difficulty and when they can go to church.

As to the construction of section 14, I take that clause to mean that where the churchwardens as such are either alone or jointly with any other persons trustees of any parochial non-ecclesiastical charity, such number of persons not exceeding the number of churchwardens as the parish council may appoint are to be trustees in the place of the churchwardens.

In my opinion there is no question of the power of the parish council to appoint trustees in the place of the churchwardens, and I must dismiss the petition.

BRITISH NATURAL PREMIUM PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION (LIMITED) v. BYWATER. (a.)

Practice — Costs — Interlocutory proceedings — Costs reserved—New regulation.

Where interlocutory applications have been ordered to stand to the trial and are not then mentioned to the judge, the costs of such applications are to be treated as costs in the action, and taxed accordingly, and need not be mentioned in the judgment. Where such applications have been disposed of, but the costs have been reserved, such costs are not to be mentioned in the judgment nor allowed on taxation without the special direction of the judge.

Motion.

The defendants Bywater and Smallwood (who was a creditor of Bywater) in 1893 took out a policy of assurance upon the life of Bywater with the plaintiffs.

This policy was subsequently deposited by way of equitable security with the defendant Harris.

In January, 1896, the plaintiffs brought the above action to set aside the policy as obtained by misrepresentation.

On the 13th of July, 1896, Kekewich, J., made an order giving leave to the plaintiffs to deliver certain interrogatories to the defendants, and on the 29th of July, 1896, the same judge made an order allowing a further interrogatory to be added.

On the 2nd of November a third order was made for a further and better affidavit by Bywater as to two of the interrogatories.

The costs of all these orders were reserved.

The action came on for trial before Byrne, J., who, on the 14th of April, 1897, gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' costs were to be taxed, and, in effect, paid by the defendants. No mention was made at the trial of the reserved costs, nor in the judgment as passed and entered.

When the matter came before the taxing-master he disallowed these costs.

The plaintiffs now made the present application for a direction that the reserved costs should be paid by the defendants.

F. Dodd, for the motion, contended that the taxing-master should have taxed these costs as included in the judgment: Hodges v. Hodges, 25 W. R. 162; Fritz v. Hobson, 28 W. R. 722, 14 Ch. D. 542; Blakey v. Hall, 35 W. R. 592, ord. 28, r. 11.

Disney, Disturnal, and L. Rylands, for the respective defendants.

Aug. 6.—BYRNE, J.—[After directing the costs reserved should be borne by the defendants:] As regards the costs of the present application they must be paid by the plaintiffs. It is true that I find that the practice in the offices of the registrars has varied with regard to such reserved costs, but the plaintiffs cannot excuse themselves on this ground, as they neglected to ask the registrar to include them in the judgment in drawing it up, as was done in Hodges v. Hodges, and allowed the judgment to be passed and entered without mentioning them. [His lordship then continued:] The judges of the Chancery Division have for the guidance of the registrars and taxing masters given the following directions in reference to the costs of interlocutory applications. "Where interlocutory applications have been ordered to stand to the trial and are not then mentioned to the judge, the costs of such applications are to be treated as costs in the action, and taxed accordingly, and need not be mentioned in the judgment. Where such applications have been disposed of, but the costs have been reserved, such costs are not to be mentioned in the judgment or order, or allowed on taxation, without the special direction of the judge."

His lordship added: Speaking for myself I shall regard with much jealousy any application as to reserved costs made to me after the judgment has been passed and entered.

REG. v. BURROWS AND ANOTHER (JUSTICES).
Ex parte WILSON. (a.)

Justices—Summary jurisdiction—Procedure—Order to have child vaccinated—Costs of complainant—Distress—Imprisonment—"Civil debt"—Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 18; 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 6.

An order was made by justices, under the Vaccination Act, 1867, s. 31, ordering the parent of a child to have the child vaccinated within a certain time, and to pay 8*s.* 6*d. costs to the informant. The order further provided that the payment of the costs should be enforced by distress and imprisonment.*

Held, the justices had power under section 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, to order that the payment of the costs should be so enforced, and that such power was not affected by section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

Rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by the justices of Maidenhead.

Information was given to the justices under the Vaccination Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), s. 31, that the informant had reason to believe that the defendant's child had not been successfully vaccinated. The defendant was summoned to appear before the justices, who made an order that the child should be vaccinated within a specified time and that the costs of the informant to the amount of 8s. 6d, should be paid by the defendant to the informant. It was further ordered that the payment of the costs should be enforced by distress, and in default of distress, by imprisonment.

A rule nisi for a certiorari was granted to bring up and quash the order upon the ground that the justices had no power to order the payment of the costs to be enforced by distress and imprisonment.

The Vaccination Act, 1867, s. 31, provides: "If any registrar, or any officer appointed by the guardians to enforce the provisions of this Act, shall give information in writing to a justice of the peace that he has reason to believe that any child under the age of fourteen years, being within the union or parish for which the informant acts, has not been successfully vaccinated and that he has given notice to the parent . . . to procure its being vaccinated, and this notice has been disregarded, the justice may summon such parent . . . to appear with such child before him . . . and . . . may, if he see fit, make an order under his hand and seal directing such child to be vaccinated within a certain time. . . ." The section further provides that upon disobedience of the order the parent shall be proceeded against summarily and shall be liable to a penalty.

The costs were awarded by virtue of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 18, which was incorporated by the Vaccination Act, 1867. That section also provides as follows: "The same (meaning the costs) shall be recoverable in the same manner and under the same warrants as any penalty or sum of money adjudged to be paid in and by such conviction or order is to be recoverable; and in cases where there is no such penalty or sum to be thereby recovered, then such costs shall be recoverable by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the party and in default of such distress by imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding one calendar month unless such costs shall be sooner paid."

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 6, provides: "Where under any act, whether past or future, a sum of money claimed to be due is recoverable on complaint to a court of summary jurisdiction and not on information, such sum shall be deemed to be a civil debt, and if recovered before a court of summary jurisdiction shall be recovered in the manner in which a sum declared by this Act to be a civil debt recoverable summarily, is recoverable under this Act, and not otherwise; and the payment of any costs ordered to be paid by the complainant or defendant in the case of any such complaint shall be enforced in like manner as such civil debt, and not otherwise."

Macmorran, Q.C. (McCarthy with him), showed cause.—Under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, the justices have power to deal with three kinds of matters: (1) Offences, in which case the procedure is by information followed by conviction; (2) proceedings to recover money, the procedure being by complaint followed by an order; (3) applications for an order against the defendant ordering him to do something other than the payment of a sum of money—e.g., an order to give sureties. In this case also the procedure is by complaint followed by an order. Then comes the Act of 1879. It is suggested that the costs, power to order which is given by the Act of 1848, s. 18, are a "civil debt" within the meaning of section 6 of the Act of 1879. But section 6 only applies where there is a liquidated sum due—such as wages recoverable summarily under the Employers and Workmen Act. The words of the Act are: "A sum of money claimed to be due." These costs are neither a liquidated sum nor are they recoverable by complaint. The proceeding was by information. Therefore they are not a civil debt within the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 6, and the procedure under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, still applies: Reg. v. Paget, 30 W. R. 336, 8 Q. B. D. 151; Reg. v. Kerswill, 43 W. R. 59, [1895] 1 Q. B 1; East London Waterworks v. Charles, 42 W. R. 702, [1894] 2 Q. B. 730; Kennard v. Simmons, 50 L. T. Rep. 28.

Schultess Young, in support of the rule.—The power to order distress and imprisonment was intended to be confined to criminal matters. This proceeding is not a criminal matter. The order for vaccination is not, in the first place, a penal one. It is only after the order has been disobeyed that a penalty can be imposed. The costs ordered to be paid by the defendant are a civil debt within the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 6. They are a sum of money ascertained to be due when the order was made. [COLLINS, J.—Would not that argument equally apply in the case of a penalty?] It would. If the costs are not a civil debt within section 6, they are, at any rate, governed by section 47, which provides: "The provisions of this Act with respect to a sum adjudged to be paid by an order shall apply, so far as circumstances admit, to a sum in respect of which a court of summary jurisdiction can issue a warrant of distress without an information or complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, in like manner as if the said sum were a civil debt. . . ." Reg. v. Lord Mayor of London, Ex parte Boaler, 42 W. R. 159, [1893] 2 Q. B. 146; Allen v. Worthy, 21 L. T. Rep. 665, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 99. The procedure is not in the strict sense by information. The words of the Vaccination Act, 1867, s. 31, are "give information" to a justice, not "lay an information."

Macmorran, Q.C., in reply.—Section 47 applies to two classes of cases only—(1) where costs are awarded to the defendant against the informant or complainant on the dismissal of an information or complaint under section 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848; (2) where costs are awarded on an appeal from a conviction or order under section 27 of the same Act.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court was delivered by COLLINS, J. (LAWRANCE, J., concurring.)

COLLINS, J.—(After stating the facts and after reading section 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848.) It is clear that under the provisions of that section the justices had power to make the order for the payment of the costs, and that they could enforce the payment of the costs so ordered by distress and imprisonment. Unless, therefore, the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, took these costs out of the operation of section 18, the order is good. It is suggested that by reason of section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the remedy for the recovery of these costs under section 18 is no longer applicable [reads section 6]. I have a difficulty in understanding how it can be suggested that the costs are a "sum of money claimed to be due" "recoverable on complaint." No doubt the costs did eventually become a sum of money payable to the informant, but it was not a sum of money antecedently due. There is no distinction in principle between the costs and a penalty.

WOOD v. MAYOR OF WIDNES. (a.)

Local government — Public health — Powers of local authority — Reconstruction of privies — Adoption of particular system of water-closet — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 36.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 36, provides that a local authority may, by written notice, require the owner or occupier of a house to provide a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, as the case may require, and that, if the notice be not complied with, the local authority may do the work and recover the expenses.

A local authority passed a resolution that in all future cases of nuisances requiring the reconstruction of privies, a particular kind of water-closet system should be adopted.

Held, that there was no power to adopt a general rule in all cases, and that the resolution was invalid. The local authority were bound in each case, before issuing the notice, to take into consideration the particular requirements of the house in question.

Case stated by justices of Lancashire.

On the 12th of February, 1895, the respondents, who were the urban sanitary authority of the borough of Widnes, confirmed the following resolution of their health committee: "That in all future cases of nuisances requiring the reconstruction of privies and ashpits the local authority of this borough do as far as practicable order that such privies and ashpits be converted into the waste water-closet system, or into such other water-closet system as the local authority may from time to time approve, and that the highway committee be requested to take steps for the adoption of the first-named system generally throughout the borough."

In April, 1895, the borough surveyor and the inspector of nuisances reported to the respondents that upwards of 300 houses in the borough, including Nos. 52 to 68, Terrace-road, of which houses the appellant was the owner, were respectively without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and an ashpit furnished with proper doors and coverings.

On the 9th of April the respondents confirmed a resolution of the health committee "that the local authority do by written notice require the owner or occupier of each of the said houses . . . to provide a sufficient privy and ashpit furnished as aforesaid upon the waste water-closet system approved by the corporation."

A notice in the terms of this resolution was accordingly served upon the appellant, and the notice not having been complied with, the respondents did the work and declared the expenses incurred by them in so doing to be private improvement expenses under section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, payable by instalments.

The appellant having failed to pay £6 8s., the amount of the first instalment, the respondents laid a complaint before the justices, who made an order against the appellant for payment thereof, subject to this case.

The question for the court was whether the resolution confirmed on the 12th of February, 1895, was valid; or, if not, whether it invalidated the subsequent proceedings.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 36, provides that, "If a house within the district of a local authority appears to such authority by the report of their surveyor or inspector of nuisances to be without a water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and an ashpit furnished with proper doors and coverings, the local authority shall by written notice require the owner or occupier of the house . . . to provide a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy, and an ash-pit furnished as aforesaid, or either of them, as the case may require."

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Rycroft, for the appellant.—The local authority have no power to lay down, as they have done by the resolution of the 12th of February, a general rule prescribing that in every case a particular kind of water-closet shall be adopted. Under section 36 they can only insist upon the provision of "a sufficient water-closet," &c., "as the case may require." There was in this case no inquiry into the particular requirements of the case. The notice merely follows the resolution of the 12th of February, and the appellant was not bound to comply with it.

McCall, Q.C., and Bonsey, for the respondents.—The decision of the justices was right. The local authority have power to order what works shall be executed, and can require water-closets to be substituted for privies. It was so held in St. Luke's Vestry v. Lewis, 10 W. R. 249, 1 B. & S. 865, decided under section 81 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, which section is identical with section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875. That case was followed in Bogle v. Sherborne Local Board, 46 J. P. 675; Ex parte Whitchurch, 29 W. R. 507, 6 Q. B. D. 545. The proper remedy of the appellant, if he had any grievance, was to appeal to the Local Government Board under section 268. The justices' duty was ministerial only, and they had no power to consider any question as to the character of the work ordered: Hargreaves v. Taylor, 11 W. R. 562, 3 B. & S. 613. [RIDLEY, J.—Tinkler v. Wandsworth District Board of Works, 6 W. R. 390, 2 De G. & J. 261, is in the appellant's favour.] At the time that case was decided there was no appeal to the Local Government Board. Moreover in that case there was a finding of fact that the local authority had decided to substitute water-closets for privies in all cases. Whereas here the resolution of the 12th of February only applies to cases of privies which require reconstruction.

Russell, Q.C., in reply.—All that was decided in St. Luke's Vestry v. Lewis was that the local authority could order the conversion of an insufficient privy into a water-closet. That is not disputed, but there is no case which says that a particular kind of water-closet can be ordered.

LAWRANCE, J.—The first question asked by this case is whether the resolution of the health committee confirmed by the respondents on the 12th of February, 1895, is valid. If that resolution is answered in the appellant's favour it seems to me that the other questions become immaterial. By the resolution in question the respondents determined that in all future cases of nuisances requiring the reconstruction of privies a system known as the waste water-closet system should be adopted. The question as to the validity of that resolution turns on section 36 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which provides that if a house is without a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy the owner or occupier may be required by the local authority to provide a sufficient water-closet, earth-closet, or privy. It is contended for the appellant that by the resolution of the 12th of February the respondents have laid down a general rule requiring the adoption of a particular kind of water-closet in all cases without any regard being had to the particular requirements of each house. In my judgment the local authority are not entitled to do that. It is not disputed that they may in every case within the section require a water-closet to be substituted for a privy, but in my opinion the local authority have no power to insist upon a particular kind of water-closet being furnished. All that can be required of the owner or occupier of the house by the notice under section 36 is that he shall provide a "sufficient" water-closet.

I therefore come to the conclusion that the resolution of the 12th of February was invalid, and the appeal must be allowed.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the respondents have been enforcing one general rule over the whole of their district or whether they have exercised their discretion in each individual case. If they were enforcing a general rule, then in my opinion it was not competent for them to do so. The local authority are empowered to give notice to each person requiring him to provide a sufficient water-closet, and then it is for the local authority to say whether the water-closet which is provided is sufficient or not; but that is a very different thing from saying that in every case a particular kind of water-closet must be adopted. When the facts of this case are looked at it is impossible not to say that in this case the respondents have adopted a general rule for all cases.

The resolution of the 12th of February says that in all future cases of converting privies into water-closets the waste water-closet system shall be adopted. Then a report having been made as to the condition of upwards of 300 houses in the borough it is resolved that in every case the owner is to be served with a notice requiring him to provide a waste water-closet. I have come to the conclusion that, however desirable uniformity of system may be, that is not the intention of the Act.

I think that in this matter the local authority have exceeded their powers by adopting a general rule and requiring a particular kind of water-closet to be provided in every case.

Appeal allowed; order of justices quashed; leave to appeal.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) — May 31; July 3.

In re GORDON.
Ex parte NAVALCHAND. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Property of bankrupt—Money paid into court by defendant with denial of liability—Bankruptcy of defendant—Secured creditor—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 22, r. 6—Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 45.

Where the defendant in an action pays money into court with a denial of liability, and becomes bankrupt before the action can be tried, the plaintiff has a claim as a secured creditor upon the money paid into court to the extent to which the trustee in bankruptcy admits the claim in the action.

Motion by Navalchand, an Indian banker, that he may be declared entitled to two sums of money in court: the first being the sum of £48 5s. 11d., paid into court by the debtor Gordon prior to his bankruptcy in an action entitled Navalchand v. Gordon, in the Queen's Bench Division; the second being the sum of £110 10s., paid in to the credit of the same action by the applicant as security for costs.

The action of Navalchand v. Gordon was begun in February, 1896, to recover £118 19s. 2d., the amount, together with interest, of a dishonoured promissory note.

The defendant paid £48 5s. 11d. into court in respect of the claim in the action with a denial of liability. The applicant paid in £110 10s. as security for costs. The defendant presented his own petition on the 14th of December, 1896, and was adjudicated a bankrupt, the official receiver being his trustee.

Æneas Mackintosh, for the applicant.—The plaintiff has a claim as a secured creditor upon the money paid into court: Ex parte Banner, In re Keyworth, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 379, 22 W. R. Dig. 20; Levy v. Lovell, 27 W. R. 428, 11 Ch. D. 220; Ex parte Bouchard, In re Moojen, 28 W. R. 129, 12 Ch. D. 26. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—How can the money be paid out? No order can be made until after the determination of the action: Maple & Co. v. Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot, 35 W. R. 819, 19 Q. B. D. 463.]

Edward Clayton, for the official receiver.—This money was money of the bankrupt's at the commencement of the bankruptcy, and therefore passes to his trustee. Moreover, a creditor cannot have any security on money paid into court, it is not a mortgage, charge, or lien on the property of the debtor. Further, it is provided by ord. 22, r. 6, that money in court shall be subject to the order of the court or a judge; that means the court before which the action will be tried, and the Bankruptcy Court has no jurisdiction to disturb this money. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, gives me ample power to deal with the matter if you refuse to consent to my having jurisdiction.] I am willing to submit to the jurisdiction, but I contend that the plaintiff here can be in no better position than a person who has attached a debt: Butler v. Wearing, 17 Q. B. D. 182, 34 W. R. Dig. 17.

Æneas Mackintosh replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case the question is as to the right of the applicant to two sums of money paid into court before the date of the receiving order in an action against the bankrupt. The one is a sum of £48 5s. 11d., paid into court by the defendant with a plea denying liability. The other is a sum of £110 10s., paid into court by the plaintiff at the instance of the defendant as security for the defendant's costs of the action. The trustee has not been made, and declines to be made, a party to the action. He has not actually admitted the plaintiff's claim, but, as I understand, does not contest his right to prove for something. I have no jurisdiction, sitting in bankruptcy, to make an order for payment out of court of either of these sums, but both parties have requested me to decide the question of right, and will consent to the necessary order in the Queen's Bench Division to give effect to my decision.

As regards the sum of £110 10s. paid into court by the plaintiff as security for costs, I do not understand that it is seriously contended that he is not entitled to have that money paid out of court on admission of the proof, subject, of course, to deduction of costs if there be any in respect of which the defendant may, on interlocutory proceedings, have obtained orders for costs in any event.

As to the money paid into court with a denial of liability, I take it that the plaintiff, though out of time to accept in satisfaction the sum paid in with a denial, would apart from bankruptcy, be entitled to get an order to withdraw his reply, and to give notice accepting the money paid in as satisfaction. I see nothing in the bankruptcy proceedings to prevent his so doing; but if he does, he will not be entitled to prove for any balance of the debt. If, on the other hand, the plaintiff does not elect to take the money out of court in satisfaction, I think that his proper course is to tender a proof in bankruptcy for the full amount of his claim; then if the proof is admitted, or partially admitted—rejected I understand it will not be—the issue in the action will, in my opinion, have been disposed of, and an order may be made in the action in the Queen's Bench Division for the payment of the money out of court to the proper party, according to the result of the application to prove, under ord. 22, r. 6. It is quite true that in Maple v. Earl of Shrewsbury the Court of Appeal decided that no order could be made for payment of money out of court until the action had been tried or disposed of—that is, so long as the question of liability remains in any way undisposed of, but I think that in the case of an action for a mere money demand it has been disposed of and the liability determined, so soon as the proof has been dealt with in bankruptcy. The Court of Bankruptcy is the proper court to determine the liability in such a case, and I am clearly of opinion that if the proof is admitted, or to the extent to which it is admitted, the plaintiff is a secured creditor by reason of the payment into court. The money paid into court, even with a plea denying liability, has become subject to the plaintiff's claim by the act of the defendant, who thereby agrees that the sum paid shall remain in court subject to the condition of ord. 22, r. 6. It is not a question of execution at all, but of the effect of a conventional charge. It is in effect a conditional payment to the plaintiff; the money is to be the money of the plaintiff if he succeeds in establishing his title to it: Ex parte Bouchard, In re Moojen.

If the plaintiff's proof is admitted in full he can amend his proof immediately on the admission by deducting the amount of security which thereupon accrues to him by reason of his right to take the money out of court; or, if the proof is admitted for a less amount than the money in court, he can withdraw the proof and consent to an order that the balance shall be paid to the trustee.

Probate—Will—Revival of revoked will—Non-disclosure of revocation to solicitor—Codicil—Express "words of reference"—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 22.

In 1889 the testatrix made a will. In 1892 she obtained from the same solicitors a draft codicil, which she took away, as they believed, to execute it; but, instead of executing it, she, with the assistance of another person, executed a new will revoking the first. In 1893 she asked her solicitors to prepare another codicil, and they, thinking she had executed the first codicil, and in ignorance of the execution of the will of 1892, in drafting it described it as a second codicil to the will of 1889, and concluded it by confirming the said will and codicil. This codicil the testatrix duly executed.

The court, on motion to allow proof only of the will of 1892 and codicil of 1893, ordered proof of all three documents.

Motion on behalf of the executors for a grant of probate of a will dated the 14th of May, 1892, and a codicil dated the 7th of September, 1893, of Eliza Chilcott, who died on the 16th of January, 1897, and omitting a will of the 16th of July, 1889.

The testatrix made a will dated the 16th of July, 1889, which disposed of her property and appointed T. B. Mitchell and F. Spears executors.

Afterwards on the 14th of May, 1892, she made another will, by which she revoked her first will and then disposed of her property, and appointed the same executors as in the first will.

This second will was made under the following circumstances. She desired to make a codicil to her first will, and her solicitors, on her instructions, prepared a codicil, which they gave to her and she took away; but without her solicitors' knowledge, and with the assistance of another person she prepared and executed another will on the 14th of May, 1892; and the codicil was never executed.

On the 2nd of September, 1893, she executed a codicil. When she wished to execute it she went to her solicitors, who were ignorant of the execution of the will of the 14th of May, 1892, and thought she had executed the first codicil.

Under these circumstances they prepared a codicil which (inter alia) was in these terms: "This is a second codicil to the will of Eliza Chilcott, which bears date the 16th of July, 1889. . . . In all other respects I confirm my said will and the first codicil thereto."

Barnard, in support of the motion.—The will of 1889 was revoked, and is not revived by the codicil of 1893; by section 22 of the Wills Act it can only be set up again by "re-execution" or by "express words, &c., showing an intention to revive." There must be words in the codicil dealing with words in the will showing a clear intention to revive it: In the Goods of Steele (three cases), 17 W. R. 15, L. R. 1 P. & D. 575. In the cases In the Goods of Stedham, 29 W. R. 743, 6 P. D. 205, and In the Goods of Dyke, 6 P. D. 207, there were references to words in the previous will. In In the Goods of Ince, 25 W. R. 396, 2 P. D. 111, HANNEN, P., disregarded a reference by date, where shown to be wrong. The question is whether by the language of section 22 something more is not required than a simple reference to the will, which in this case is a mistake. I submit the mere reference to the will here is not enough. Consents of all the parties interested have been filed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 6.—BARNES, J.—In this case the question to be decided is what documents shall be admitted to probate. [The learned judge here set out the facts as above.] Application is made to me that the will of 1892 and codicil of 1893 should be admitted to probate without the will of 1889. The point taken by counsel is that the testatrix, in signing the codicil of 1893, made a mistake, owing to the ignorance of the solicitors that she had executed the will of 1892, and that she intended to confirm that will. But a difficulty is presented by the language of the codicil, which in express terms refers to the first will, and in express terms confirms that will, and in express terms confirms the first codicil thereto, and I have no doubt that the solicitor intended to carry that out when he prepared this codicil. Therefore this case comes within the authority of the cases dealt with by Sir James Hannen, in In the Goods of Stedham and In the Goods of Dyke, and not within the case of In the Goods of Steele, cited by Mr. Barnard. In In the Goods of Stedham, Sir James Hannen in his judgment says: "The solicitor who was instructed to prepare this codicil, instead of making a codicil to the will of 1878, made a codicil to the will of the 21st of May, 1877, and I was asked to treat it as a mere mistake as to the date, and to allow probate of the codicil, together with the last will of 1878. I am unable to do so for this reason, that it was not a mere mistake as to the date of the will to which it was intended to append the codicil, but the mind of the solicitor, which must be treated as that of the testator, was actually applied to the provisions of the will of 1877," and so on. In this case there is no doubt that the solicitor, who only knew of the first will and believed that the testatrix had executed the first codicil, applied his mind to the first will and first codicil, and then drew the codicil of the 7th of September, 1893, which was duly executed, and which in express terms relates to the first will and first codicil; and I must deal with the documents as they stand. There is no doubt that they do not express the real intention of the testatrix, but I find nothing in the codicil indicating that intention. This seems to me a case where the same course must be adopted, as in the case before Sir James Hannen. All three documents must be admitted to probate, leaving it to a court of construction afterwards to construe them if necessary.

Terms of motion refused, and probate of all three documents ordered.

PENTON v. BARNETT. (a.)

Landlord and tenant — Ejectment — Forfeiture — Continuing breach of covenant—Claim for rent—Waiver of forfeiture—Notice—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14.

The defendant was tenant to the plaintiff under a lease containing a general covenant to repair and also a covenant to repair upon notice. The premises having become out of repair, the plaintiff, on the 22nd of September, 1896, gave notice to the defendant under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, requiring him within three months to execute the repairs therein specified. The notice not being complied with, the plaintiff, on the 14*th of January*, 1897, commenced an action, in which he claimed possession of the premises and rent to the 25*th of December*, 1896. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff, by claiming rent in the action, had waived the forfeiture, and was not entitled to recover possession.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover possession, for (1) the breach being a continuing breach, he could rely on the breaches between the 25*th of December and the* 14*th of January; and* (2) the premises being in the same state of disrepair at the commencement of the action as at the giving of the notice, the notice was sufficient.

Appeal from the judgment of Ridley, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

This was an action of ejectment brought by a landlord against a tenant. The premises were leased in 1873 by the plaintiff's predecessor in title to the defendant's predecessor in title for a term of years. By the lease the lessee covenanted that he would keep and preserve the premises in good and substantial repair and condition, and that during the term he would well and substantially repair and maintain the premises with all manner of needful and necessary reparations when and where and as often as need or occasion should require. He also covenanted that he would well and sufficiently repair the premises within three months after notice from the lessor so to do. The lease provided that if the lessee did not observe and keep all the covenants and conditions to be on his part performed and fulfilled, it should be lawful for the lessor to re-enter upon the premises. The defendant failed to repair and maintain the premises in accordance with the above covenants, and on the 22nd of September, 1896, the plaintiff gave the defendant notice, under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, requiring him within three months to execute the repairs specified in the schedule thereto, and to make compensation by payment to the plaintiff of the sum of £20.

The defendant failed to comply with the requirements of the said notice.

The plaintiff commenced this action on the 14th of January, 1897, and by his statement of claim he claimed (1) possession of the premises; (2) a quarter's rent for the quarter ending the 25th of December, 1896; (3) mesne profits from the 25th of December until judgment.

The defence was, that the plaintiff, by bringing this action to recover rent which accrued due after the alleged causes of forfeiture, had waived the alleged forfeiture, and was not entitled to recover possession of the premises.

At the trial Ridley, J., following the case of Bevan v. Barnett, 13 Times L. R. 310, gave judgment for the defendant on the claim for possession.

The plaintiff appealed.

R. Wallace, Q.C., and J. D. Crawford, for the plaintiff.—This is a case of a continuing breach, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover in ejectment on the ground of the breaches between the 25th of December and the 14th of January: Hartshorne v. Watson, 4 Bing. N. C. 178; Fryett ex dem, Harris v. Jeffreys, 1 Esp. 393; Jones v. Carter, 15 M. & W. 718.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., and Poulter, for the defendant.—The case of Dendy v. Nicholl, 6 W. R. 502, 4 C. B. N. S. 376, which was followed in Bevan v. Barnett, shows that the plaintiff, having elected to treat the defendant as his tenant up to the 25th of December, cannot maintain an action for ejectment for a breach committed before that date. Secondly, if the plaintiff can distinguish between the breaches before that date and the subsequent breaches, the defendant has received no notice under the Conveyancing Act with respect to the subsequent breaches.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. A lease was granted in 1873 containing a general covenant by the lessee to repair, and also a covenant to repair on notice. In 1896 the premises were out of repair, and on the 22nd of September the landlord gave the tenant notice, under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, to execute certain repairs therein specified within three months, and to make compensation by payment of the sum of £20. On the 14th of January, 1897, more than three months having elapsed—and it must be admitted that that was a reasonable notice—the landlord issued the writ in this action. By his statement of claim he claims the right to re-enter and eject the defendant, and he also claims rent to the 25th of December.

It is conceded that the notice under the Conveyancing Act was never complied with, and at the date of the writ the premises must have been in the same state of disrepair as they were in at the time when the notice was given. It is said that an action of ejectment is not maintainable, because by claiming rent up to the 25th of December the landlord has affirmed the tenancy up to that date, and therefore cannot now insist on a forfeiture for a breach committed before that date. It seems to be well settled law that a landlord by bringing an action of ejectment thereby declares an intention to treat the defendant as a trespasser, and on the other hand by bringing an action for rent declares an intention to treat the defendant as his tenant. But it is pointed out by the plaintiff that when he brought his action on the 14th of January he at the utmost only evinced an intention to treat the defendant as his tenant up to the 25th of December, and that he was entitled to maintain ejectment for the breach which continued between the 25th of December and the 14th of January. This appears to me to be unanswerable, and apart from the Conveyancing Act I should think that the plaintiff was clearly entitled to judgment.

But the defendant says we must take into consideration section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, which enacts that before an action of ejectment can be brought notice of the particular breaches complained of must be given to the lessee, so that he may have an opportunity of remedying them within a reasonable time. The defendant says that he has not received any notice of the breaches between the 25th of December and the 14th of January. But the breaches between those dates were the same as those specified in the notice, and in my opinion the notice is one which satisfies the statute. With regard to the case of Bevan v. Barnett, which the learned judge seems to have followed, I will only say that it is not clear to me what the facts of that case were. I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The lease contains two covenants as to repairs. One is a general covenant to repair when and where and as often as need or occasion should require. The other is a covenant to repair within three months after notice. And there is a power of re-entry on breach of either covenant. Independently of the Conveyancing Act the landlord had a right to bring an action of ejectment directly the premises were out of repair. But he was not bound to determine the tenancy at any particular time while a breach was continuing. He did not in fact determine the tenancy till he issued the writ on the 14th of January, and when he did so he had a right to sue in respect of anything that had occurred during the tenancy.

But the Conveyancing Act says that a right of re-entry for breach of covenant shall not be enforceable by action unless the lessor serves on the lessee a notice specifying the particular breach complained of. It seems to me that the notice which was given in this case clearly referred to the covenant to repair as and when occasion required, and I think that the terms of the Conveyancing Act have been complied with.

COLLINS, L.J.—I also am of the same opinion. I say nothing as to what would have been the rights of the parties if this had not been the case of a continuing breach. It is not denied that it is a continuing breach, and but for section 14 of the Conveyancing Act I do not see that there could have been any answer to the plaintiff's case. But the defendant says that the breach in respect of which the ejectment is brought is not the breach in respect of which the notice was given. I think that the intention of the section is to secure that the tenant should know what he has to do, what is the physical condition of the premises which he is required to remedy. The word "breach" is used to indicate the thing which is left undone, not the obligation on the tenant which accrues from time to time. In this sense the defendant has received notice of the particular breach now complained of, and the requirements of the Conveyancing Act have been complied with. In the case of Bevan v. Barnett the point which has been raised here seems not to have been taken.

Appeal allowed.

JAY AND ANOTHER v. BUDD. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Substituted service—Defendant out of jurisdiction—Ord. 9, r. 2.

A person who was in England at the time when a writ for service within the jurisdiction was issued against him went out of the jurisdiction before the writ was served upon him, but not in order to evade service.

Held, by Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Collins, L.J.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that an order for substituted service of the writ could be made.

Appeal from the refusal by a judge at chambers to order substituted service of the writ in the action.

The writ for service within the jurisdiction was issued against the defendant, a British subject, to recover a sum of money.

It appeared from the affidavits filed on behalf of the plaintiffs that on the afternoon of the 5th of October, 1897, the defendant, in answer to a letter from the plaintiffs asking for payment of their claim, had an interview with one of the plaintiffs at their office in the City of London, when the latter informed the defendant that he had heard that the defendant was leaving England for Jamaica and that his firm would require payment of their account.

The defendant thereupon offered to discharge the account by giving a cheque post-dated six months, but this the plaintiff refused, stating that his firm would in all probability accept the defendant's bills at three months' and six months' date, whereupon the defendant left the office without making any arrangement for payment.

The plaintiffs thereupon communicated with their solicitors, and on the following day, the 6th of October, the writ in the action was issued. On the same day a clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitors, being instructed to do so by telegraph, served a copy of the writ upon the defendant on board the steamship Don at Southampton Docks, when a gentleman, who was present, and who stated that he was the defendant's solicitor, asked the clerk to produce the original writ, but the clerk said that he was unable to do this as the writ was only issued in London that morning.

The defendant's solicitor thereupon said that the service was not complete without it.

The clerk then asked the solicitor if he would accept service for the defendant, but he stated that he would not.

The defendant sailed the same day in the steamship Don for Jamaica, and the plaintiffs did not know of any address in Jamaica where he could be found or communicated with, nor did they know when he would return to England.

It was stated in a letter from the defendant's solicitor to the plaintiffs' solicitors that the defendant before leaving England had delegated all matters of business to his manager in London.

It was not suggested that the defendant had left England in order to evade service of the writ.

The plaintiffs thereupon applied ex parte for an order for substituted service of the writ, which the judge refused.

The plaintiffs thereupon applied ex parte to the Court of Appeal.

Macaskie, for the plaintiffs.—This is a writ for service within the jurisdiction, and it was issued before the defendant left England. The writ was capable of being personally served upon the defendant before he left England, and therefore an order for substituted service can now be made. In Fry v. Moore, 37 W. R. 565, 23 Q. B. D. 395, and Wilding v. Bean, 39 W. R. 40, [1891] 1 Q. B. 100, the defendant was out of the jurisdiction when the writ was issued, and therefore the writ could never have been personally served. In De Bernales v. Bennett, 10 Times L. R. 419, a doubt was expressed whether an order for substituted service could be made in the case of a writ for service out of the jurisdiction. But this is a writ for service within the jurisdiction, and that doubt is not applicable.

He also referred to Adler v. Benjamin, 1 Times L. R. 308.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I regret that we are not unanimous as to the true meaning of the rule. As my brother Rigby is not able to concur in the decision at which we have arrived, I think it right to express as distinctly as I can my view of the rule. The old practice, where personal service could not be effected, was attended with expense and inconvenience, and the rules made under the Judicature Acts were intended to abolish the expense and difficulty which stood in the way of honest litigants bringing reluctant opponents into court. The great object of all such provisions is on the one hand to enable a person who has a claim against another to bring his claim into court, and on the other to enable the person against whom the claim is made to bring before the court anything which he has to say in answer to it. These two rights have been jealously guarded. It may usually be the case that the person against whom the claim is made knows all about the litigation. But whether he knows it or not it has been provided that he must be properly summoned before the court.

By ord. 9, r. 2, "if it be made to appear to the court or a judge that the plaintiff is from any cause unable to effect prompt personal service, the court or judge may make such order for substituted or other service . . . as may seem just." Those are the words which we have to construe. The words "from any cause" are very general. I cannot import into those words an exception in the case of a person leaving the country upon hearing that litigation has been commenced against him. The simple question is, whether prompt personal service cannot be effected. If that is so, substituted service can be ordered. But the rule does not stop there, because it provides that the court or a judge may make such order as is just in the circumstances of the case. The court, therefore, would not order substituted service unless it were satisfied that the requirements of justice demanded it. It seems to me that every element exists in this case to entitle the court to act under that rule. The debtor and creditor know each other well. The debtor has practically admitted that he owes the debt, and he has offered to pay it in a particular way. He received a copy of the writ which had been issued, and he left the country without giving any information as to his movements and leaving no address, knowing that he would thereby, in fact, evade—I do not suggest that he intended to evade—service of the writ, and the plaintiffs have no knowledge where he is to be found. In these circumstances every element which is contemplated by the rule exist, and in my opinion an order should be made for substituted service. That is my view of the case, and I should regret if I were compelled to put a narrow construction upon the rule. I should suggest that the service should be upon the solicitor who acts for the defendant and upon the gentlemen to whom he has entrusted the management of his business affairs during his absence, and that the defendant should have two months for entering an appearance.

RIGBY, L.J.—I regret very much that a question of such importance as this should have to be determined upon the evidence and arguments of one side alone. It seems to me important to observe that, as far as I know, since the Judicature Acts there has been no case in which substituted service has been ordered in the case of a person who is at the time out of the jurisdiction. I should suppose that there must have been some such cases in which an order for substituted service might have been applied for. But from the authorities which have been referred to I do not think that the judges would have ordered substituted service unless the defendant had left England to evade service of the writ. The defendant did not leave England to evade service. The facts here are that the debtor was going abroad, and the plaintiffs then asked him for payment of the debt. The debtor offered to pay by a post-dated cheque, but the plaintiffs refused this. The plaintiffs thereupon, knowing that the debtor was going abroad, at some time on the 6th of October issued the writ, and the plaintiffs' solicitors by telegraph on the same day instructed their clerk at Southampton to serve a copy of the writ on the defendant. A copy of the writ was served upon him on board the steamer, whereupon the defendant's solicitor, who was present, asked to see the original writ, but this could not be produced. The affidavits before us do not specify precisely the time when the writ was issued. The ship then sailed. What is the court to do when an application for an order for substituted service is made at a time when personal service cannot be legally effected? It seems to me that Wilding v. Bean and other cases in this court lay this down, that substituted service cannot be ordered when the defendant cannot, at the time, as it seems to me, of the application being made, be personally served. If in any case there can be personal service, then the court may order substituted service if it thinks it proper to do so. It is clear that the defendant in this case could not have been served with this writ at the time when the application for an order for substituted service was made. In my opinion, though I express it with diffidence owing to the views of the other members of the court, this is not a case for an order for substituted service.

COLLINS, L.J.—I think that this appeal should be allowed. I do not see that any technical rule of law debars us from doing justice in this case. The writ was issued before the defendant left the country, and notice of it was given to him. An attempt was made to serve him with it, and the service was disputed by his solicitor, who insisted upon the original writ being produced. The clerk who served the copy was unable to do this. The service would have been effectual if the original writ had not been required to be produced. Upon these facts is there any decision which debars us from making an order for substituted service? I think not. There are two classes of writs—one for service within the jurisdiction, and the other for service out of the jurisdiction. This is a writ for service within the jurisdiction, and we are unfettered by the law as to writs for service out of the jurisdiction. If the defendant had not had his solicitor beside him when the copy was served, service within the jurisdiction would have been effected. Is it made to appear to the court that the plaintiff is "from any cause unable to effect prompt personal service"? In my opinion it is. The case, therefore, falls within the terms of ord. 9, r. 2. Next, is there any decision which debars us from giving effect to the words of the rule? In my opinion there is not. It is idle to cite cases as to writs for service out of the jurisdiction. I agree that if the writ had been issued after the defendant had left the country, the only mode of reaching him would be by means of a writ for service out of the jurisdiction. It was so held in Wilding v. Bean, unless indeed the plaintiff could show that the defendant left the country to evade service of the writ. Fry v. Moore was to the same effect. In my opinion there is no reason why we should not give effect to the words of the rule. The order should therefore be made.

Appeal allowed.

REG. (ON THE PROSECUTION OF THE REV. DAVID EVANS) v. BISHOP OF DURHAM. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law—Clergy—Offence against morality—Deprivation — Subsequent sentence of deposition—Clergy Discipline Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 32), s. 8.

Where a clergyman is convicted of an offence specified in the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, and the bishop of the diocese passes sentence of deprivation, the bishop may, under section 8 of the Act, on a subsequent occasion pass the further sentence of deposition from holy orders.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi for a prohibition to the Bishop of Durham to restrain him from deposing the applicant, the Rev. David Evans, from holy orders.

On the 29th and 30th of May, 1896, the applicant, who was a clerk in holy orders holding preferment in the diocese of Durham, was tried under the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892, in the Consistory Court of the diocese upon certain charges of immorality. The Chancellor of the diocese presided in the court, and notified to the bishop that the court found the applicant guilty and that he should be deprived of his preferment. An application to the Privy Council for leave to appeal having been refused, the bishop, on the 6th of August, 1896, acting under order 31 of the rules made in pursuance of section 9 of the Act, pronounced sentence of deprivation. On the 17th of December, 1896, the bishop notified his intention to depose the applicant from holy orders,* and the applicant thereupon obtained a rule nisi for a prohibition as above, which the Divisional Court discharged.

The applicant appealed.

Sir W. Phillimore and Yelverton (W. T. Lawrance with them), for the applicant.—The bishop has no jurisdiction now to pass a sentence of deposition. He could have done so at the same time as he passed sentence of deprivation, or he might have adjourned the court for the purpose of considering whether he would pass sentence of deposition. He cannot upon a subsequent and independent occasion pass a further sentence of deposition. The words of section 8, "where the preferment of a clergyman becomes vacant," refer to the time when the preferment becomes vacant—that is, when the sentence of deprivation is pronounced, and shows that the sentence of deposition must be pronounced at the same court. It would be contrary to natural justice to allow the bishop to hold the sentence over the head of a clergyman for years, when perhaps the clergyman might have obtained a new preferment.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Errington, for the bishop, were not called upon.

* Section 8 of 55 & 56 Vict. c. 32.—"Where by virtue of this Act, or of any sentence passed in pursuance of this Act, the preferment of a clergyman becomes vacant, and it appears to the bishop of the diocese that such clergyman ought also to be deposed from holy orders, the bishop may by sentence, and without any further formality, depose him, and the sentence of deposition shall be recorded in the registry of the diocese; provided always that such clergyman may appeal against the said sentence within one month from the date thereof to the archbishop of the province, whose decision shall be final."

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The Consistory Court had to inquire into the truth of the charges against this clergyman, and the Chancellor of the diocese presided in that court. Those charges were found to be proved. The rules made under the Act specify the procedure that is to be adopted in such circumstances. The Chancellor notified to the bishop that the clergyman had been found guilty, and that the sentence should be deprivation. The bishop then in the Consistory Court pronounced the sentence of deprivation. It was not suggested that that act of the bishop was not in all respects legal and regular. It was argued, however, that that sentence must be taken as the final sentence, not only with regard to the question of deprivation, but also with regard to the question of deposition, and that, therefore, the sentence of deposition could not be passed afterwards, unless indeed the bishop adjourned the court for the purpose of considering the question of deposition. I cannot see any colour for that argument. The question of deposition was not and could not be before the Consistory Court. That court had nothing to say to it. Section 8 does not say that the sentence of deposition is to be part of the original sentence. It says, in almost plain terms, that the sentence of deposition may be a new sentence. The words "ought also to be deposed from holy orders" seem to show that the sentence of deposition may be something in addition to and beyond the sentence of deprivation. The contention must go this length, that the bishop cannot, after the court has been closed, retire to his library and there consider, even for half-an-hour the question of deposition. The question of deposition is quite apart from the trial in the Consistory Court. It is then said that it is contrary to natural justice to keep the question of deposition in abeyance for some months. I cannot see that it is. For the good of the church and of the parishioners it may be right that a clergyman who is guilty of offences aimed at by the Act of 1892 should be deposed from holy orders, even after the expiration of some months. But even if it could be said to be contrary to natural justice, the Act of Parliament is clear in its terms, and we must give effect to it. The bishop in exercising this power exercises a discretionary jurisdiction, and there is no limit of time specified in the Act within which he must exercise his discretion. Even if the bishop is subject to prohibition, as to which I express no opinion, there is nothing to show that he exceeded his jurisdiction. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The bishop did not come into the matter until after the sentence of deprivation had been pronounced. The act of the bishop in pronouncing sentence of deprivation was a merely ministerial act. After that the jurisdiction of the bishop comes in. It was said that the bishop had no jurisdiction to pass any further sentence, and even if he had, he was too late in passing sentence in December, 1896. It seems to me clear that the appellant is wrong upon both points. The sentence of deprivation is entirely different from that of deposition. The argument that the sentence of deprivation finishes up the whole matter is untenable. When the sentence of deprivation is passed the jurisdiction of the bishop arises, and there is no limitation of time in the Act within which the bishop must exercise his jurisdiction. It is said that this construction of the Act is contrary to natural justice. The Legislature may well have entrusted this power to the bishop, with an appeal to the archbishop. I desire merely to throw this out, that I am not at all sure that the bishop is a court to which prohibition will go. I do not, however, found my judgment upon this ground. I found my judgment upon the ground given above.

Therefore, where a subsidiary agreement only was filed, which recited merely that by another specified agreement, "for the considerations therein mentioned," it was agreed that certain shares should be allotted as fully paid up,

Held, that such registration was insufficient to protect the allottees.

Summons.

Pyke and Gibson held 163 shares of £10 each in the company.

The liquidator sought to make them liable to pay the full call of £10 a share on these.

Pyke and Gibson on the other hand claimed that these shares were issued as fully paid up, and that they were protected by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

In 1892 the Karaskhoma Syndicate being in need of money entered into an arrangement with the Concessions Development Co. that the latter should take up debenture bonds and so lend money to the syndicate.

Accordingly, on the 17th of August, 1892, the syndicate entered into an agreement with the company embodying the above arrangement, and containing clauses whereby the syndicate bound itself against incurring further liabilities and in other ways.

Clause 8 of the agreement was as follows: "By way of further remuneration to the company for the work it will do in connection with the management of the affairs of the syndicate, the syndicate agrees to allot to the company 163 preference shares, being the balance of its unissued capital, as fully paid, such allotment to be protected by a duly registered agreement under the 25th section of the Companies Act, 1867."

A contract was accordingly filed, dated the 31st of August, 1892, and made between the syndicate and the company. It recited that by an agreement dated the 17th of August, 1892, between the same parties "it was agreed for the considerations therein mentioned that the syndicate should allot to the company 163 fully paid-up £10 preference shares of the syndicate, being the balance of the syndicates' un-issued capital, such allotment to be protected by a duly registered agreement under the 25th section of the Companies Act, 1867, being this present agreement."

These 163 shares were allotted to Pyke and Gibson as nominees of the company.

The syndicate was now being wound up, and the liquidator sought to make them liable to pay the full amount of £10 per share on these shares.

The case was argued before Vaughan Williams, J., on the 7th and 8th of April.

May 27.—Vaughan Williams, J.—The question I have to decide is whether there has been such a filing of a contract as to comply with section 25 of the Act of 1867, which is as follows: "Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing, and filed with the registrar of Joint-Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares." It is common ground that a contract has been filed, but it is said the contract which has been filed is not a sufficient contract to satisfy the terms of the section. This is one of the cases where there is a principal contract, one term of which is that fully-paid shares shall be issued, and then a sub-contract is entered into, and that sub-contract is the one which is filed. I will presently inquire how far this sub-contract is a contract within the meaning of section 25 so as to protect the shareholders from liability to pay for the shares in cash. Before doing so, I have to deal with the more substantial question raised.

It is said that even if the contract be a sufficient one for filing, the filing will not assist, because there was in truth and in fact no consideration, and the shares were only bonus shares or a present. It is settled that in such a case section 25 will not avail to protect the shareholders from liability. I do not propose to go at any length into the authorities on this point, the leading case on the subject is In re Eddystone Marine Insurance Co., 41 W. R. 642, [1893] 3 Ch. 9; but here, in my opinion, it is not true in substance and in fact to say that these shares were a present and that no consideration was given for them. The syndicate entered into an agreement with the Concessions Development Co. on the 17th of August, 1892. The syndicate wished to raise money and entered into a bargain with the company that the latter should take up debenture bonds and should pay money on the debentures or lend it to the syndicate. The amount was a matter to be ultimately settled between the parties, £10,000 being the limit and £3,000 the amount to be immediately raised. The agreement contains many unusual, but very proper, provisions to protect the company. The syndicate binds itself with regard to incurring further liabilities and also as to the execution of charges, and in many ways it accepts such a position that the company would have the opportunity of supervising the business of the syndicate and so incur expense in that supervision. That being the mode in which the money was to be raised and lent, clause 8 provides as follows: "By way of further remuneration to the company for the work it will do in connection with the management of the affairs of the syndicate, the syndicate agrees to allot to the company 163 preference shares, being the balance of its unissued capital, as fully paid, such allotment to be protected by a duly registered agreement under the 25th section of the Companies Act, 1867." In my judgment it is impossible to say that shares issued under that clause are bonus shares, or shares issued without valuable consideration. I come to the conclusion on the evidence that the transaction was honest and that there was nothing in it which the parties to it wished to conceal.

But the objection is taken that the contract which has been filed is not a sufficient contract or that the filing of it is not sufficient to satisfy the section. The contract which has been filed is dated the 31st of August, 1892. It is made between the syndicate and the company, and recites that by an agreement of the 17th of August, 1892, between the same parties, "it was agreed for the considerations therein mentioned that the syndicate should allot to the company 163 fully-paid up £10 preference shares of the syndicate, being the balance of the syndicate's unissued capital, such allotment to be protected by a duly registered agreement under the 25th section of the Companies Act, 1867, being this present agreement." It also recites that the previous agreement has been adopted by the company; and it witnesses that it is agreed that the syndicate shall procure this agreement to be filed and shall allot to the company or its nominees 163 preference shares in the syndicate which shall be deemed to be fully-paid up, and which shall be numbered in the books as therein mentioned, 129 of the shares carrying no voting power and the remaining 34 shares having voting power. That is the only contract which has been filed. It is said not to be sufficient, but that the real contract was that of the 17th of August; that that contract ought to have been filed; and that even if the document of the 31st of August was the contract to be filed the consideration ought to have been specifically stated. Now, all this argument is very well set out in Mr. Palmer's book on Company Precedents, 6th ed., vol. 1, p. 133, and the learned author provides a precedent in form 25 and in his note to the form. Now, when the case was argued before me Mr. Buckley mainly argued the question whether the shares were issued for a valuable consideration, or were bonus shares. I have already dealt with that part of the case. Mr. Jenkins, in addition, argued that the document of the 31st of August was really a new contract with new consideration and that it was, therefore, the proper document to file, for it set out the date and the parties and the consideration. But it seems to me that all these matters had been arrived at in the original contract, and I am not disposed to hold that this second contract, the one filed, was a new one. At the same time there are considerations here which make me think that the filing of the sub-contract was sufficient.

The question is whether, within the words of the section, it is "otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed." What one expects to be filed is the contract of partnership or membership, and clause 8 of the earlier agreement is not a contract which would have justified the syndicate in putting the company on the register as a shareholder; it is only a clause which enables the company to call on the syndicate to allot the shares. It seems to me that the second contract—quite apart from the question of protection under section 25—was a contract which it was right and necessary to enter into, and the earlier contract contemplated that such a further contract should be entered into. If that is so, the only question is whether the second contract sufficiently sets out the material provisions of the arrangement. If the second contract is the right one to be filed I do not think the observations of Mr. Palmer apply. I have nothing to do with the principal contract as such. Is the contract of the 31st of August sufficient within section 25? It is necessary to state the names of the parties and the number of shares—I am not referring to the denoting numbers—and the consideration must be identified, for that is part of the contract. The only question here is whether this contract, which does identify the parties to it and the shares affected, sufficiently identifies the consideration. On the whole I think it does as sufficiently as if it had recited the actual consideration of the principal contract. I do not understand that anyone argued, nor does Mr. Palmer say, that it is necessary to file the principal contract. In my judgment it is sufficient, if you need not place the principal contract on the file, if you sufficiently identify the consideration in the document filed; and you do not really identify the consideration more fully by setting out the words of the principal contract than you do by identifying the principal contract. In either case you might either recite a false consideration or there might be no original contract in existence; and I think so the more because the contract to take shares is a collateral contract, the consideration for which is the entering into the principal contract, not the performance of the services mentioned in that contract.

Without laying down a general rule, I hold that in this case the statute has been complied with. The application therefore fails.

From this decision the liquidator appealed.

Eve, Q.C., and W. F. Hamilton, for the liquidator.—The filed contract is not a sufficient compliance with section 25, and even if it was sufficient there was in fact no consideration for the agreement. This agreement is insufficient because it does not show the consideration. "Unless the same" in section 25 means "unless the terms." [LINDLEY, L.J.—Is not that controlled by the words "unless the same is otherwise determined"?]

They cited Crickner's case, 24 W. R. 219, L. R. 10 Ch. 614; In re Almada and Tirito Co., 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415; Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125; Fothergill's case, 21 W. R. 301, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 270; and referred to Palmer's Company Precedents, 6th ed., vol. 1, pp. 133, 173.

Buckley, Q.C., and Napier, for Pyke.—The registered agreement shows what the consideration in substance was; the section does not require you to expressly disclose the details.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Ward Coldridge, for Gibson.

Eve, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by the appeal in this case is one of very considerable importance, not only to Messrs. Pyke and Gibson, but also to all those persons who take fully paid-up shares in a company upon the faith that they are protected by registered contracts. The question turns on the 25th section of the Companies Act of 1867. [His lordship read the section.] Now, without criticizing the somewhat awkward expression there, "unless the same," and finding out exactly what it means, that section requires that if the shares issued are not to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, there must be a contract duly made in writing, and that contract must be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares. That is the plain language of the Act without adding a word to it.

What we have to consider is whether the document which was registered in this case for the purpose of protecting these shares, the document dated the 31st of August, 1892, was a "contract in writing," and whether there was a contract in writing filed with the registrar. Now, what is meant by "a contract in writing"? I take it that nothing answers that description—I do not care whether it is a deed or a simple contract—which does not show the consideration in writing. And if you have a document in writing which does not show in writing what is the consideration, there is no contract at all in writing. In other words, a document which only discloses part of the contract is not a contract in writing at all. Now, in this particular case, the document in writing which was registered referred to another document, also in writing, for the consideration. I will read the language. The recital shows that the consideration for what I will call the contract of the 31st of August, 1892, was the consideration mentioned in an agreement dated the 17th of August, 1892. If you put these two documents together you do get a contract, because in the two the consideration does appear. Now we come to the question, Is there registered a contract in writing? Upon the best consideration I can give to that question it appears to me that there is not. What is registered is a document which is not a contract, but which is part of a contract; it does not state in the registered document what the consideration is. It appears to me that, without forcing the language of the section at all, you have not got in the registered document a contract, but only part of a contract, the other part not being registered. That appears to me, I confess, to be the true view of this section, and the true view of its application to the document in question.

That being the case, it is unnecessary to consider the other point which has been discussed, whether the contract of the 31st of August, 1892, disclosed a sufficient consideration or not. I will assume that it did. If the two had been registered, I should say myself that there would have been no difficulty about the case. But, when you have only got a document registered which is not a contract but only part of a contract, in my opinion the statute has not been complied with. If the registered document had disclosed the consideration, so that the register showed it, that would do, in my judgment. But the registered document must be a contract in writing, and the thing registered must disclose the consideration, whether it is a deed or a simple contract.

Then, as regards the authorities, it is quite obvious that this construction gives full effect to the object of this section as stated in all the cases that have been referred to, more particularly in the Ooregum case. Lord Watson and Lord Herschell and the other learned lords all point out what the object of the section is. The object of the section would be entirely defeated if we were to assent to the contention of the respondents in this case; because it is quite obvious that you would not get the object, as explained by those learned lords, carried out at all. But then the answer to that might be, that the language of the section does not say anything about the object. Therefore it is that I lay stress on the language, without altering a word of it, and say that this is not a registered contract at all. Now it follows from that that these two gentlemen must be put on the list of contributories. But Mr. Eve asked for some declaration that they were jointly and severally liable for these calls. That does not appear to me at present to be right; and if he insists upon it, we must hear him further about it. It may be that the articles say that the joint holders of shares shall be jointly and severally liable for the calls if the calls are made under the articles. But the liquidator makes the calls under the Companies Act, 1862, and I am not aware that the articles say, or that there is any authority for saying, that where shares stand in two persons' names they are jointly and severally liable for calls. But, if that point becomes important, we will hear counsel after the other lords justices have given their judgment. I say nothing as to the particularity of the consideration; that is not before us. The respondents must pay the costs both here and in the court below.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. And I think I may venture to say that I have entertained this opinion somewhat strongly throughout the case. There were two points taken before the learned judge in the court below. Perhaps it is scarcely necessary to notice the first point, which was that the shares were bonus shares, that there was no consideration for them, and that they were a present. The learned judge has arrived at the same conclusion at which I arrive with regard to that agreement. In my judgment it would be difficult to say that the shares were issued without consideration, or that they were bonus shares, or were a present. Though it may not be necessary for the purposes of this case to say it, I am of opinion that there was good and valid consideration for them. I think if the agreement of the 17th of August, 1892, had been registered it could not have been said that the requirements of section 25 had not been complied with. But in point of fact that agreement was not registered at all, and it cannot be called in aid in any way to assist the subsequent agreement of the 31st of August, 1892, which is called a subsidiary agreement. Anything contained in the agreement of the 17th of August, 1892, cannot be called in aid to assist and make the agreement of the 31st of August a compliance with the statute unless per se it is a compliance. Now, the agreement of the 31st of August, 1892, was the agreement which was registered, and the only agreement. The question which we have to consider is whether that agreement is a compliance with section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. I will not read that section again, but I will just call attention to a few words in the agreement of the 31st of August, 1892, which are these. It recites as follows: "Whereas by an agreement dated the 17th of August, 1892, and made between the syndicate of the one part and the company of the other part, it was agreed for the considerations therein mentioned." Now, that is the only mention of any consideration that occurs in that agreement at all, and when we have to consider whether that form of agreement is a compliance with the statute, I am clearly of opinion that it is not. What was the object of the 25th section, about which there has been so much discussion for a great number of years past? The object of it, I think, has never been doubted. The object of it was to disclose to shareholders and creditors and persons interested, the true state of the assets of the company and to give them information as to whether the consideration was a consideration paid in cash or whether it was a consideration which took another form. The object of it was, by disclosing the real assets of the company, to give information to the shareholders and to the creditors to enable them to form some opinion of what the position and the capital of the company might be. Now, the important words are "the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing." Now, whether "the same" means the mode of payment or the payment, I think is immaterial. It must mean one or the other — say it means the payment, although Fry, L.J., in In re The Almada and Tirito Co., Allen's case, thought that it meant the terms or mode of payment. The phrase "unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing" means shall have been declared by a contract in writing to be something otherwise than in cash. And, looking at this agreement, how can that information be conveyed to anybody? In my opinion what was intended was that the consideration should be disclosed and should appear in writing, and that the contract should show what the consideration was. I do not mean that it would be competent to go into the value of the consideration or anything of that kind, but I will illustrate it in this way: Supposing the consideration was goods purchased and sold, it may be that it would be sufficient to state that; if it were money lent, it may be that that would be sufficient; or money received, it may be that that would be sufficient. What I mean is that the kind of consideration ought to be disclosed, so as to give proper information to those concerned; because, otherwise there would be no statement of the consideration at all. In point of fact, as has been said by my lord, having regard to the form of this agreement, it was only part of the agreement that was registered, and not the whole agreement, as it ought to be. The document to be registered must, in my opinion, disclose the consideration, and I do not think it makes the least difference whether it assumes the form of a deed or of a simple contract. That being so, the result will follow which has been already stated. I wish to add that I do not mean to determine anything as to with what degree of particularity the consideration should be stated.

CHITTY, L.J.—The 25th section has been before the courts for some thirty years, and it seems that all questions upon its construction and meaning are not yet settled. But I entertain no doubt in this case. The question is, whether the document of the 31st of August, 1892, which is the only contract that has been registered, is a compliance with the 25th section? I think that it is not, and in arriving at that conclusion I am merely giving effect to the words as they stand, without permitting any strain upon them one way or the other. The thing to be registered at or before the issue of the shares, is a contract duly made in writing. A contract in writing must express, as part of the contract, the consideration. I am not saying with what particularity it must be expressed. The consideration forms part of the contract, and therefore must be on the face of the contract itself. Now, in the case before us the mode of stating the consideration is this: It is agreed that the shares shall be allotted "for the considerations therein mentioned," meaning the considerations which are mentioned in a document which is not registered. In my opinion the contract, which includes the consideration, consists of the two agreements. It is not necessary to enter into the question whether a proper consideration was shown on the face of the first instrument—that is, the document of the 17th of August, 1892. In my opinion, I repeat, the contract here is made up of the two instruments, and therefore, to comply with the 25th section, the two instruments ought to have been put upon the register. This is in accordance with the dicta on the subject, and with the view apparently entertained by Lord Herschell and others in the House of Lords in The Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India (Limited) v. Roper. Now, what is the object of the section? Publicity; to give information, by registering the contract, to any person who proposes to deal with the company either by way of becoming a shareholder or by lending money, or the like. He is to go to the register to find—what? To find the contract. He goes to the register in this case, but he does not find the contract; he finds part, half as it were, of the contract. He has no right to see the unregistered part—that is, the document of the 17th of August, 1892—and he would be at the mercy of the company whether they showed it or not. If the company were in difficulties and wanted money, probably they would show it, but otherwise they would say, "No, that does not concern you—we have registered all that we are required to register, and you may get the 'full information,' which Lord Herschell speaks of in the Ooregum case, by reading the thing we have registered." In my opinion that does not give the full information that the statute requires; and I base it on the simple ground that "a contract in writing" includes the consideration as part of it, just as much as it does anything else in the contract. This judgment of ours will not in any way affect cases where the consideration is stated, as to the particularity with which it must be dealt with in the contract. If the consideration is, for instance, a concession in South Africa, the person who reads the registered document will see that it is a concession in South Africa and will form his own opinion about it. So if it is furniture supplied to an hotel company, he may be able to go at once and see what that furniture is, or he may not, because after a lapse of time the furniture may be worn out. Again, if it is the sale of a goodwill, the consideration stated being the goodwill and the stock-in-trade, he sees what it is; he sees the nature of the consideration, and he sees it stated. As I say, our judgment does not involve any question, in my opinion, of the particularity with which the consideration is to be stated. I am repeating myself when I say it, but I say it emphatically, that this document that was registered is not a contract in writing which "otherwise determines" within the meaning of the section.

SMITH v. STUART. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3—Trustee Act, 1883 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 8.

An inquiry having been directed and a certificate made thereunder before the passing of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, a trustee who had by such certificate been found liable to make good a loss caused by an improper investment, on the matter coming on for further consideration, claimed relief under the Act.

Held, that, as attention had not been directed to the circumstances which would afford relief under the Act, the trustee was not too late in making his application, and ought to be afforded an opportunity of producing any fresh evidence he might desire to put in.

A trustee seeking relief under the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, must show that he has acted, not only honestly, but also in a reasonable manner, and the burden of proof lies on the trustee.

Barker v. Ivimey, 45 W. R. 495, [1897] 1 Ch. 536, followed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This case gave rise to two questions—first, whether a trustee who had by a certificate made before the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, been found liable for a breach of trust, could claim relief under the Act on the matter coming on for further consideration; secondly, whether the trustee's conduct had been such as to disentitle him to any relief.

The facts were as follows:

On an originating summons there was directed on the 25th of March, 1893, this special inquiry: "What are the respective values of the mortgage securities forming part of the said trust estate, and whether they are sufficient securities for the moneys advanced, or for any and what part of such moneys respectively, and whether in each case it was desirable to call in and realize or retain such securities, and in case the said securities or any of them appeared to be insufficient, under what circumstances and by whom the moneys owing thereon were advanced, and what valuations were taken by the persons advancing such money, and whether such investments were proper?"

Upon that, in answer to the inquiry, the chief clerk made his certificate, which was in this form, as to a mortgage of £800. All the mortgages were framed in the same way. "The sum was advanced by the defendants A. M. Stuart (since deceased) and the Rev. J. Box, as the trustees of the testator's will, on the 1st of January, 1890, to Geo. Allen, upon the security of two leasehold messuages. . . . A letter dated the 27th of November, 1884, from one John Oliver Cooke, an architect and surveyor employed by the said trustees, has been produced, which states that he considered the property a good security for £800, without stating the value of the property; but, with that exception, no valuation in respect of that security was obtained by the said trustees. I find that the investment was not a proper investment for the sum of £800 so advanced, on the ground that no proper valuation of the said property was obtained, and the estate of the defendant A. M. Stuart and the said defendant the Rev. J. Box are liable for part of the loss on this investment—viz., the sum of £54 and interest thereon at £4 per cent. from the 22nd of September, 1893, being the date of the death of the tenant for life, the said A. M. Stuart."

That certificate came before the judge on the 16th of May, 1896, on a summons to vary, and an order was made striking out the finding of the chief clerk as to the liability of A. M. Stuart and the Rev. J. Box, and subject thereto the summons was to be proceeded with, having regard to the findings as varied.

The grounds of the order were as follows:

His lordship was of opinion that in reality it was not a matter to be dealt with on originating summons, but as the inquiry had been made and submitted to by the defendants, they were bound by the result so far as the inquiry was directed to go, and that they must be bound by the fact that they had accepted the inquiry in that form. That, however, the certificate went beyond the inquiry directed, and that so far as that was concerned it ought to be struck out. Then came the question, What was to be done? And an account was therefore directed to be taken, having regard to the existing certificate, which order bound the personal estate of the testator. It was inevitable on that (his lordship said) that the chief clerk should disallow a certain portion of these mortgages, and accordingly by his further certificate he had done so. No objection was taken to the finding, and the result was that a liability was found on the part of the late defendant A. M. Stuart and the defendant Box.

On the matter coming on for further consideration it was proposed to insert in the minutes an order that the defendant Box make good the amounts so disallowed, and that he should be deprived of his costs.

Buckley, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the trustee.—We ask, with reference to the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, s. 3 (1), that the defendant may be relieved from payment of these sums and costs. The defendant is entitled to say that, although there has been a loss, yet, having regard to the Act, he ought to be relieved. [STIRLING, J.—The judgment was given long before the Act was passed. No evidence has been directed to that issue down to the present.] The defendant is entitled to get the protection in some way or another.

Hastings, Q.C., and Macnaghten, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The matter is settled by the certificate, which finds a certain sum due from the trustee. You cannot go behind that. The Act was not intended to deal with any such set of circumstances: In re Turner, Barker v. Ivimey, 45 W. R. 495, [1897] 1 Ch. 536, at p. 542. No case is made for the exercise of the discretionary jurisdiction. [STIRLING, J.—Down to the present the trustee appears to have had no opportunity of raising the point.]

Willis-Bund, W. C. Fooks, A. E. Randall, and G. F. Hart, for other parties.

STIRLING, J.—All that I am going to decide now is to express a view as to how the beneficial conditions of that section of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, which it is to be remembered was only passed on the 14th of August last, are to be applied in the circumstances of the present case. It may be that, having regard to the wide provisions of that section in future in directing inquiries and accounts in chambers with a view to saving expense, it will be necessary to add something, not hitherto usual to add, to provide for the case that the hearing may possibly result in a finding of a breach of trust. But in the present case every order was made long before the Act passed, and therefore the orders which have been made are in no way directed to the circumstances which give the trustee title to relief under this section. I desire briefly to recapitulate how the matter stands. [His lordship here stated the facts as above set out, and continued:] No inquiry, however, was directed, nor, considering the dates of the orders, could have been directed to the question which the Act of Parliament which was recently passed directed the court to take into consideration with reference to the liability of these defendants. The certificate found and established a liability against them to the amount of over £1,000. The Act says: "If it appears to the court that a trustee, whether appointed under this Act or not, is or may be personally liable for any breach of trust, whether the transaction alleged to be a breach of trust occurred before or after the passing of this Act, but has acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust and for omitting to obtain the directions of the court in the matter in which he committed such breach, then the court may relieve the trustee either wholly or partly from personal liability for the same." This enactment, which is one passed for the benefit of trustees, ought to be fairly administered by the court. I cannot think, having regard to the circumstances under which the orders were made, that the trustee is too late at the present moment in coming and asking the opinion of the court whether the court ought not to relieve him from a portion or the whole of the liability to which he is found liable. There is nothing inconsistent with the certificate as it stands. The Act assumes that the liability is either actually existing or possible, and upon that the court may relieve the trustee wholly or partly from the same. It seems to me that the application is one which I am bound to attend to under the Act, and it appears to be admitted on both sides, that if the question be gone into the evidence filed on the certificate is all that it is necessary to consider. I think, therefore, that I ought to consider and hear the evidence on this question. But if the parties wish to adduce further evidence they can have a further opportunity of doing so. This Act, which has now been passed, was not passed at the date of the order. It would be right for any trustee who thinks that probably he may desire to ask the court to relieve him from the whole or a portion of the liability which may be found against him in a matter pending before the court, when the order is made directing inquiries which may result in that liability, or at all events in some, being established at a later period, to apply to the court before the certificate is made in order to ensure the proper evidence being before the court when it comes to be enforced. In the present case, seeing the dates of the orders, I think that I ought not to abstain from going into the question, as all the evidence is here. Of course, it is for the present trustee to bring himself within the terms of the Act.

Buckley, Q.C., and E. Ford, read the evidence on which they relied. The only ground on which it can be said we are not to have the benefit of the Act of 1896 is that we have not observed the regulations laid down by the Trustee Act of 1888. But this Act must cover such a case: Wynne v. Tempest, 45 W. R. 183, [1897] 1 Ch. 110; In re Roberts, Knight v. Roberts, 76 L. T. Rep. 479, 45 W. R. Dig. 55.

Hastings, Q.C., and Macnaghten, Q.C.—The point is a very important one, as it concerns not only this case, but the true construction of the section. The cases cited are distinguishable. The latter was one where the question was whether an executor was liable for not getting in costs where an action to recover them would have failed.

Ford, in reply.

STIRLING, J.—Having regard to the novelty of the application and the manner in which it affects other parties, I shall take time to consider the point.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 5.—STIRLING, J. (after recapitulating the facts), continued: Now, the ground on which I am asked to give relief in this case is found in the affidavit of the defendant Box, filed on the 17th of January, 1896. [His lordship read the material portions and section 3 of the Act, and continued:] The effect of that section I take to be this—that the law, as it stood at the passing of the Act with reference to breaches of trust, is not altered, but that jurisdiction is thereby given to the court under special circumstances, upon the court being satisfied of the several matters mentioned therein, to relieve a trustee from the consequences of a breach of trust as far as regards his personal liability. The court has first to be satisfied that he "acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust, and for omitting to obtain the directions of the court." As to honesty, there is no question at all. That is admitted. But that is not the only condition, and the question arises whether the other conditions are satisfied. I quite admit that it seems beyond question that that section applies to the case of a trustee making investments of trust funds, as well as to any other matter arising in the administration of the trust.

The application of section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, to the case of investments made by trustees has been considered by Byrne, J., in In re Turner, Barker v. Ivimey, and has subsequently been approved in the Court of Appeal, and I willingly adopt as a guide what is laid down there. The burden lies on a trustee asking the court to exercise its jurisdiction to show that he acted reasonably; and it is certainly fair to consider whether it is probable that Mr. Box would have acted with reference to these investments as he did if he had been lending money of his own.

Now, in his affidavit Mr. Box states that these mortgages are assented to by him, "partly by reason of the confidence I placed in Mr. Muskett as the long-trusted solicitor of the testator, and by reason of the valuations of the surveyors employed by Mr. Muskett." No blame attaches to Mr. Box for employing Mr. Muskett as his solicitor. It is fair to say that Mr. Muskett appears to have been employed by the trustees in a large number of mortgage transactions, twenty-seven in all, and of these only four have been challenged. Still, I think a man dealing with his own money would not rely on a question as to the value of property proposed as a security on the opinion of his solicitor, though doubtless he might do so as to any question of title or of law involved. However, Mr. Box does not tell us what advice either as to questions of value or as to questions of law was given to him by Mr. Muskett. For aught that appears in Mr. Box's affidavit he may have had full advice as to the rules laid down by the court with reference to investments by trustees; and he certainly was not entirely ignorant of how the duties of a trustee ought to be performed, for he tells us that in 1889 he had a proper trust account opened in the joint-names of himself and his co-trustee, and that on discovering about the same time that Mr. Muskett had negotiated mortgages in his own name as mortgagee for sums amounting to £1,800, he called the mortgages in and obtained judgment for what was owing.

The valuations of the surveyors employed by Mr. Muskett are produced as regards three of the mortgages; as to the fourth no valuation is produced, and it really was not contended that Mr. Box could be relieved as to it.

As to the three valuations produced, none of them satisfy the requirements of section 4 of the Trustee Act, 1888, now replaced by section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1893. It was contended, and in my opinion rightly, that this is not necessarily a fatal obstacle to the application of the section. Still I think that those requirements cannot be left out of consideration. The Legislature in 1888 had under its consideration the duties of trustees as regards investments, and laid down for their guidance certain rules which in some respects relaxed those previously existing, and are in themselves reasonable, and constitute a standard with reference to which reasonable conduct is to be judged.

One of the requirements of these Acts is that in making a loan the trustee shall act on a valuation made by a person whom the trustee "reasonably believes" to be an able practical surveyor or valuer "instructed and employed independently of any owner of the property."

In point of fact Mr. Muskett acted in respect of these mortgages on behalf of the mortgagors, and the surveyors on whose valuations Mr. Box acted were not employed independently of the mortgagors. Apparently Mr. Box was not aware until 1889 that Mr. Muskett had acted for the mortgagors; but it is remarkable that in an affidavit intended to be used for the purpose of defending himself against the claims of the plaintiffs he does not state that at the dates of the advances he believed the surveyors were instructed or employed independently of the mortgagors, still less does he give his reasons for such belief if it existed. The proper inference seems to be that he did not so believe, and if so he does not explain why he nevertheless acted on the valuations. I confess that I do not think that if Mr. Box had been dealing with money of his own he would under these circumstances have advanced it without further inquiry.

Another requirement prescribes that the amount of the loan does not exceed two-thirds of the value of the property stated in the valuation.

In two out of the three valuations no value is stated; all that is given is the amount for which the valuer considered the property a good security. In the third the value is given, but the amount lent exceeded by £200 that value. No special circumstances are put forward in explanation.

Here again, the rule seems not to have been complied with, and having regard to those circumstances I feel that there is not enough laid before me to enable me to relieve the trustee from the breach of trust which he has committed, according to the finding of the chief clerk. There is another matter as to which a question has also been raised. [His lordship here referred to the evidence, from which it appeared that after considerable negotiations between the solicitors to the various parties, it was agreed that the beneficiaries should accept £800, provided payment was made by the defendant within a week from the date of the agreement. In the meantime an order was made by the chief clerk in the presence of all parties that the defendant should transfer into court the investments in his hands, and further, within a limited time pay £1,050 into court.] This order having been made, it was clear if it were complied with that it would deprive the defendant of the power of paying the £800 within a week. Further negotiations between the solicitors took place, and the defendant proceeded to sell the investments. Later a summons was taken out by his solicitor asking for further time in which to pay the money into court, but which did not ask that the order for payment of the funds in the trustee's hands into court should be stayed, or for amendment thereof by an order for sale and distribution of the funds. It came before the chief clerk and was refused, but ultimately the order made was amended on the terms that the defendant should pay £550 into court at once, and give security for the balance, further time being allowed. On the 5th of November, 1894, an inquiry was directed as to any and what loss had been occasioned by the sale of the securities, and the chief clerk certified that that loss amounted to £273, and the trustee now comes and asks that he should be relieved in respect of this loss. As regards him there is no affidavit as to what had taken place, and the only evidence was that which was contained in the affidavit of the solicitor, which I have read. It seems to me that he relied on the advice of his solicitor, but I do not think that can excuse him. He may have a remedy over against the solicitor, and I hope he has, but I cannot say that when he knew that an order had been made upon him for payment of certain funds into court it was reasonable for him in the face of the order, without making any application in the action or at the same time bringing the matter before the court and asking for an extension of time, to sell these securities. The solicitor and the defendant appeared to have speculated on what they thought would be the views of the various cestuis que trust, views which, unfortunately, were not entertained by them. In these circumstances it appears to me that no case is made out for relief by the trustee.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BEECH. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Estate duty—Property passing on death—Settlement—Assignment of life interest to remainder-man—Death of tenant for life—Liability to duty—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2, 5, 7.

A lady was entitled under her marriage settlement to the income of real and personal estate for her life. In 1894 she by deed surrendered her life interest in this property to her son, who was then, by virtue of the settlement and an appointment made under it, absolutely entitled to the property subject to his mother's life interest. The surrender was expressed to be made to the intent that the life interest might merge in the interest in remainder. The lady died in 1896.

Held, that the son was a person having an interest in the property which ceased on the death of his mother, and that the property passed on the death of the mother within the meaning of section 2 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, and that estate duty was payable upon the principal value thereof.

Information by the Attorney-General.

The defendants were the present trustees of an indenture of settlement of the 13th of July, 1852, made in contemplation of the marriage of Mrs. Eliza C. P. Beech and her husband. That settlement contained a covenant that any real or personal estate to which Eliza C. P. Beech or her husband in her right should become entitled during the coverture should be transferred to the trustees of the settlement and held by them on trust for sale and conversion, and that the proceeds should be applied and disposed of upon certain trusts, which were so far as material as follows:

Upon trust during the joint lives of the husband and wife to pay the income of the trust funds to the wife for her separate use without power of anticipation, and in case the wife should survive the husband (which event happened) then after the death of the husband upon trust to pay the dividends and annual income or the said trust funds unto the wife and her assigns during her life, she maintaining and educating as well the then present children of the husband as her own children by him during their respective minorities, and from and after the decease of the wife (as to as well the capital of the said trust funds as the dividends and annual income thereof) upon trust for the then present children of the husband and their issue, and the children or more remote issue of the intended marriage or for any one or more exclusively of the others or other of such children and issue at such age or times on such events and in such shares and proportions and with such restrictions and in such manner as (in the events which happened) the wife after the death of the husband should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment upon trust for the then present children of the husband and the children of the said intended marriage who, being sons, should attain the age of twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry, in equal shares.

During the coverture Mrs. Eliza C. P. Beech or her husband in her right became entitled to various interests in property which were duly transferred to the trustees according to the covenant above set out.

The husband died in the year 1885.

There were only two children of the marriage—Mrs. Greig, and the defendant Howard Beech.

By a deed of appointment of the 21st of December, 1886, after recitals showing that all the children of the husband had attained the age of twenty-one years, and that the sums of £3,000 and £700 had been raised out of the settled funds and paid to Mrs. Greig, and that the trust funds representing the interests of Mrs. E. C. P. Beech acquired by the trustees under the covenant (except the £3,700 so raised) consisted of the particulars specified in the schedule, it was witnessed that in pursuance of the power in the settlement Mrs. E. C. P. Beech appointed that the said sums of £3,000 and £700 and the trust funds out of which or by the sale whereof the said sums respectively were raised should be deemed to be held in trust for Mrs. Greig within the meaning and intent of the settlement and as a part or share of the trust funds thereby given or appointed to her under or by virtue of the said power. And, further, Mrs. E. C. P. Beech in exercise of the aforesaid power appointed that the residue of the said trust property should be held in trust for the said Howard Beech absolutely and exclusively of all other persons who, but for the exercise of this power, might be entitled to share therein, but subject to the life interest of Mrs. E. C. P. Beech therein. Provided always that that appointment should not extend to any funds subject to the trusts of the settlement other than those to which Mrs. E. C. P. Beech or her husband in her right became entitled.

By an indenture of the 18th of December, 1894, Mrs. E. C. P. Beech surrendered to the defendants William Beech and Howard Beech (the trustees of the settlement) all that her life interest under the settlement in the moneys and investments specified in the schedule thereto, and in any other real and personal property to which the said Howard Beech was then or might thereafter become entitled by virtue of the deed of appointment, to the end and intent that such life interest might merge in the interest in remainder of the said Howard Beech, and that accordingly the trustees might thenceforth hold the aforesaid moneys, investments, and property in trust for the said Howard Beech, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, according to the nature thereof, and to be disposed of as he or they should direct. The schedule to this deed contained particulars of various mortgage securities and shares in real property.

Mrs. E. C. P. Beech died on the 27th of August, 1896, and thereupon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue applied to the defendants to deliver an account of the property mentioned in the schedule to the deed of the 18th of December, 1894, and to pay duty thereon, alleging that that property passed on the death of Mrs. E. C. P. Beech. The defendants refused to do so.

The information prayed that it might be declared that upon the death of Mrs. E. C. P. Beech estate duty became payable under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the principal value of the trust property specified in the schedule to the indenture of the 18th December, 1894; that the same passed on her death within the meaning of the said Act; and that accounts might be directed and other consequential relief given.

The defendants by their answer contended that by reason of the indenture of the 18th of December, 1894, having been executed, no duty in respect of the property in question became payable under the Finance Act, 1894, on the death of Mrs. E. C. P. Beech.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—The property in question is property which passed on the death of Mrs. Beech, and estate duty is payable on the principal value. Even if it did not actually pass on her death within the meaning of section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, it at all events is to be deemed to have passed under section 2 (1). Under that sub-section property passing on the death is to be deemed to include "(b) property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased." This means property in which the deceased or any other person had at any time an interest ceasing on the death; it is not to be read as relating only to interests existing at the time of the death of the deceased. And where, as here, the interest ceasing on the death extended to the whole income of the property the duty is to be paid on the principal value of the property: section 7 (7). Whether a person having a life interest in property retains it till death, or assigns it during life to another, estate duty is equally payable on the death on the principal value of the property: sections 2 (1) (b), 7 (7). It makes no difference that the assignment (as in the present case) is to the person entitled in remainder expectant on the determination of the life interest, nor that the deed of assignment contains words purporting to effect a merger of the interest for life and the interest in remainder. No mere form of conveyancing can prevent the liability to duty from attaching to property; the assignee of the life interest, whether he be the remainderman or a stranger, and whether there be in conveyancing language a merger or not, is a person other than the deceased having an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased within the meaning of section 2 (1) (b). There is no reason why an assignment to the remainderman should be differently treated for the purposes of estate duty from an assignment to a stranger, and to do so would affect the whole scheme of the Act, which is to levy a property tax on property payable on death, and would be at variance with the special provisions contained in section 5 as to the payment of the duty in the case of settled property.

Levett, Q.C., and W. M. Spence, for the defendants.—No estate duty became payable in respect of this property on the death of Mrs. Beech. On the surrender of her life interest to the remainderman her life interest absolutely ceased to exist; the estate for life and the estate in remainder in the same property cannot co-exist. According to the argument for the Crown, if property be limited to A. for life, remainder to B. for life, remainder to C. in fee, and A. surrenders his life estate to B., A.'s life estate still exists, and if B. dies in the lifetime of A., B.'s life estate never comes into possession at all. The true view is that A.'s life estate is gone, being merged in B.'s life estate, which has been accelerated. This is not a mere quibble of conveyancers; it is a doctrine of the common law: Shep. Touch., p. 300, "Surrender"; the estate of the surrenderor is "drowned and extinct." It is for this reason that in the Succession Duty Act, 1853, s. 15, the Legislature dealt with the case of the acceleration of the interest of a remainderman by surrender, and while it recognized that the prior estate would be extinguished, enacted that the duty should still be payable. The Finance Act contains no such provision. It is an Act to levy a duty upon the devolution of property upon death, and if (as in the case of a surrender of a life interest) no devolution takes place by reason of the death no duty is payable. The fact of the death is immaterial. The effect of a surrender is well illustrated in In re Radcliffe, 40 W. R. 323, [1892] 1 Ch. 227. In the present case Howard Beech had no interest ceasing on the death of Mrs. Beech; he had the whole property irrespective of her death. Section 7 (7) of the Act shows that if duty is to be paid there must be some benefit arising from the cesser of the interest ceasing on the death; but where there was no interest ceasing on the death no benefit arises and no duty can be payable: In re Earl Cowley, 45 W. R. 538, [1897] 2 Q. B. 47. This case is similar to that of an absolute gift of property where the donor lives for a year after the death, and duty is, therefore, not payable.

POLLOCK, B.—We need not trouble you, Mr. Attorney, to reply upon this case, which is no doubt one of very great importance.

Now, the first question we have to consider is this: That the object of this Act is to levy upon all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, estate duty. The time at which that estate duty should be payable is fixed, and fixed by the death of a person who up to the time of his death has been the owner of or has enjoyed the property in question. That being so, you start with the proposition (laid down again and again, and especially by Lord Westbury) that Acts of this kind are not to be construed in accordance with the ordinary language of conveyancers or in accordance with what is supposed to give effect to the principles upon which conveyancers would act, but they are to be construed, as indeed all other Acts are, with a view to carrying out what is supposed to be the intention of the Act and its provisions as expressed by the language. That being so, the language of the Act, to my mind, is not at all difficult to construe. It may be that it disturbs the old idea in the mind of conveyancers upon particular points, but, in construing an Act of Parliament which creates a tax upon property and then goes on to say at what time that tax shall be paid, I do not feel any difficulty in dealing with the matter. Section 2 says, "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say"—the very language of the Act in itself shows that there is something wholly different from the ordinary rules by which the devolution of property is governed. The first class (a) is "Property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose." There is no difficulty about that. Then (b) is "Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest." Now, that obviously includes not merely property in which the deceased alone had an interest, but property in which "the deceased or any other person" had an interest, which means, to take a common case, that though a person had under a settlement an interest for life only, or apart from the settlement an interest for life only, if he has dealt with that interest by way of sale or mortgage, then the death of that person is to be fixed as the date at which the duty is to be payable, although the other person to whom the property has been assigned, and to whom the legal interest has been given, may not be liable. That in itself seems to me to show that, in using this language, the Act merely means to fix what is supposed to be a fair and reasonable period at which the incidence of taxation must take place. Now, if these words were alone, and were construed without any argument, it seems to me clear that the present case would be included within these words, and that this was property in which, not the deceased, but some "other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased." That is to say, that the words include a case where the life interest was conveyed to that other person, and became not the property of the deceased, but the property of that other person; there is no limitation. Then it is said: Why cannot you read into that section, as an addition to the words "or any other person" the words "other than the person to whom, under the devolution of the settlement, the property would come, apart from any deed or contract or conveyance"; speaking for myself I must decline to do so, for if I did I should be dealing with an Act of Parliament in a manner in which I am not entitled to do. I should be expressing an opinion upon a matter which has already been expressly dealt with by the words of the Act—words which I think are very plain and obvious, and show what is the proper method of dealing with this matter; and once we admit that that is the mode of dealing with it under the statute, then it is only necessary to see whether the adoption of that view involves anything which obviously clashes with the general intention of the statute or with the particular language that is used elsewhere. I find nothing of the kind; on the contrary, I think that section 5, which has been alluded to several times, shows how settled estates are dealt with, and that it is a section which is drawn, to my mind, in accordance with the view I have taken of the Act of Parliament.

Then, with regard to the mere amount to be paid, that is really not a matter for us to discuss at all; that is settled by another section, the principle of which is perfectly applicable to the construction of the Act which I am placing upon it. It seems to me, therefore, without reference to a great many arguments which one might balance upon one side or upon the other, that the conclusion to which I have come is the only one to which this court ought to come under the circumstances of this case; and that that conclusion can be worked out fairly and in accordance with what has always been conceived to be the intention of this Act generally there can be no manner of doubt, and therefore I hold that the Crown is entitled to our judgment in this case.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Act of Parliament was passed for the purpose of placing a duty upon property passing on the death of any person, and, as was suggested by Sir Robert Reid in the argument, it is not always clear what property passes on the death of a person, because there are cases in which a settlement comes into question, and all the property, therefore, is not entirely in one person to the exclusion of everybody else. When you therefore came to deal with property under settlement it was necessary to pass some clause relating especially to such property, and we find it in section 2 of the Act of Parliament, the terms of which have been referred to. I have very little to add to what has been said by my learned brother Pollock upon that section. It appears to me that it begins by defining property passing on the death of a deceased person so that it shall be deemed to include certain heads of property, one of which is "property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased." Now, according to the argument for the defendants, it is not easy to read these words as exempting the property in question in this case without putting some other words into the section. According to their contention it should be "property in which the deceased or any other person had, at the time of the death of the deceased, an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased," or it should be "property in which the deceased or any person other than those who were to benefit by the death of the deceased had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased"; and if those words were there it would have this effect, that it would exclude from duty the property which it is, to my mind, the specific intention of the Act to include. The words as they stand include all property in which the deceased "or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest," including in every particular the property which is the subject of this appeal. The only point is that here the interest of the deceased has been disposed of by an intermediate deed to one of the persons who is the remainderman, but he is an "other person" within this section, and I think it is fair and proper to read the words with that meaning, because the whole intention and scope of the Act of Parliament is that he should be included. It would have been easy, if it had been intended that by transfer of interest the property should have been exempted from estate duty, to have said so, and it is observable that the 3rd sub-section of section 2 deals with one particular exception, which was put in by the Legislature when they were dealing with this property; but the exception does not affect this case. If we were to allow that this had been contemplated as a possible mode of escaping from the duty of the Legislature, we should, I think, be going completely in the face of the intention of the Legislature, not only as expressed in this section, but as it is to be found in the 5th section, relating to settled property, and also in the 7th section, which alludes to the calculation of the benefit that arises.

I do not find that the authorities quoted relating to conveyancing, or with regard to the effect of the surrender of one interest and its merging or not merging into another, have much bearing upon the matter; the question is, What is the meaning of the Finance Act? and that is to be judged of by its intent and by its clear and expressed object, and not by the rules of conveyancing.

For these reasons I agree that the estate is liable to the duty.

KERR v. KERR. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Maintenance order—Arrears—Debt provable in bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 37, sub-sections 1, 2, 3, 8.

Arrears payable under a maintenance order, and due at the date of a receiving order, are not debts provable in the bankruptcy.

Linton v. Linton, 33 W. R. 714, 15 Q. B. D. 239, followed.

This was an appeal by William H. Kerr from an order of commitment made by His Honour Judge Lumley Smith, sitting at the Westminster County Court.

On the 2nd of May, 1893, Mrs. Kerr obtained an order in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division against her husband, the appellant, for payment by him to her of the yearly sum of £108 for maintenance, payable by monthly instalments. The appellant failed to keep up the payments, and Mrs.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Kerr, on the 29th of June, 1896, issued a judgment summons in the county court under ord. 25, r. 17, to enforce payment of arrears to the extent of £45.

On the 13th of October, 1896, the judge made an order committing the appellant for fourteen days and suspending the issue of the warrant until the 1st of December.

On the 5th of December, Mrs. Kerr not having yet applied for issue of the warrant, the appellant filed an affidavit stating that on the 30th of November, 1896, a receiving order was made against him, on his own petition, and that the debt in respect of which the order of commitment was made was provable under the bankruptcy. Thereupon the registrar, pursuant to ord. 25, r. 30, of the County Court Rules, made an order on the same day staying the issuing of the warrant of commitment.

Mrs. Kerr then applied to the judge to rescind the registrar's order and to be at liberty to have the order of commitment executed, on the ground that the debt in respect of which the order of commitment was made, being for arrears of alimony, was not provable under the bankruptcy, and the learned judge being of opinion that he was bound by Re Hawkins, Ex parte Hawkins, 42 W. R. 202, [1894] 1 Q. B. 25, which decided that the wife could not prove in the bankruptcy for arrears of alimony due before the husband commenced his proceedings in bankruptcy, made an order taking off the stay, but further staying proceedings pending an appeal.

From this order W. H. Kerr now appealed, on the ground that since the instalments of maintenance money, in respect of which the commitment order was made, accrued due, a receiving order had been made against him and he had been adjudicated bankrupt, and that the said instalments formed part of a debt provable in the bankruptcy, and that his property had become vested in the official receiver.

Powles appeared on behalf of the appellant.

Montague Lush, for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21.—HAWKINS, J.—The judgment which is about to be read has been prepared by my brother Vaughan Williams; I entirely concur in it. My brother Wright has written a separate judgment.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is an appeal against the order of His Honour Judge Lumley Smith discharging the order of the registrar staying an order for commitment for non-payment of arrears of maintenance payable by a husband to a divorced wife. We think the order of the county court judge right.

The order for maintenance made by the Divorce Court was an order made under section 1 of 29 Vict. c. 32. It was an order for payment of £9 a month for maintenance.

It was decided by Cave, J., in Linton v. Linton, 33 W. R. 714, 15 Q. B. D. 239, that arrears of alimony accruing after the adjudication were not provable in bankruptcy and that an order under the Debtors Act, 1869, might be made, in a proper case, to enforce payment of such arrears. As a fact in that case the wife had proved for the arrears of alimony due at the date of adjudication, but there was no judicial decision as to her right so to do. The decision purports to be a decision under 29 Vict. c. 32, s. 1. I do not understand how that section applied to a case of judicial separation, but this is unimportant, for the judgment undoubtedly was a judgment on the question of proof of debt for a sum payable under that section quâ alimony—i.e., quâ an allowance payable to a wife under a judicial separation, and Watkins v. Watkins, 44 W. R. 677, [1896] P. 222, shows that it makes no difference if the sum is a periodical sum payable quâ maintenance to a divorced wife. It follows that the only question to be decided in the present case is whether the decision in Linton v. Linton applies to arrears payable at the date of the receiving order. Now, the considerations which led the Court of Appeal to hold that there could be no proof for arrears which had become due since the receiving order, seem to have been that the sum payable was not a lump sum but a payment to be made monthly or weekly, that the sum was payable out of personal earnings, that that which would go to his wife would take nothing from the creditors, and that the payments could not be valued or have a capital value put upon them because the payments might at any time be put an end to by resumption of co-habitation. These considerations, except the last, all apply to permanent maintenance under this Act. The last consideration —viz., the impossibility of valuation, also in our judgment applies, although the impossibility is based on different facts in the case of permanent maintenance for a divorced woman to those on which it is based in case of permanent alimony for a judicially separated wife. Resumption of co-habitation between man and wife is no longer possible after divorce. The parties no longer stand in that relation, but the uncertainty as to the continuance of the obligation to make the payments exists, and exists not only as to future payments but also as to arrears, for the Divorce Court can and will wholly or partially relieve a husband from payment of arrears if it is just to do so: De Blaquiere v. De Blaquiere, 3 Hagg. 322; Prescott v. Prescott, 20 L. T. Rep. 331, 17 W. R. Prob. Dig. 2. In fact the practice of the Divorce Court so much treats the sums periodically payable under its order as a fund for maintenance and not as property, and so much keeps its hand on the obligation to make these periodical payments for maintenance that it is a searching rule that the court will not, in the absence of special circumstances, make an order enforcing more than one year's arrears. The very terms of section 1 of 29 Vict. c. 32, moreover, shows that the court has this power. Further than this, section 37, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, shows that a debt is equally provable whether the obligation arose before the receiving order or after it at any time before discharge. It follows that Linton v. Linton is an authority for the proposition that so far as regards permanent alimony there can be no proof for arrears arising between receiving order and application to prove, and it is equally an authority in respect of arrears arising before the order, unless there is something in the nature of arrears arising before the receiving order which makes it possible in such a case to form that estimate which the court held in Linton v. Linton could not be formed in respect of the subsequent arrears; but it is to be observed that in Linton v. Linton it was in respect of arrears and not in respect of future liabilities that it was said that an order could be made on a judgment summons, on the ground that there could be no proof. With regard to the case of Hardy v. Fothergill, 37 W. R. 177, 13 App. Cas. 351, there is undoubtedly in the judgment a good deal to make one say that the liability of a husband to pay under the order of the Divorce Court permanent alimony or permanent maintenance by periodical payments was a liability capable of being estimated, but the Court of Appeal in Watkins v. Watkins do not suggest that anything in Hardy v. Fothergill has overruled Linton v. Linton or In re Hawkins, Ex parte Hawkins, and I am of opinion that the value of the liability, the continuance and extent of enforcement of which, both as to the past and future, is as entirely under the control of the court making the original order for payment as this is, as these orders for alimony and permanent maintenance are, is and ought to be held incapable of being fairly estimated.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., then read the following judgment of WRIGHT, J.—If liberty of the person were not in question I should not have thought it necessary to express the doubt which I entertain. But as the matter stands I think it right to say that in my opinion this case is governed by Hardy v. Fothergill, and we ought to hold that arrears of alimony accrued due and payable before the receiving order are provable in the bankruptcy unless the court has declared them incapable of valuation.

DERBY CORPORATION v. DERBYSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Criminal or penal proceedings—Pollution of river—Proceeding to restrain—Penalty—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), ss. 3, 10.

Proceedings instituted in a county court for an order under section 10 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, requiring a person to abstain from polluting a river, which is constituted an offence against the Act, are not proceedings of a criminal or penal nature, although disobedience by the person against whom the order to abstain is made, renders him liable to a penalty. An order for discovery by the person against whom proceedings for the abstention of pollution of a river are pending may accordingly be made.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (45 W. R. 3, [1896] 2 Q. B. 297) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Derby Corporation from on order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith, L.J.) (45 W. R. 3, [1896] 2 Q. B. 296), affirming the judgment of the Divisional Court, reported 44 W. R. 543, [1896] 2 Q. B. 53.

The respondents, as the local sanitary authority, took proceedings in the county court, under section 10 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, requiring the appellants, the Corporation of Derby, to abstain from causing or knowingly permitting sewage to fall or flow from their sewers into the river Derwent.

The respondents obtained an order for discovery of documents and the delivery of interrogatories.

The Divisional Court (Grantham, J., and Collins, J.) dismissed an appeal from this order, and this decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Lord HERSCHELL.—This is an extremely clear case. The proceeding pending in the county court out of which this appeal arises was a proceeding under section 10 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, under which a county court judge has power to order any person to abstain from polluting a river (to put the matter shortly), and may require him to perform that duty in the manner specified in the order. The fullest discretionary power is conferred upon the county court judge. He can inquire into all the circumstances; he can suspend the order for any time he thinks right; he can accept any undertaking he pleases; and he can make it subject to such conditions as he thinks just. Ultimately, having taken everything into consideration, he has to determine what order it is reasonable to make in relation to the complaint that a river or stream is being polluted. In that proceeding, that is the only order which a county court judge can make.

In the present proceeding application was made for discovery and the objection was then taken that the applicant was not entitled to discovery, inasmuch as it was a penal proceeding. It is admitted that where a proceeding is one to enforce a penalty, or where a proceeding is of such a nature—not that it must end in a penalty, because the decision may be in favour of the person against whom it is taken—but, that it may result in a penalty, it is a penal proceeding. I think there has been some confusion between that doctrine and the doctrine that the court will not allow a party to insist upon a discovery of facts where that discovery may subject the party to a penalty even in some other proceeding. But in that case the objection must be either to the particular questions, or to the answering of particular questions, on the ground that the discovery, if given, would subject the party in some proceeding to a penalty. That is not the present case, because the discovery, if given here, could not possibly assist in subjecting the appellants to a penalty.

The first objection is that this is a penal proceeding—a proceeding which may end in a penalty. But it seems to me to be nothing of the kind. This proceeding never can end in a penalty. All it can end in is an order, under such terms and conditions as the county court judge thinks reasonable, to prevent or abate a nuisance. The Legislature has provided that if that order is disobeyed, then the county court judge may impose such a penalty, not exceeding £50 a day, as he thinks reasonable, payable to such persons as he thinks right, upon the authority or person who has disobeyed the order. That is a separate and independent proceeding. It is true it is taken, as it is said, in the action or the proceeding, but it is really a separate proceeding in which the penalty for disobedience is imposed. The present proceeding itself is no more a proceeding that may subject the present appellants to a penalty than is every proceeding which is ever taken in a court of justice. Every proceeding ends, or is expected to end, in an order of some sort; and every order of the court, if disobeyed (and it is only in the case of disobedience to the order of a county court judge that a penalty can be imposed under the statute), subjects the person disobeying it to a penalty. The court may inflict various penalties if its orders are disobeyed—in some cases imprisonment. It seems to me that it might just as well be contended that every action or proceeding in court was a penal proceeding on that account, as that this is a penal proceeding because if the order were disobeyed a penalty might be imposed. I do not see either in point of law or in common sense the slightest distinction between the two cases.

So much as regards its being a penal proceeding in which there can be from its nature no discovery at all. If it could be shown that the discovery sought here was of facts, the disclosure of which facts might subject the person disclosing them to the penalty provided in the latter part of the section, no doubt there would be foundation for saying that such discovery ought not to be enforced by the court; but no such question arises here. It has not been shown that any questions are sought to be asked which would assist in establishing that the appellants in some future proceeding under the latter part of the section would be liable to a penalty. The only penalty imposed is for disobedience to the order. Nothing that they can disclose under the present application for discovery, can help to show that they have disobeyed an order not yet made, and which, of course, possibly never may be made, and the terms of which at the present moment cannot even be accurately determined. I do not think that the objection to which I have just referred would be one which would go to the entire application for discovery. As I have said, if objection is being taken to a discovery sought on the ground that it would tend to expose to a penalty, you must either show that the answers to particular questions, if given in a particular way, would or might subject you to a penalty, or when the questions are put you must take exception to answering them on that ground. No such case really arises here, because, as I have said, no answer whatever to be given to the questions proposed to be put, if they be relevant questions, could be a step towards or assist in any way to exposing the appellants to the penalty. Indeed, the argument rests entirely upon this—that the discovery would be a step towards exposing to a penalty, because it would be a step assisting to making an order, disobedience to which order would expose to a penalty. That is a proposition which is far too wide. It is a proposition for which there is not the slightest authority, and it is, as it seem to me, most unreasonable.

For these reasons I move your lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

Lord Watson.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the discovery has been legitimately asked in aid of civil proceedings which may tend and lead to an order in terms of the first part of section 10 of the principal Act. If such an order were made, the discovery which the courts below have allowed would be of no relevancy in any prosecution for a penalty under the latter part of section 10, which could only be exacted in consequence of disobedience to the order, and nothing else.

Lord Shand.—I concur in the motion to dismiss this appeal, and in the reasons which your lordships have stated for proposing it. The proceeding under the statute appears to me to be one having for its object, not the obtaining of a decree for a penalty, but a remedial order for the abatement of a nuisance. The fact that disobedience to an order brings with it a liability to a penalty does not, in my opinion, make the original proceeding one of a a penal nature, any more than imprisonment in order to enforce obedience to an order in a civil proceeding, would make that proceeding of a penal character.

Lord Davey.—I am of the same opinion. I am quite satisfied with the reasons which have been given by the county court judge, in his very lucid and concise judgment, for the order which he made. It appears to me that the fallacy which runs through the whole argument on behalf of the defendants is that in this case the penalty is not for letting sewage flow into the stream and pollute the stream; but the penalty is for disobedience to the order; and no discovery which is sought for in this proceeding can in the least degree, rebus sic stantibus, expose the appellants to any penalty. They can only be exposed to a penalty if by reason of their own wilful act they disobey the order when it is made. That appears to me to distinguish the case entirely from all the class of authorities to which counsel have referred. For instance, Reg. v. Whitchurch, which the county court judge said had given him most doubt, seems to me an entirely different case. I will assume that the decision in Reg. v. Whitchurch, and in Mellor v. Denham, 5 Q. B. D. 467, 28 W. R. Dig. 163, on which it is founded, were quite right, but in those cases the penalty was imposed in the first instance. In Mellor v. Denham the parent did not send the child to school, and that case was brought before the justices, and the justices imposed a penalty. In the same way, in Reg. v. Whitchurch, the local authority had power to direct a person to remove an ashpit or to make a closet, or something of that kind—I forget exactly what; they gave a direction accordingly, but he did not do it. The matter was brought before the justices, and a penalty was imposed under the statute for not doing that thing. Lord Bramwell points out that it is exactly the same as if there were a provision in the Act that a person shall upon the direction of the local authority make a new ashpit, and if he does not comply with the direction a penalty is imposed. Those cases appear to me to be entirely distinct from the present case.

In re An Arbitration between Palmer & Co. and Hosken, Trevithick, Polkinhorn, & Co. (Limited). (a.)

Arbitration—Arbitrators—Misconduct—Refusal to state case for opinion of court, or to adjourn that court may be applied to to order a case—Application for case made reasonably and bonâ fide*—Remitting matter to arbitrator for reconsideration after award made—Arbitration Act,* 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 10, 11, 19.

Where one of the parties to an arbitration, acting bonâ fide and on reasonable grounds, requests the arbitrator to state a special case raising a material question of law, or to delay his award until the party can apply to the court for an order directing a special case, the arbitrator, if he refuses and at once makes his award, is primâ facie guilty of a breach of duty amounting to misconduct within the meaning of section 11 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. In such circumstances the court is justified, under that section, in setting aside the award, or, under section 10, in remitting it for reconsideration, and may order the arbitrator to state a special case.

Decision of Day, J., at chambers affirmed.

(a.) Reported by R. C. Mackenzie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from Day, J., at chambers.

The arbitration in this case was as to the liability of Hosken & Co. to compensate Palmer & Co. in respect of an alleged deficiency below the agreed quantity in a cargo of wheat of which Palmer & Co. were buyers and Hosken & Co. sellers. The arbitrators decided that Hosken & Co. were not liable to make good the deficiency, and Palmer & Co. appealed, as, under the submission, they were entitled to do, to the directors of the Liverpool Corn Trade Association (Limited). During the proceedings before the directors Palmer & Co. applied to them to state a case for the opinion of the court on this question of law: Whether Palmer & Co. were entitled to be refunded by Hosken & Co. (Limited) in respect of the actual deficiency in the cargo of wheat below the bill of lading quantity, notwithstanding that the cargo was shipped in the hold, and rebagged and weighed at even weights of less than 250lbs. per draft, contrary to the terms of the contract. Palmer & Co. further asked that, if a case were refused, the hearing might be adjourned in order that the court might be applied to, under the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to order that a case should be stated. The directors, however, refused either to state a case or to adjourn, and confirmed the award. Palmer & Co. then applied to Day, J., in chambers, and his lordship made an order remitting the matter to the reconsideration of the directors, and directing them to state, in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, the question of law above mentioned.

Hosken & Co. appealed.

On the argument of the appeal there was some dispute as to whether the decision of the directors had gone upon the ground that there was in fact no deficiency, or upon the question of law which Palmer & Co sought to have decided by the court.

The material provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, are as follows: Section 10—"(1) In all cases of reference to arbitration the court or a judge may from time to time remit the matters referred, or any of them, to the reconsideration of the arbitrators or umpire." Section 11—"(1) Where an arbitrator or umpire has misconducted himself, the court may remove him; (2) where an arbitrator or umpire has misconducted himself, or an arbitration or award has been improperly procured, the court may set the award aside." Section 19—"Any referee, arbitrator, or umpire may at any stage of the proceedings under a reference, and shall, if so directed by the court or a judge, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court any question of law arising in the course of the reference."

Edward Bray (with him R. M. Bray), for the appeal.—Section 19 of the Arbitration Act applies only before the award is completed: Tabernacle Permanent Building Society v. Knight, 41 W. R. 207, [1892] A. C. 298. Under section 10, sub-section 1, which is practically reproduced from section 8 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), the court cannot interfere unless there is fraud or corruption on the arbitrator's part, or some mistake of law or fact appearing on the face of the award, or unless the arbitrator admits he has made a mistake or desires the guidance of the court, or unless (what is not suggested here) further evidence has been discovered since the award: In re An Arbitration between Keighley, Maxsted, & Co., and Bryan, Durant, & Co., 41 W. R. 437, [1893] 1 Q. B. 405; Dinn v. Blake, L. R 10 C. P. 388, 23 W. R. Dig. 10, a case under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

T. G. Carver, for the plaintiffs.—The Arbitration Act, 1889, has introduced a new principle by allowing the court to interfere during the arbitration and order a case, and the older cases are no longer authoritative. The directors, though in one sense a court of appeal, are to be regarded, for the purposes of the Act, as the arbitrators: per Lord Esher in Keighley case.

He also cited In re An Arbitration between the Kirkleatham Local Board and the Stockton and Middlesborough Water Board, [1893] 1 Q. B. 375, 41 W. R. Dig. 269; In re An Arbitration between Spillers & Baker (Limited) and H. Leetham & Sons, 45 W. R. 241, [1897] 1 Q. B. 312.

E. Bray replied.

Cur. adv vult.

Nov. 9.—LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts, read sections 19, 10, and 11 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and proceeded: Those are the sections which are material. The Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 19, gives the court very extensive powers over arbitrators beyond any which the court previously possessed. It impliedly confers on the parties to an arbitration the right to apply to the court for an order directing the arbitrator to state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court any question of law arising in the course of the reference. The right thus conferred must be respected by the arbitrator; and if a party to an arbitration, acting bonâ fide, requests an arbitrator either to state a special case raising a question of law arising in the course of the reference and material for consideration, or to delay his award until the party can apply to the court for an order directing a special case, and the arbitrator refuses to comply with either of such requests, the abitrator is, primâ facie at all events, guilty of a breach of duty towards such party. Such a breach of duty is primâ facie misconduct on the arbitrator's part within the meaning of section 11 of the statute, and justifies the court in setting aside the award under that section, or in remitting it for further consideration under section 10. Even in such a case as that supposed, there may possibly be some grounds for justifying the refusal of the arbitrator, although it is not easy to imagine any. But it is obvious that, if an application for a special case is frivolous, and is made merely for delay, an arbitrator will be perfectly right to refuse it, and will be upheld by the court in so doing. This view of the law is quite consistent with Dinn v. Blake, and In re An Arbitration between Keighley, Maxsted, & Co. and Bryan, Durant, & Co. Section 19 has imposed new duties on arbitrators, and has consequently made a breach of such duties by them misconduct on their part, although before such duties existed their conduct could not be so regarded. In the present case the question of law raised by the buyer is material if there is a deficiency, and is raised bonâ fide and not at all for delay. On the evidence before us a considerable deficiency seems established; but the parties are not agreed about the matter, and the court does not know what the arbitrator's decision on this question really is. If they find there is no deficiency, no question of law arises; but if there is a deficiency the question of law raised by the buyer becomes all-important. Under these circumstances the order appealed from should be slightly varied in its terms, so as to direct the arbitrators to reconsider their award and to state whether there is a deficiency or not, and if there is, then to state the special case. In substance, however, the order is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—The order under appeal cannot be supported under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, standing alone. The proceedings were closed by the award. Section 19 empowers the arbitrator to state a case "at any stage of the proceedings," but not after the award has been completed, and the power of the court or a judge to compel him to state a case, under that section standing alone, is, on the construction of the section, limited in like manner. This was the opinion of the Lords by whom the Tabernacle case was decided.

The case, then, turns on section 10, read in connection with the other sections of the Act, including particularly sections 11 and 19. Upon the principle of construction adopted in Keighley's case the court or a judge has power to remit an award to the arbitrator for reconsideration where there has been misconduct on the part of the arbitrator. Now, on the facts of this case, I think that it was the duty of the directors to adjourn in order to give Palmer & Co. an opportunity to apply to the court or a judge for an order directing a special case to be stated for the purpose of raising the question of law. The application was made in good faith and on reasonable grounds; it was not made for the purpose of delay. According to the affidavits a strong case was made out in the evidence adduced before the directors by Palmer & Co., the ultimate buyers, showing that on the discharge of the cargo from the ship there was a deficiency in the quantity stated in the provisional invoice, which was founded on the bill of lading; and if there was in fact a deficiency, the contract between the ultimate sellers and buyers gave a right to the buyers to have the deficiency refunded; and the right to have the deficiency refunded was irrespective of any question of the liability of the ship. I am not stating these propositions for the purpose of deciding any point of law between the parties, but merely for the purpose of showing the nature of the case presented on Palmer & Co.'s behalf to the directors. The points of law, if they arise on the facts, will have to be considered and decided hereafter. Now, the appellants do not contest that the evidence as to deficiency on the discharge was such as is stated in Palmer's affidavit; wholly passing this evidence by, they state that there was evidence before the arbitrators of a due shipment of the full quantity of cargo referred to in the bill of lading, and they suggest that the arbitrators were not satisfied in fact that any deficiency in the outturn was proved. The chairman of the directors has made an affidavit, but it is silent on this point of fact. We are unable to say whether the directors were prepared to find as a fact that there was no deficiency. The order which we propose to make, varying the order in chambers, will leave that matter over for the decision of the directors. If they find as a fact that there was no deficiency, the point of law sought to be raised will not arise.

Our decision is quite consistent in principle with that of Lord Esher and the other members of the court in In re Keighley. There, in dealing with the 10th section of the Arbitration Act, 1889, the court referred to the corresponding 8th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and the previous decisions on that section. But they had not to take into their consideration the new enactment of the 19th section of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the general effect of that enactment on arbitrations and on the application of the 10th section to circumstances such as those before us. It seems to me that the Legislature intended to confer on the court or a judge a discretionary power, to be exercised according to the circumstances of the case over arbitrators in reference to questions of law, at least to this extent—namely, that when a request for a case is made in good faith, and on reasonable grounds, and the request is made for an adjournment for the purpose of applying to the court or a judge, the arbitrator by summarily making his award ought not to preclude, or attempt to preclude, the party from applying to the court. In this case I think that the adjournment ought to have been allowed; that there was a duty cast on the directors which they failed to perform; and that in this sense there was misconduct on their part which justifies us in remitting the case to them in the manner already stated by the Master of the Rolls. In East and West India Docks Co. v. Kirk, 12 App. Cas. 738, 36 W. R. Dig. 7, decided before the Arbitration Act, 1889, was passed, it was held by the House of Lords that the court had jurisdiction to give leave to revoke the submission if there was reasonable ground for supposing that the arbitrator was going wrong in point of law, even in a matter within his jurisdiction. The leave would have been given in the circumstances of that case if the parties had not come to terms that the arbitrator should state a special case for the decision of the court. This jurisdiction, as was held in James v. James, 37 W. R. 600, 23 Q. B. D. 12, is discretionary, and to be exercised according to the circumstances of the case. In the East and West India Docks case the discretion was exercised while the arbitration was still pending, and consequently the decision does not directly bear on the present case. Granting leave to revoke the submission is a strong measure and a drastic remedy. As the law then stood, it was considered the right mode of controlling the arbitrator in matters of law; and the case shows the importance attached by the House of Lords to keeping the arbitrator right in point of law; and in this respect it has an indirect bearing on the present case.

Appeal dismissed.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from Divisional Court.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of Day and Lawrance, JJ., who reversed the decision of His Honour Judge Martineau, sitting at the Hastings County Court. The question raised was whether the plaintiff was a tenant from year to year under a contract of tenancy within the meaning of section 61 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, so as to entitle him to claim compensation under the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895, which forms part of the former Act.

The plaintiff held under the following agreement at the time of the commencement of the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act a piece of land which he cultivated as a market garden: "Agreement made the 22nd of October, 1886, between Mrs. Isabella Eversfield of the one part, and Alfred King, hereinafter called the tenant, of the other part, whereby the said Isabella Eversfield lets, and the tenant hires, from the 29th of September, 1886, a piece of ground forming part of the Sheepfield, St. Leonard's-on-Sea, now in the tenant's occupation, containing 4a. 3r. 24p. or thereabouts, at the rent of £19 12s. a year, payable quarterly on the usual quarterly days for payment of rent in every year; and the tenant agrees to pay the said rent at the times aforesaid, and to use the said premises as garden ground only, and to manure, crop, and cultivate the same in a husband-like manner; and it is hereby agreed that the said tenancy may be determined by either party giving to the other three calendar months' notice to quit, or of his intention of quitting, as the case may be, on any day of the year." On the 17th of October, 1896, the defendant gave the plaintiff three months' notice to quit. The plaintiff having during his tenancy and before the commencement of the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act made certain improvements, thereupon claimed compensation under that Act in respect thereof, and appointed a referee to act for him. The defendant refused to recognize the plaintiff's right to compensation on the ground that he was not a tenant within the meaning of the Act, and declined to appoint a referee on his own behalf. The plaintiff then applied to the county court for the appointment of a referee under section 9, sub-section 6, of the principal Act. The learned county court judge was of opinion that by the agreement a tenancy from year to year within the meaning of section 61 of that Act had been created and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to claim compensation, and he accordingly made an order for the appointment of a referee. The defendant then appealed to the Divisional Court, when Day and Lawrance, JJ., reversed the judgment of the county court judge.

The plaintiff now appealed.

By section 1 of the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 27), it is provided that that Act shall be read and construed as part of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), as amended by the Tenants' Compensation Act, 1890.

By section 2 it is provided that this Act shall come into operation on the 1st day of January, 1896.

Section 4 provides as follows: "Where under a contract of tenancy current at the commencement of this Act a holding is at that date in use or cultivation as a market garden with the knowledge of the landlord, and the tenant thereof has then executed thereon, without having received previously to the execution thereof any written notice of dissent by the landlord, any of the improvements in respect of which a right of compensation or removal is given to a tenant by this Act, then the provisions of this Act shall apply in respect of such holding as if it had been agreed in writing after the commencement of this Act that the holding should be let or treated as a market garden."

Section 61 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, is as follows: "'Contract of tenancy' means the letting of or agreement for the letting of land for a term of years, or for lives, or for lives and years, or from year to year."

Channell, Q.C. (Rawlinson with him), for the appellant.—The appellant is a tenant from year to year. It is quite clear that such a tenancy is created by the earlier part of the agreement. The proviso at the end of the agreement as to the determination of the tenancy does not alter the nature of the tenancy. It does not make it a tenancy at will: In re Threlfall, 29 W. R. 128, 16 Ch. D. 274. It is merely an arrangement between the parties that either of them may give a three months' notice to quit on any day of the year. The appellant, being a tenant from year to year, is entitled to compensation under the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895.

[Counsel was here stopped by the court.]

Levett, Q.C. (Boxall with him), for the respondent.—Where a landlord or a tenant can determine a term on such notice as is provided by the agreement in this case, there is no tenancy within the meaning of the Act. There is here no tenancy from year to year. The duration of the tenancy is not specified. It was not the intention of the parties to create a tenancy which must of necessity last more than three months. In fact it is only a tenancy for three months. The essence of a yearly tenancy is that it shall last for one year at least: Preston on Conveyancing, 3rd ed., vol. 3, at p. 76; Burton's Law of Real Property, 8th ed., at p. 280; Williams' Real Property, 18th ed., p. 471. Further, there is here no tenancy for a term of years. A tenant under the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 is defined in section 61 as being the holder of land under a landlord for a term of years, or for lives, or for lives and years, or from year to year. It is not sufficient that the letting may become a tenancy for a term of years; but there must be an actual letting or an agreement to let for a term of years. It is necessary to look at the letting, not at the holding. Here there is no special term mentioned, and therefore there is no tenancy within the scope of the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act. In the Threlfall case there was a specified letting from year to year.

The following cases were also cited: Kemp v. Derrett, 3 Camp. 510; Doe dem. King v. Grafton, 18 Q. B. 496.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Now, here the question which has been determined, and which is now before us on appeal—is not what is to be the result as between these two parties—but the simple question is whether the person named here, who was in possession of this market garden land, and who is now put out of it, is such a person as is entitled to apply to the county court judge to name a referee to determine the question whether he is entitled to compensation under the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895. It is said that we must construe this Act strictly. Now, this is a beneficial Act, and an Act which was passed in order to meet what Parliament, after long discussion, had thought was a hardship upon somebody. That hardship was that a person who has been in possession of the land of another, and has effected improvements on that land, and which, if he goes out of possession, by reason of the strict law must all go to the advantage of the landlord—this Act was passed in order that they should not all go to the advantage of the landlord, but that the landlord must pay the tenant some compensation for them. But it is said,

"Oh, no; you must construe the Act strictly, and you must construe it, therefore, with this result—that if a man holds land of his landlord for three months, and during those three months makes a substantial improvement of that land with his own money and his own labour, not one bit of the advantage of which will accrue to him before the end of the three months, the whole of it will accrue to his landlord after the three months." Now, Parliament came to the conclusion, after long inquiry, that it was a hardship that the landlord could say, "You have improved my freehold, now I give you notice to go out of it; but you cannot carry your improvement away, because it is fixed to my freehold, or it is in my freehold, or it has become part of it; you must go out, and I will take the advantage of all that you have done and all that you have spent." That is the substantial ground of this Act of Parliament, and, so far from construing it strictly as against the man in possession of the land who has made the improvements, which improvements when he leaves will go to the advantage of his landlord, I think that the court ought to construe it as largely as it can in favour of the tenant. That is the first point.

Now to come to the second point—namely, the construction of this agreement. Is this man who was in possession of the land, and who is turned out by a notice from his landlord, such a person in whose case and upon whose claim the county court judge is entitled to nominate a referee? We are to determine this case upon the construction of this agreement in writing under a state of facts which are not disputed and which have happened under it. In the year 1886 this agreement was made between this person (I will not call him "tenant" yet) in possession of the land and the landlord, and under it he has held that land and paid rent for it from 1886 down to the present time. Yet it is said that he is not a tenant at all, that he has not a letting at all, that he is only a holder. Let us see what he is. The agreement says, "Whereby the said Isabella Eversfield lets, and the tenant hires, a piece of ground at the rent of £19 12s. a year, payable quarterly on the four usual quarter days for the payment of rent in every year, and the tenant agrees to pay the said rent at the times aforesaid, and to use the said premises as garden ground only." Now there is so far the agreement in which the plaintiff is called the tenant. That which has passed between him and the defendant is called a letting, in respect of which hiring the plaintiff has agreed to pay a fixed yearly rent, which is payable quarterly. If that stands alone, what is he? Is he only a holder and not a tenant at all? Is this only a holding and not a letting? To my mind such an argument is absolutely untenable. It is a tenancy from year to year. Then the agreement goes on to say: "And it is hereby agreed that the said tenancy may be determined by either party giving to the other three calendar months' notice to quit . . . on any day of the year. Now that is a provision which may or may not ever be exercised. This is not a tenancy for three months or for one year certain and nothing more, but until determined by notice. Then comes this stipulation as to something which may never be done, and with regard to which you may say if you like, that it is in the contemplation of the parties just as much that it will never be done, as that it will be done; yet it is contended that this stipulation alters the whole construction of the agreement. I do not think that is so. It seems to me to be as plain as possible that this is a letting, that the relation of landlord and tenant is established, and that at the time of this letting and hiring there was, except in the peculiar event contemplated in the proviso, an ordinary tenancy from year to year according to the terms of the letting and hiring. I think myself that this is a contract within the meaning of the Act, construed, as I say we ought to construe it, as largely as we can in favour of the dispossessed tenant; and I think that there is a holding from year to year within the meaning of the Market Gardeners Act and the Agricultural Holdings Act. If that is so, the county court judge had the jurisdiction and authority and the duty to name a referee. What the result of that reference may be it is not for us to say at present. I think that this appeal must be allowed, and that the case must be sent to the county court judge to exercise his jurisdiction as he thinks fit.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I think that the county court judge was right in this case. On the 1st of January, 1896, the date when the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act came into operation, King was the holder (I think that is the legal word) of land belonging to the landlady, Mrs. Eversfield. He had held that land under a written agreement from October, 1886, and had used it as a market garden. Notice had been given to terminate that holding, and King, under the provisions of the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act of 1895, claimed to be entitled to compensation, and inasmuch as Mrs. Eversfield did not appoint an arbitrator, an application was made to the county court judge to appoint a referee to settle the dispute as to compensation between King on the one hand and Mrs. Eversfield on the other. The point has been taken that King is not within the Act of 1895, and that therefore the county court judge could not appoint a referee. That depends upon whether or not King was under a contract of tenancy current at the commencement of the Act—whether he was at that date holding under a contract of tenancy a market garden. That is the question. Well, what is the contract of tenancy? One cannot doubt that this agreement is a contract of tenancy, because "contract of tenancy" is defined by the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 as applying to agricultural land, under which tenants of agricultural land are entitled to compensation. The Act of 1895 is to be read and construed as part of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, and section 61 of this latter Act defines a contract of tenancy as "a letting of or agreement for the letting land for a term of years, or for lives, or for lives and years, or from year to year." It seems to me, therefore, that the meaning of a market gardener being under a contract of tenancy within the Act of 1895 is this—that he must not have a tenancy of land less than a tenancy from year to year. If he has a tenancy less than that, then he is not entitled to compensation under the Act of 1895. Now comes the question whether this agreement which was entered into in 1886 between King on the one side, and Mrs. Eversfield on the other, constitutes a tenancy less than a yearly tenancy. The agreement says this piece of land is let to the tenant "at the rent of £19 12s. a year, payable quarterly on the usual quarterly days for payment of rent in every year." He agrees to pay that rent, and yet it is argued that we sitting here and construing this agreement are to say that we cannot find within the ambit of this agreement the words "tenant from year to year." It is conceded that if the words "tenant from year to year" had been put in, the respondent would have been nowhere, but it is said that we on reading this agreement are not to read it as saying that King became a tenant from year to year, because these words "as tenant from year to year" are not to be found there. All I can say is with regard to that submission that I cannot agree, because I think that this is as plainly an agreement for a tenancy from year to year as if the words were really here. Then we come to the clause by which it is said that the tenancy has been cut down to a tenancy from three months to three months. "And it is hereby agreed that the said tenancy may be determined by either party giving to the other three calendar months' notice to quit, or of his intention of quitting, as the case may be, on any day of the year." It is said that that cuts down the yearly tenancy; that there is no express statement that there is a tenancy from year to year; that there is only an implication of such, and that the implication is cut down by the words "three calendar months' notice to quit, or of his intention of quitting, as the case may be, on any day of the year." Taking this agreement as a whole (as I do), is the true interpretation this—that there is a tenancy from three months to three months at a yearly rent with a three months' notice to quit, or is there a tenancy from year to year with a yearly rent superadded to that three months' notice to quit? I will only cite what Cotton, L.J., said in the case of In re Threlfall. It fits in with what I am saying here. He said: "I know of no law or principle to prevent two persons agreeing that a yearly tenancy may be determined on whatever notice they like." I agree with that, and I think that that is what is done here. I think that it is perfectly clear from this agreement that it is a yearly tenancy, but there is superadded by bargain between the parties that either party may give the other three months' notice to quit; and, therefore, looking at this agreement as a whole, it is perfectly clear that King was a tenant from year to year within the meaning of the Act of 1895 and the interpretation clause in the Act of 1883.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case the main points turn upon the construction of a certain document. Now, when we look at the agreement it appears to me that, unless we are absolutely estopped by authority binding upon this court, there really is not much difficulty about it. Here Mrs. Eversfield lets and the tenant hires from the 29th of September, 1886, a piece of ground at a certain rent of so much a year, payable quarterly, on the four usual quarterly days for payment of rent in every year. Now, that contemplated that there would be a tenancy not only for one year, but from year to year. It did not contemplate in the first instance a rent payable in one quarter or another, but that in every year a yearly rent was to be paid. "And the tenant agrees to pay the said rent at the times aforesaid and to use the said premises as garden ground only, and to manure, crop, and cultivate the same in a husbandlike manner." What is the meaning of that? Was King tenant only for three months? The parties never thought that. They thought that he would have a year in which he was not only to manure the land, but to gather the fruits of it. It is idle to suppose that they were contemplating a three months' tenancy or a tenancy from three months to three months. There was nothing else in their minds so far as we have gone than a year to year tenancy. Then comes the clause: "It is hereby agreed that the said tenancy may be determined by either party giving to the other three calendar months' notice to quit, or of his intention of quitting, as the case may be, on any day of the year." It is suggested, I daresay rightly, that it is not to be supposed that the relation of landlord and tenant would come to an end unless there was some considerable reason for it, but that the land might be wanted for other purposes. If there be no overriding authority I decline to accept that as proving that the tenancy was not what, from the rest of the document, I should say it plainly was. But then authorities have been cited. There are two, Kemp v. Derrett, 3 Camp. 510, and King v. Grafton, 18 Q. B. 496, and in each case the question was practically the same—namely, whether a notice to quit which had been given was a good notice or not, there being a tenancy from year to year. The parties had agreed in plain, undoubted language that the notice which had been given should be a good notice, and I confess that I find a difficulty in following the argument on the other side. But it appears to have been this, that whether you agree to the contrary or not, a year to year tenancy involved of necessity—as a matter of law which could not be varied at all by the agreement of the parties—that the notice must be given at the expiration of the year. Lord Ellenborough in one case and Lord Campbell in the other, use certain phrases which are not necessary to the determination of the case, but obiter dicta altogether, and they appear to have given more weight than I should have thought was deserved, to that objection. I will not say that they accepted it. But the Court of Appeal lays down in In re Threlfall the law that the parties under a yearly lease, may enter into any bargain they please as to the notice that may be given, even to the extent in that case of enabling the lessor to come in and say, "It shall be determined at once." They recognize that that was possible, and we are bound by it. You must look to the whole agreement and see what it means, and if an agreement that a notice other than a six months' notice, is consistent with a yearly tenancy, there is no further difficulty. I hold that it is. I might go on to say that if it depended upon technicalities I should by no means allow this case to go by without enquiring what was the tenancy after the expiration of the first year, and then I think that I could bring in the old doctrine that you can consolidate the time that has passed by and have a term of years, but really the point is decided upon the construction of the agreement.

Now, is there anything in the Act contrary to that? The Act does not refer to a tenancy from year to year possessing every incident of an ordinary tenancy from year to year. It does not say "This Act shall not apply to the case where a tenant may be turned out by bargain with his landlord." Nothing of the kind. If I found in the Act anything saying in plain language, "A tenant is not to be entitled to the privileges of the Act if he can be turned out under less than the notice which is given in a year to year tenancy," I should be bound by it. But there is nothing of the kind, and, indeed, it is rather peculiar to see that in clause 33, which was cited, the Legislature seems to recognize that for the purposes of that Act there may be year to year tenancies determinable on other than the ordinary notice. Section 33 says: "Where a half-year's notice, expiring with a year of tenancy, is by law necessary and sufficient for determination of a tenancy from year to year, in the case of any such tenancy under a contract of tenancy made either before or after the commencement of this Act, a year's notice so expiring shall, by virtue of this Act, be necessary and sufficient for the same, unless the landlord and tenant of the holding, by writing under their hands, agree that this section shall not apply, in which case a half-year's notice shall continue to be sufficient"—seeming thus to distinguish between other cases where by law it might not be necessary at all.

COURT v. BERLIN AND OTHERS. (a.)

Partnership—Dissolution—Retainer of solicitor to conduct action—Retirement of dormant partner—Costs incurred subsequent to dissolution—Liability of dormant partner—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), ss. 17 (2), 36 (3).

A solicitor was retained by the managing partner in a firm to bring an action to recover a debt due to the firm. The firm consisted of the managing partner and two dormant partners. While the action was proceeding the partnership was dissolved, the dormant partners retiring from the firm. The solicitor, who did not know that the dormant partners were members of the firm, nor of the dissolution of partnership, continued the action, and judgment was recovered. In an action by the solicitor against the three partners upon his bill of costs,

Held, that the dormant partners were liable for the costs incurred subsequently to the dissolution of partnership.

Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (Wills and Grantham, JJ.).

The action was brought by a solicitor against three defendants upon his bill of costs.

The defendants had been the three partners in a firm carrying on business under the name of "I. Berlin."

Two of the defendants, Brook and Benjamin, were dormant partners, the other defendant, Idel Berlin, being the managing partner.

The plaintiff was retained by Idel Berlin to bring an action to recover a debt due to the firm, and commenced an action accordingly.

While the action was proceeding the partnership was dissolved, and the defendants, Brook and Benjamin, retired from the firm.

The plaintiff, who did not know that Brook and Benjamin were members of the firm, and had received no notice and did not know of the dissolution of partnership, continued the action, and judgment was recovered on behalf of the firm. The plaintiff then discovered that Brook and Benjamin had been partners in the firm, and sued the three defendants for the costs incurred in that action.

The defendants Brook and Benjamin contended that they were not liable for any costs incurred after the date of the dissolution of partnership.

Upon an application for judgment under order 14 the master ordered that the bill of costs should be taxed and that the taxing-master should decide all questions under the Partnership Act, 1890.

The taxing-master held that Brook and Benjamin were not liable for the costs incurred after the dissolution of partnership.

The Divisional Court, upon motion to vary the taxing-master's certificate, affirmed his decision.

The plaintiff appealed.

A. Powell, for the plaintiff.—A retainer to a solicitor to conduct a common law action is a retainer to conduct it to the end: Underwood v. Lewis, 42 W. R. 517, [1894] 2 Q. B. 306. It is an entire contract, and the solicitor cannot stop in the middle of the action without good reason. The plaintiff was duly retained on behalf of all the partners, and, though the two dormant partners, Brook and Benjamin, might perhaps have been entitled to give the plaintiff notice not to go on with the action after the dissolution of partnership at their expense, the plaintiff, not having received such notice, was entitled to go on with the action, and the two partners are liable for the costs incurred after that date. By section 17, sub-section 2, of the Partnership Act, 1890, a retiring partner does not thereby cease to be liable for partnership debts or obligations incurred before his retirement. The contract with the plaintiff was an obligation incurred before the dissolution.

E. Clayton, for the defendants Brook and Benjamin.—By section 36, sub-section 3, of the Partnership Act, 1890, the estate of a partner who, not having been known to the person dealing with the firm to be a partner, retires from the firm, is not liable for partnership debts contracted after the date of the retirement. The liability for these costs was incurred after the date of the retirement of the dormant partners, and therefore they are not liable, and there was no necessity to give notice of the dissolution of the partnership.

He referred to Whitehead v. Lord, 7 Ex. 691.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff was retained to bring an action to recover a debt due to the partnership—that is, a debt due to the three partners. Two of the partners were dormant partners. The difference as regards the public between the position of a dormant partner and the position of a partner who is not dormant is that the former's name is not known or published to the world as a partner in the firm. Idel Berlin was the managing partner in the firm, and he had authority from his position as managing partner to bind his co-partners by contracts entered into by him for the purpose of carrying on the business of the firm. For the purpose of carrying on the business of the firm it was necessary to recover debts due to the firm. In order to recover debts it is necessary to bring actions, and the usual mode of bringing actions is to employ a solicitor to do so. Therefore these dormant partners gave Idel Berlin authority to bring an action to recover the debt due to the firm, and to employ a solicitor on the ordinary terms. The ordinary terms in the case of a common law action are that the solicitor should institute the proceedings and conduct them to their termination. The retainer is an entire contract to conduct the action to the end. It is not necessary that the solicitor should come for instructions at each step in the proceedings. The defendants therefore employed this solicitor to carry on the proceedings to their termination. During the course of the proceedings the two defendants, Brook and Benjamin, retired from the partnership. Having employed the solicitor, who was bound to go on with the action until the end, the retiring partners cannot now say that they are not liable for the costs incurred subsequent to the dissolution. It is possible that they might have given the solicitor notice that he must not continue the action at their expense; but certainly without that notice they cannot escape liability for the costs incurred subsequently to the dissolution, the contract being an entire contract to carry on the action to the end. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The retainer of a solicitor in a common law action is an entire contract to carry on the action to its termination. This action was commenced under such a retainer, and in the result judgment was recovered for the partnership debt. The plaintiff then ascertained that Brook and Benjamin were dormant partners in the firm, and that they had retired from the firm during the progress of the action. The plaintiff brought this action against the three partners to recover the amount of his bill of costs.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants Brook and Benjamin contend that they are not liable for the items of the bill of costs incurred subsequently to the date of the dissolution of partnership. It is said that the Divisional Court upheld this contention upon the ground that the liability for costs arose de die in diem as they were incurred. If they so held, I can only say that they were wrong. The employment of a solicitor in a common law action is, as was said in Underwood v. Lewis, an entire contract to conduct the action to its termination. A solicitor in a common law action cannot, without good cause, throw up his retainer in the middle of the action and sue for the costs incurred. Then comes this question, Can these two members of the firm say that the solicitor had ceased to carry on the action on their behalf after the date of their retirement? It seems to me clear that they cannot do so without having given the solicitor notice to that effect. I am inclined to think that it was open to them to give notice to the solicitor that after a certain date he was not to carry on the action on their credit. Is is not necessary to decide that point, for in this case no such notice was given. The plaintiff is therefore entitled as against all there defendants to recover upon his bill of costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 36, sub-section 3, of the Partnership Act, 1890, was relied upon by the respondents as relieving them from liability for the costs incurred subsequent to the dissolution of partnership, upon the ground that the debt was a partnership debt contracted after the date of their retirement. That is not so. The plaintiff's retainer was to sue for a partnership debt. The contract upon the retainer was an entire contract to conduct the action to its termination, and fresh instructions were not necessary from time to time. I do not say that the defendants could not have given notice to the plaintiff that he was not to carry on the action on their credit, but they gave no such notice.

Doe v. Massey, 17 Q. B. 373, questioned.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Thomas Thornton, against the judgment of Grantham, J., before whom the action was tried without a jury. He found the facts in favour of the defendants and gave judgment for them accordingly.

The writ was issued on the 25th of July, 1896. By his statement of claim the plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was entitled as tenant in common in fee to one equal undivided moiety of certain premises known as the Foresters' Arms, with the garden and outbuildings thereto belonging, and the rights of way and other privileges enjoyed therewith. He also claimed partition of the said premises in accordance with the above declaration. In the statement of claim it was stated that by an indenture dated the 24th of June, 1890, and made between W. H. Thornton of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, the said W. H. Thornton being duly seized of and entitled to the premises comprised therein, duly conveyed to the plaintiff in fee simple the undivided moiety, half part, share, and interest of him the said W. H. Thornton of and in the said premises; and that the said conveyance to the plaintiff was by the said indenture expressed to be subject to the principal moneys and interest secured to one Joe Robinson by an indenture of mortgage dated the 11th of June, 1886. It was further stated in the claim that all moneys payable under the said indenture of mortgage had been paid and discharged by the plaintiff, who now claimed to be entitled in fee simple free from all incumbrances to an undivided moiety of the said premises.

By their defence the defendants, Annie France, widow, and Joseph Berry, who were the trustees of the will of one Joel France, stated that they were in possession of the said premises. For a further defence they stated that the said premises, and other premises adjoining the same, were, in or about 1856, vested in the three daughters of one Thomas Senior and one Harriet Hallas her heirs or assigns as tenants in common, and that the said parties, in or about 1856, affected a partition of the said premises, whereby the premises mentioned in the statement of claim became vested in severalty in the said three daughters of Thomas Senior and were exclusively held, occupied, and enjoyed by them and their successors in title in severalty and not as tenants in common until 1893, when by deed dated the 14th of February, 1893, and made between Henry France and others, and Joel France, all the estate and interest of the said three daughters of Thomas Senior, of and in the said premises were conveyed to the said Joel France in fee simple. They further stated that Joel France died on the 31st of May, 1896, having by his will devised the said premises to them the defendants. In the alternative the defendants stated that on the 24th of June, 1890—i.e., the date of the conveyance under which the plaintiff claimed, the said premises were vested in Ann France, Hannah Thornton, and Mary Kaye in fee simple as tenants in common, for that for more than twelve years next before the said 24th of June, 1890, the said parties had as to the said Ann France and Hannah Thornton by themselves, and as to the said Mary Kaye by herself, and her predecessor in title and by the tenants of the said parties, openly claimed, held, and enjoyed the several and exclusive possession and enjoyment of the entirety of the said premises mentioned in the statement of claim, and the rents and profits thereof, as sole owners, and thereby by virtue of the Statutes of Limitation, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, had acquired a possessory and exclusive title in fee simple to the said premises; and that they granted and conveyed the same to the said Joel France who devised the same to the defendants as aforesaid. As a further alternative the defendants stated that if contrary to their contention the plaintiff was entitled to an undivided moiety of and in the said premises, and if the defendants' interest therein did not extend beyond the other undivided moiety thereof, then the said premises were so enjoyed under and by virtue of a deed of November, 1834, whereby a plot of land, part of which was now the said premises mentioned in the statement of claim, was conveyed to and settled upon one Susannah Senior for life, and on her death as to one moiety to Thomas Senior for life, and after his death to the use of his heirs and assigns, and as to the other moiety to Harriet Hallas and her heirs and assigns. The defendants stated that all the estate and interest of the said Harriet Hallas and her heirs and assigns had become vested in the plaintiff, and all the estate and interest of the heirs and assigns of the said Thomas Senior had become vested in the defendants, and that the plaintiff and defendants were interested in the whole of the said premises as tenants in common. The defendants claimed in the alternative by way of counter-claim a sale of the whole of the said premises under the provisions of the Partition Act, 1868, s. 3, 4, or 5. By his reply the plaintiff did not admit that the defendants had any estate or interest in the premises described in the last-mentioned paragraph as being occupied by the plaintiff. The plaintiff submitted that the defendants had no right to maintain their counter-claim for the aforesaid partition.

Scott Fox and R. Younger appeared on behalf of the plaintiff.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and H. Manisty, for the defendants.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the following written judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 3.—The judgment of the Court (Lord ESHER, M.R., A. L. SMITH and CHITTY, L.JJ.) was read by CHITTY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff, Thomas Thornton, against the judgment of Grantham, J., before whom the action was tried without a jury. He found the facts in favour of the defendants and gave judgment for them accordingly.

The writ was issued on the 25th of July, 1896. By his statement of claim the plaintiff claimed a declaration that he is entitled as tenant in common in fee to an equal undivided moiety of the Foresters' Arms with the gardens and outbuildings thereto belonging, and the rights of way and other privileges enjoyed therewith; and he asked for a partition on the footing of this declaration.

On the plan produced at the trial, and admitted to be substantially accurate, the property claimed is coloured green; it includes the Foresters' Arms, which is a beerhouse, the garden, and also a field. The other property shown on the plan is coloured as to the greater part yellow; the remainder is coloured pink. The property coloured yellow consists of a cottage (which appears to be known as Hallas' Cottage) adjoining the Foresters' Arms, of a garden at the back of the cottage divided by a hedge from the garden of the Foresters' Arms, and of garden-ground adjacent to the field coloured green. The Foresters' Arms and Hallas' Cottage are about the same size, and the green garden and field are approximately of the same area as the gardens coloured yellow. The Foresters' Arms by reason of its licence is now of greater value than Hallas' Cottage. The Foresters' Arms and the cottage both front towards the Bradshaw-road, the entrance to the former being from the front, and to the latter from the back by a way over part of the green. There is no contest in the action about this way to the cottage, nor about the well or the washhouse coloured pink on the plan. When the writ was issued, the plaintiff was in possession of the yellow, and the defendants were in possession of the green.

By their defence the defendants, who are the trustees of the will of Joel France, relied on possession of themselves and their predecessors in title and on the Statute of Limitations. They also set up a presumed agreement in 1856 to partition the property shown on the plan, and an actual division of the property into the green and the yellow in that year, and the exclusive possession of the green since that year by themselves and their predecessors in title. These were the main grounds of their defence. But, if these grounds failed, they counter-claimed in the alternative for a partition of the yellow. By his reply the plaintiff did not admit that the defendants had any interest in the yellow, and submitted that the defendants had no right to maintain their counter-claim for a partition of the yellow. The result is that the plaintiff, in effect, claimed the entirety of the yellow, and an undivided moiety of the green; and that the defendants claimed no interest in the yellow except in the event of the plaintiff succeeding in his claim to the green. If the plaintiff fails to establish his claim to a partition of the green, the action wholly fails.

So far as concerns the documentary title, and apart from the Statute of Limitations, the plaintiff and the defendants derive title from Susannah Senior, who died in 1856. She bought the land in 1834, and by her direction it was conveyed to her for life with remainder as to one undivided moiety to the use of her son Thomas for life, and, after his death, of his heirs and assigns, and as to the other undivided moiety to the use of her daughter Harriet Hallas, her heirs and assigns. Subject, therefore, to the life estate of Susannah Senior, the son and daughter each took under this settlement an undivided moiety in fee. Susannah Senior never in fact occupied any part of the property herself, at all events after the two cottages were built. She built them in 1835 or 1836. Thereupon she put her son Thomas into possession of the cottage for which he afterwards obtained a licence, and now called the Foresters' Arms, and of the garden and field coloured green; and put her daughter Harriet into possession of the cottage known as Hallas' Cottage and the gardens coloured yellow. On the documentary title the plaintiff claims under Harriet and the defendants under Thomas.

Following out the title, apart from the Statute of Limitations, it stands thus. Thomas died in 1853, during his mother's lifetime, intestate, leaving three daughters his co-heiresses and a widow. The defendants' case is that the three co-heiresses and the widow continued after the death of Thomas Senior in the exclusive possession of the Foresters' Arms and ground until the conveyance of the 14th of February, 1893. By deed of that date the co-heiresses conveyed all their estate and interest in the Foresters' Arms and grounds to Joel France. The defendants are his devisees. The plaintiff, as I have said, claims under Harriet Hallas. On the 8th of April, 1865, she conveyed, or purported to convey, her undivided moiety in the entirety of the property to Hathorn and Owen by way of mortgage, and in 1866 they transferred the mortgage to Owen and Stocks. In February, 1875, the heir of the mortgagor, Harriet Hallas, conveyed the Hallas moiety to William Henry Thornton, and the transferee of the mortgage joined in the conveyance for the purpose of receiving the mortgage-money and passing the legal estate. On the 11th of June, 1886, William H. Thornton mortgaged this undivided moiety to Joe Robinson. In June, 1890, William H. Thornton sold his equity of redemption to the plaintiff; and by deed dated the 24th of June, 1890, he conveyed to the plaintiff in fee his undivided moiety in the entirety, subject to the mostgage of 1886 then subsisting and outstanding in Joe Robinson. It was alleged on the part of the plaintiff that, some time before the issue of the writ, and, as we understand, in 1892, the plaintiff had paid off this mortgage; and, as we gather, this allegation was not contested at the trial. The plaintiff, however, had not obtained a reconveyance before the trial. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff on the appeal that he has since obtained it. Joe Robinson is not a party to the suit. At the trial the plaintiff asked for leave to add him as a co-plaintiff, but the judge refused to allow the amendment.

The judgment appealed from proceeds on the footing that the claim of the plaintiff is barred by the Statutes of Limitation (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27) and the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, which came into operation on the 1st of January, 1879. A strong body of evidence was produced at the trial to show that the two properties had been separately possessed and enjoyed as separate properties by Thomas Senior and his successors in title as to the green, and by Mrs. Hallas and her successors as to the yellow. The evidence carried back the separate possession to the date of the cottages being built. On this issue of fact the learned judge held in favour of the defendants, and he carried back the separate possession for fifty or sixty years. We see no reason for differing from him on his general finding. The points raised on the facts against this finding are, in our opinion, wholly insufficient to justify us in disturbing it. It was urged that in 1876 William H. Thornton did some repairs on the Foresters' Arms; but, whatever he may have done, it was of the most trifling description: he was repairing the Hallas' cottage, and may have done some slight work on the front windows of the Foresters' Arms. With this exception, which we consider of no importance, the evidence was clear that the repairs to the separate properties were done by the separate possessors for the time being.

The main question on the appeal turns on the statutes above referred to, and the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28. The learned judge appears to have held that what may be termed the Hallas title was barred in 1865. This opinion would be founded on the 12th section of the Act of William 4, which abolished the old doctrine that the possession of one tenant in common was the possession of all except where ouster was proved; and on the 34th section, which transfers the estate which is barred. But in 1865 twenty years had not run since the death of Susannah Senior, who died in 1856. On her death the right of entry of Mrs. Hallas arose under the settlement. On this point we were asked by the defendants' counsel to draw an inference of fact that the partition was agreed to and acted upon in the lifetime of Susannah Senior, and that, as part of this transaction, she surrendered to her son and daughter her life estate. As authorities for such an inference we were referred to Tidbald v. James, 29 L. J. Ex. 91, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 27, as explained by Monaghan, C.J., in Murphy v. Murphy, 15 Ir. C. L. Rep. 205, 214, on the authority of Martin, B. We think, however, that this case can be decided without entering upon the consideration of drawing the inference suggested, and in the rest of our judgment we shall assume that the statute had not run against the plaintiff's title on the 8th of April, 1865, when Harriet Hallas made the mortgage to Hathorn and Owen.

Now, the argument for the plaintiff is this. Although the statute had been running against Mrs. Hallas for some nine years or so, when the mortgage of 1865 was executed the statute is said to have ceased to run as against the mortgagees; and that, inasmuch as William H. Thornton took his conveyance in 1875 from the mortgagor and the transferee of the mortgage, he was a "person claiming under a mortgage of land" within the meaning of the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28, notwithstanding that the mortgage was then paid off and had ceased to exist. A similar argument was presented in reference to the plaintiff's later title. It was contended that, although the statute may have begun again to run against William H. Thornton in 1875, and although it had been running for some eleven years in 1886 (the twelve years' limitation was then in operation), it ceased to run or was stopped by his mortgage to Joe Robinson; and that, inasmuch as the plaintiff has paid off Joe Robinson, he also is a "person claiming under a mortgage of land" within the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28. In support of these propositions Doe v. Eyre, 17 Q. B. 366, and Doe v. Massey, 17 Q. B. 373, were cited.

To succeed the plaintiff must make out these contentions. The argument when pushed to its extreme, but legitimate, length comes to this: that, where a man's title to land is on the point of being barred, all he has to do is to execute a mortgage of the land, say, just before the statute has run, and then subsequently at his own time to pay off the mortgage; and thereby he would prevent the statute from running in favour of the person in possession until the expiration of the further statutory period after the mortgage has been paid off. In other words, the contention is that by execution of the mortgage a new right of entry is conferred, which passes to the mortgagor himself when he pays off the mortgage. For the purpose of the statutes under consideration we are unable to see any distinction between the case of a man taking a conveyance from a mortgagor alone, and afterwards paying off the mortgage, and the case of a man taking a conveyance of the land, and then mortgaging and afterwards paying off the mortgage.

The reason for the passing of the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28, and the effect and construction of the Act have frequently been considered by the courts, notably in Eyre v. Walsh, 10 Ir. C. L. Rep. 346, and Heath v. Pugh, 29 W. R. 904, 6 Q. B. D. 345. The reason, stated broadly, was that it was doubted whether the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, regard being had to the 2nd section, had not put the mortgagee as between himself and the mortgagor in a worse position than he was prior to the passing of that statute. The language of the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28, is as follows. [The Lord Justice here read the statute.]

The question in Heath v. Pugh related to the effect of a foreclosure decree. The judgment of the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Selborne and Baggallay, L.J., and the present Master of the Rolls, was delivered by Lord Selborne, and was affirmed by the House of Lords in Pugh v. Heath, 30 W. R. 553, 7

App. Cas. 235. After referring to the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and 7 Will. 4, and 1 Vict. c. 28, Lord Selborne examined the nature of the mortgagor's possession before those statutes. He said: "The possession of the mortgaged land by the mortgagor, during the subsistence of the security, and while the mortgagee did not choose to take possession, was held (at law as well as in equity) to be at the will or by the sufferance or permission of the mortgagee under a tacit agreement which the mortgagee might determine at his pleasure. It was of the nature of the transaction that the mortgagor should continue in possession." He proceeded to point out that in the former Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, s. 16) did not, under the circumstances of such a possession by the mortgagor, run against the mortgagee. Then, coming to the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28, he said that it did not itself create a bar in any case in which it had not been already created by the Act which it explains: "it only declares (in conformity, and with manifest reference to the rule which had before prevailed in equity) that nothing in that Act shall bar the title of a mortgagee (continuing to be such) who has received any payment on account of principal or interest from the persons entitled to the equity of redemption within twenty years before the commencement of any action or suit." According to this judgment, which is of the highest authority, to bring the case within the statute 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28, the mortgage must be a continuing or subsisting mortgage. In Doe v. Eyre the action was by the mortgagee. The mortgage was executed before the passing of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and there was no adverse possession by the defendant at the time when the mortgage was executed, or when the Act was passed. The defendant had been permitted by her brother, the mortgagor, to reside on the property without payment of rent. In Doe v. Massey, again, there was no adverse possession at the time when the mortgage was executed. The mortgage had been paid off. Child, through whom the plaintiff claimed, bought the property from the mortgagor, and the mortgagee joined in the conveyance for the purpose of receiving the money due on the mortgage and conveying the legal estate to the purchaser. This is plain from the statement of the conveyance at p. 375 of the report, showing that Wilson, the mortgagor, was the directing party. It was held that the plaintiff "claimed under a mortgage" within the statute. If this decision is right, it would, apart from the point of adverse possession at the date of the mortgage, apply to the purchase deed of William H. Thornton in February, 1875, so that the statute would not have run against him till February, 1887; but it would not apply to the later title of the plaintiff, who in no possible sense of the term as used in the statute, could be said to claim under a mortgage until he paid off Robinson's mortgage in 1892, when the statute had already run against the plaintiff. The decision in Doe v. Massey may be open to some question as being inconsistent with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Heath v. Pugh, that to be within the Act the mortgage must be a subsisting mortgage. But, whether questionable or not, the decision does not govern the present case. In our opinion the plaintiff does not claim under a mortgage within the meaning of the Act 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 28. Further, we think that that Act does not confer a new right of entry on the mortgagee where, at the time of making the mortgage, a man is in possession holding adversely to the mortgagor, and the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, has already begun to run in his favour against the mortgagor. We can see no reason for giving so extensive a construction to an Act which was passed to remove a doubt—a construction which would tend in a large measure to undo the principal Act. The decision in this case will not in any degree imperil the rights of mortgagees. No person of ordinary prudence would advance his money on mortgage of land where the mortgagor claims an estate in possession without first ascertaining that the mortgagor is in possession or in receipt of the rents.

To avoid misapprehension we add that the plaintiff is in no worse position because Robinson was not added as a plaintiff. As the plaintiff was suing for a partition, he was entitled to maintain the action on his equitable title (unless barred); the objection that Robinson was not a party was at the utmost merely an objection for want of parties. The plaintiff's equitable title fell within the bar of the 24th section of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27. For these reasons we think the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

PLANT v. BOURNE. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract—Specific performance—Identity of parcels—Uncertainty—Statute of Frauds—Admissibility of extrinsic evidence.

By agreement in writing P. agreed to sell and B. to purchase "twenty-four acres of land freehold, and all appurtenances thereto, at T., in the parish of D., in the county of S." In an action for specific performance of the contract the plaintiff proposed to call evidence to show that the land intended to be sold was the land of that acreage belonging to the plaintiff at the place named.

Held (reversing Byrne, J., 45 W. R. 498), that, on the authority of Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 Mer. 53, and Shardlow v. Cotterell, 30 W. R. 143, 20 Ch. D. 90, parol evidence was admissible to show what land formed the subject-matter of the contract.

Appeal of the plaintiff from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported 45 W. R. 498).

The vendor brought an action for specific performance of the following written agreement for the sale of land, made between the plaintiff and defendant, and signed by both parties. "An agreement made the 12th day of February, 1896, between Robert Plant, of Putney, in the county of Surrey, gentleman, of the one part, and Robert Henry Bourne, of Trentham, in the county of Stafford, stationmaster, of the other part. The said Robert Plant agrees to sell, and the said Robert Henry Bourne agrees to purchase, at the price of £5,000, twenty-four acres of land freehold, and all appurtenances thereto, at Totmonslow, in the parish of Draycott, in the county of Stafford, and all the mines and minerals thereto appertaining; possession to be had on the 25th of March next, the vendor guaranteeing possession accordingly."

The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of a freehold piece of land in Totmonslow containing 24a. 1r. 26p., with which the defendant was well acquainted, and that the defendant had, before signing the agreement, on the same day, gone by appointment over the land with the plaintiff and had carefully examined it.

At the trial counsel proposed to give evidence of these statements. This was objected to by counsel for the defendant on the ground that the contract contained no such description or indication of the property as would satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and that extrinsic evidence could not be given to supply the want of description.

Byrne, J., held that the memorandum of agreement failed to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and would not allow extrinsic evidence to be given; he consequently dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Eve, Q.C., and J. Rolt, for the appellant.—Parol evidence can be adduced to show with certainty what was intended by a general description of the property: Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 Mer. 53; Shardlow v. Cotterell, 30 W. R. 143, 20 Ch. D. 90. [They were stopped by the court.]

Astbury, Q.C., and A. J. Chitty, for the respondent.—The memorandum must contain a reference to the property, so that it can afterwards be identified by the memorandum. In Shardlow v. Cotterell there was only one property owned by the plaintiff and the agreement left no doubt as to what was sold or purchased. A clear principle underlies all the cases; when extrinsic evidence has been received as to the property, the contract must then be referred to for the terms. This memorandum comes to nothing more than this: "I agree to sell you land—somewhere," and that is not sufficient. There is nothing in the contract to say that it is the vendor's land; it is simply a contract to sell twenty-four acres in the parish of Totmonslow.

The following cases were referred to: Rossiter v. Miller, 26 W. R. 865, 3 App. Cas. 1124, 1140; Potter v. Duffield, 22 W. R. 585, L. R. 18 Eq. 4; Bateman v. Phillips, 15 East, 272; Macdonald v. Longbottom, 7 W. R. 507, 1 E. & E. 977.

No reply was called for.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am not able to take the same view which the learned judge has taken of this agreement. It is a formal agreement between two persons who are named, and it runs thus: [His lordship read the agreement, and continued:]. Now, the objection to this agreement is that it does not specify in terms what twenty-four acres of freehold land at Totmonslow the agreement refers to; and it is said that this is a fatal objection. The answer to it is this. The plaintiff says: "I am at liberty to show by extrinsic evidence to what twenty-four acres this agreement has reference—what we were talking about, and what was the subject-matter of our treaty; and if I am at liberty to show that, then there is no difficulty in identifying the property about which we were talking, or to which this document relates." The learned judge has held that that evidence cannot be admitted. The judge, of course, has said that parol evidence is often necessary in order to identify the property which has to be conveyed, or which has to be dealt with, whatever the description is. You must find it out, and you must have evidence to show the property which is referred to. But, conceding that, he felt this difficulty, and came to the conclusion that although parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of identifying the property, you must have the property to be identified more accurately ascertained in language than it is by this document. I think that is the most forcible way of putting the objection, and that is the pith and substance of Mr. Astbury's argument. Now, to what extent is that sound? That depends upon the Statute of Frauds, and of course upon the decisions upon it. [His lordship then read the 4th section.]

As early as 1817 Sir William Grant had before him the case of Ogilvie v. Foljambe. That was a case in which property was agreed to be sold, and was described as "Mr. Ogilvie's house," and Sir William Grant said (3 Mer. 61): "The subject-matter of the agreement is left, indeed, to be ascertained from extrinsic evidence; and for that purpose such evidence may be received. The defendant speaks of 'Mr. Ogilvie's house,' and agrees to give £14,000 for the premises, and parol evidence has always been admitted in such a case so show to what house and to what premises the treaty related."

Now, if you once admit parol evidence to show to what twenty-four acres of land this agreement related, it appears to me the whole difficulty vanishes. The evidence sought to be adduced, and to which the learned judge objected, was this, that there were only twenty-four acres at Totmonslow, in the parish of Draycott, belonging to the vendor, about which the purchaser had any treaty at all. There is no ambiguity about it. There was a field of about 24a. 1r. 26p., which was perfectly well known to both of them. They had been walking round it in the morning, we will suppose, some time before this agreement was drawn up, and it was that property about which they were negotiating. That is the evidence the plaintiff is seeking to introduce. We have Sir William Grant's authority for introducing that; and if you introduce that, it appears to me that nothing further can possibly be desired. The decision of Sir William Grant has always been considered as a leading authority on the Statute of Frauds. It was never appealed against and it was commented upon, and adopted in the case of Shardlow v. Cotterell, to which our attention has been called. There the question was with reference to identifying some property which was sold. The judgment of Lush, L.J., to my mind, conveys and expresses the principle which is applicable to the present case. He says (30 W. R. 143, 20 Ch. D. 98), referring to the decision of Kay, J., which was reversed: "Then in the concluding part of the judgment he says that he is not prepared to carry the law on this subject one hair's breadth beyond the decided cases, and that he thinks he should be doing so if he held the description in the present case to be sufficient. I cannot help thinking that this conclusion is opposed to legal principle. The general rule is, Id certum est quod certum reddi potest, and I am of opinion that this maxim applies here. In Ogilvie v. Foljambe parol evidence was wanted just as much as here to show what was the subject-matter of the contract." Now it seems to me that we should be simply splitting hairs and introducing a distinction without a difference if we adopted the view which Mr. Astbury has pressed upon us, and said that there is a substantial distinction between this and the two cases to which I have referred. Of course I see that there are differences, but the question is, what are they worth? Now, is this or is it not a sufficient description, when you come to look at it, to let in this parol evidence to show what the agreement referred to? That there was an agreement is plain enough. What is it that the agreement refers to? The answer to that is, it was the twenty-four acres of freehold land which they were talking about. Evidence to show that, is admissible, and if that is once admitted there is an end of the case. I am of opinion this appeal should be allowed. As regards the costs, I notice, of course, that the evidence has not been gone into, and I observe the nature of the defence set up, as to which

I say nothing, but I think the right order will be to reverse the judgment which is appealed from, and make the costs of the appeal the plaintiff's costs in any event.

LOPES, L.J.—If parol evidence is admissible, beyond all question in my judgment there is no difficulty in identifying what was intended to be sold, and the question then is, What was the subject-matter of the contract?

Now, the material words in the contract are these: "Twenty-four acres of land freehold and all appurtenances thereto, at Totmonslow, in the parish of Draycott, in the county of Stafford," and at the end there is "the vendor guaranteeing possession accordingly." Now, it is said that that is too vague, and that parol evidence is not admissible to show to what it relates. It is admitted, and the learned judge seems to think that if it had been "the" twenty-four acres, that would have been sufficient, and Mr. Astbury would be bound to admit, I think, that if it had been "my" twenty-four acres that would have been sufficient.

Now, how does the matter really stand? In the case of Ogilvie v. Foljambe it was said the question is as to what the treaty related, and if parol evidence can be produced to show to what the treaty related, that is sufficient.

Now, if parol evidence can be produced to show here to what this contract related—namely, to these twenty-four acres, then it seems to me that there is an end of the case. It is clear to my mind that it does, because it appears that the vendor had only one twenty-four acres in this parish, at this place, and that on the very morning when this contract was signed they walked over this land and discussed the matter.

With regard to the case of Shardlow v. Cotterell the words in that case were "property purchased for £420 at Sun Inn, Pinxton, on the above date," which was the 29th of March. It was there held that that was a sufficient description in the memorandum, and that parol evidence could be produced to show what property was intended. I cannot distinguish that case in principle from the case we are dealing with. There may be minor differences of detail and so on but in principle I think they are substantially the same. I think, therefore, the decision of the learned judge in this case was wrong, and must be reversed. I agree with what has been said by Lindley, L.J., about the costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—I concur. I think the case is governed by the principles enunciated in Ogilvie v. Foljambe, where it was laid down by Sir William Grant, M.R., that parol evidence has always been admitted in such a case as he had before him, to show to what house or to what premises the treaty related. I have had several cases of this kind before me and I never heard that decision questioned. I think the case is also governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Shardlow v. Cotterell, and I do not think it necessary to go through any of the particular facts in that case nor the judgment for the purpose of making good this opinion of mine. It has already been sufficiently dealt with, I think, by my learned brethren. Now there is no mystery about the Statute of Frauds. All that it requires is a memorandum in writing of the contract where the subject-matter is such as we are dealing with. That memorandum must be construed in a reasonable way as well as any other memorandum which is in writing to which the Statute of Frauds does not apply. Here the vendor, Plant, and the purchaser, Bourne, are sufficiently named and described, and we have Plant agreeing to sell at the price which is mentioned "twenty-four acres of land freehold and all appurtenances thereto at Totmonslow, in the parish of Draycott, in the county of Stafford," and so on, and then possession is to be given and the vendor guarantees possession to be given accordingly on the day mentioned. I am of opinion, reading that according to the ordinary and fair rules of construction, there is no ambiguity about it as it stands. I am unable to understand the argument that Plant was not selling his own twenty-four acres of land because, I think on the face of the document, that is the meaning of it, and if that is the meaning of it, it at once comes within the range of cases to which I have referred.

I think Mr. Plant means he is selling "the twenty-four acres we have been looking at" or "my twenty-four acres." It is not twenty-four acres of land anywhere in England, but the place, the county, and the parish are all mentioned. It would be refinement, and not promoting justice, if we were to hold this description fails because "my" is not to be found before the "twenty-four," or the definite article "the."

Assuming that the parol evidence comes up to what has been stated, the result would be this, that Mr. Plant has twenty-four acres lying within the metes and bounds sufficiently defined, and if the fact be ascertained that he had no other twenty-four acres, that would answer that description; then it would only be necessary to put the contract alongside that fact and the result would be ascertained that the twenty-four acres within the metes and bounds was the property that was intended to be included in this description. There will be no variation of the original contract, nor will there be any of the evils which were very forcibly pointed out to us arising from fraud or perjury; those will not be produced in this case more than in any other.

I am of opinion it is impossible to avoid fraud and perjury, even under the strictest conditions, and I think that this will not be opening the door to let in that fraud which has been suggested.

REG. v. MEAD (METROPOLITAN POLICE MAGISTRATE). Ex parte LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Metropolis — Building — Mandamus—Service of summons — Unknown owner — Dangerous structure — Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 1—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 188 (i.).

By section 188 of the London Building Act, 1894, it is enacted that any notice, order, or other document required or authorized to be served under that Act, the service of which is not provided for by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, the Lands Clauses Acts, or the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, may be served, among other ways, by delivering the same to some person on the premises to which it relates, or, if the premises are unoccupied, then by affixing a copy of the summons on some conspicuous part of the building.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The magistrate before whom a summons, addressed only "To the Owner" of certain premises, was returnable, refused to hear the summons in the absence of the defendant because the complainant failed to offer evidence either that he had made all reasonable inquiries to ascertain, before serving the summons in this way, who the owner of the premises was, or that, if such inquiries had been made, in all probability the owner would not have been found, or that the premises were in fact unoccupied.

Held, that, in the absence of such evidence, the procedure under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts must be followed, and that the magistrate was right in refusing to hear the summons.

This was the argument of a rule for a mandamus calling on Mr. Mead, a metropolitan police magistrate, to show cause why he should not hear and determine a summons obtained by the London County Council under section 107 of the London Building Act, 1894.

The facts were as follows: On the 23rd of September, 1897, the London County Council made a complaint to the magistrate in respect of a dangerous structure and obtained a summons which was returnable before Mr. Mead on the 1st of October. It was addressed "To the Owner" (of the premises) merely, and when the owner was called on to appear no one responded. The complainant thereupon proposed to proceed in the absence of the defendant, and, on the magistrate calling for proof of service of the summons, a constable gave evidence that he had affixed a copy of the summons upon a conspicuous part of the premises, which appeared to him to be unoccupied. The question was then raised whether such a summons on such evidence under section 107 of the London Building Act, 1894, could be served by being affixed to the premises. It was stated also by the complainants that the owner was unknown, but no further evidence was given that any steps had been taken to discover him. There was no evidence even that the valuation list or rate had been examined, or the rate collector interrogated, or other obvious means taken with a view to discover who was the last owner or occupier. The complainants contended that under the circumstances there had been a good service of the summons as required by section 188 of the Act under which these proceedings were instituted.

The magistrate, however, refused to hear the summons on two grounds: First, that the summons, even if anonymously addressed—i.e., "To the Owner"—was a document the service of which is provided for by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and must therefore be served under section 1 of Jervis' Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43) personally on the defendant or at his last known place of abode; and, secondly, that even if the service of a summons addressed "To the Owner" where the owner cannot be found, is not provided for by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, there should have been evidence before the court that reasonable diligence had been exercised by the complainant to discover the owner of the property in question.

Section 188 of the London Building Act, 1894, provides as follows:

"(i.) Any notice, order, or other document required or authorized to be served under this Act, the service of which is not provided for by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, the Lands Clauses Acts, or the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, may be served by delivering a copy thereof at or by sending a copy thereof by post in a registered letter to the usual or last known residence in the United Kingdom of the person to whom it is addressed, or by delivering the same to some person on the premises to which it relates, or, if no person can be found on the premises, then by fixing a copy thereof on some conspicuous part of the building."

"(3) Any notice by this Act required to be given to or served on the owner or occupier of any premises may be addressed by the description of the 'owner' or 'occupier' of the premises (naming the premises) in respect of which the notice is given or served without further name or description."

Sutton showed cause against the rule.—All proceedings under the dangerous structure sections of the London Building Act, 1894, must, as to service of a summons, follow Jervis' Act, unless the complainant can satisfy the magistrate that after all proper inquiries the owner cannot be found, and also, that the premises are unoccupied. In that event only the method of service provided for by section 188 of the Act of 1894 applies. There is no such evidence here, and therefore the service of the summons was bad. The case of Reg. v. Mead, 42 W. R. 442, [1894] 2 Q. B. 124, which was relied on when the rule was moved for, is an authority on another statute, for that case was decided under provisions in the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, which have no counterpart in the Act of 1894.

Avory, in support of the rule.—The London County Council do not dispute that in all cases where the owner is known this form of service of summons given by the Act of 1894 cannot be used alternatively with the procedure prescribed by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. Here the owner is not known, and to save delay, which in many cases might be attended with serious danger to the public were dangerous structures not at once taken down or secured, this speedy method of service of summons was expressly provided. A notice to an owner that his building is unsafe admittedly can be served in this way. I submit that it was the intention of the framers of the Act that in cases where delay would arise in finding out the name or address of the owner or occupier service of a summons by fixing the same to the premises must be treated as a good service by the magistrate on evidence that the name and address of the owner was not known to the complainant.

WRIGHT, J.—I think the magistrate was justified in refusing to hear this summons, on two grounds. First, because there was no evidence before him, so far as we know, that the premises were unoccupied at the time that the summons was affixed; but that, in my opinion, is a very small point. The second reason he put forward is, I think, far more important and of wider scope, and it is this, that in the present case there has been no such sufficient inquiry to find the owner as to entitle the London County Council to serve the summons in the manner prescribed by section 188 of the Act. The true construction of that section appears to me to be this: Where a person on whom it is desired to serve a summons can be identified by reasonable inquiry—not a prolonged or expensive inquiry, but an ordinary inquiry—then the procedure marked out by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts ought to be followed. If, on the other hand, an owner cannot be found after such an inquiry as, for instance, any police-constable knows how to make in cases of this sort, then the procedure marked out by section 188 may be followed. In other words, the complainant must be able to prove, first, that there has been a reasonable inquiry made; that after such inquiry he has failed to ascertain the owner; and, lastly, that the premises were unoccupied.

For these reasons I think the magistrate was right.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

GRAY (Appellant) v. SYLVESTER (Respondent). (a.)

Local government — Sanitary authority — Bye-law— Reasonableness—Prohibition of sales on foreshore.

A sanitary authority was empowered by a local Act to make bye-laws and regulations with reference to the sea-beach and foreshore in the district, which were vested in the sanitary authority for the purpose of public walks and pleasure grounds. Subsequently to the passing of the local Act a part of the foreshore was converted into an esplanade. The sanitary authority made a bye-law prohibiting the sale of any goods on any part of the sea-beach, foreshore, or esplanade, except by the direction of the sanitary authority.

Held, that the bye-law was not unreasonable or ultra vires.

Special case stated by justices for the county of Southampton.

An information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent at Ryde Petty Sessions, charging him with unlawfully selling a weekly newspaper on the Sandown Esplanade contrary to the bye-laws of the sanitary authority, the Sandown Urban District Council.

The justices dismissed the information subject to this case.

It was proved or admitted that the sea-beach and foreshore at Sandown were vested in the urban district council for the purposes of public walks or pleasure grounds by virtue of a provisional order of the Local Government Board duly confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (Caister Union, &c.) Act, 1877.

By section 7 of the same Act the Sandown Local Board were authorized (subject to the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875) to make bye-laws and regulations with reference to the sea-beach and foreshore along the whole frontage of their district. Subsequently to the passing of that Act the esplanade was made on part of the sea-beach or foreshore.

In pursuance of that section and of section 164 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the Sandown Local Board, then being the sanitary authority for the urban sanitary district of Sandown, in 1892 duly made certain bye-laws, of which the one in question was as follows:

"A person shall not on any part of the sea-beach, foreshore, or esplanades sell or offer or expose for sale any commodity or article, or let to hire, or offer or expose for hire any chair, seat, or other thing except by the direction of the sanitary authority, or in any such part or parts of the sea-beach, foreshore, or esplanades (if any) as the sanitary authority may by notice affix or set up thereon from time to time appoint for the purpose, and every person who shall offend against such bye-law shall be liable to a penalty."

The justices were of opinion that the bye-law was illegal, inconsistent, unreasonable, and repugnant to the law of England and that it did not enable the sanitary authority of Sandown to legalize a nuisance or to prohibit a lawful act which was not a nuisance.

Macmorran, Q.C., for the appellant.—The justices should have convicted the respondent. This bye-law is not unreasonable having regard to the subject-matter to which it is directed—viz., the regulation of public walks and pleasure grounds. The justices thought that they were bound to hold the bye-law ultra vires on the authority of Munro v. Watson, 57 L. T. Rep. 366, 36 W. R. Dig. 124, and Johnson v. Mayor of Croydon, 16 Q. B. D. 708, 34 W. R. Dig. 129. Those cases were decided under the Municipal Corporations Act, which authorizes the making of bye-laws for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances not otherwise unlawful (see Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 23). These decisions are no authority as to the validity of this bye-law, made under a different authority and directed to a different subject-matter.

C. A. Russell, Q.C. (Dunlop Hill with him), for the respondent.—In determining the validity of a bye-law the test is to see whether it goes beyond what is reasonably necessary for the protection required. The key-note of this urban district council's authority to make bye-laws, is regulation, not prohibition. This bye-law is far too wide. It absolutely prohibits all sales on the sea-shore except with the leave of the council. A bye-law to be valid in such a case as this must lay down and publish one rule for everybody, but under this bye-law licences may be granted or refused for different reasons which would not be made known to the public.

He cited Macdonald v. Lochrane, 51 J. P. 629; Strickland v. Hayes, 44 W. R. 398, [1896] 1 Q. B. 290.

LINDLEY, M.R.—In a case such as this the authorities are not very much use as a guide to the right decision. It is necessary in each case to look at the statutory authority under which the bye-law was made and at the language of the bye-law. Under a local Act, the local authority in this case were empowered to acquire the foreshore and lay out thereon an esplanade, and to make bye-laws and regulations with reference to the sea-beach and foreshore along the whole frontage of the district. Under that section the local authority have made the bye-law in question. The justices came to the conclusion that the bye-law was invalid as being more extensive than the circumstances of the case required. I am not prepared to go that length. In my opinion the bye-law is not unreasonable or ultra vires. The justices thought they were bound by the authority of certain decided cases, but those cases were decided under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the language of which is very different from that of this local Act, and the bye-laws made under the Municipal Corporations Act are addressed to a very different subject-matter from the present. It is one thing to make a bye-law for the good government of a town and another for the regulation of an esplanade on the sea-shore. For the latter purpose it does not seem to me to be an unreasonable thing to say that nothing shall be sold on the esplanade without the leave of the local authority.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. I do not think that this bye-law can be impeached on the ground that it is unreasonable, for in my opinion it does not go beyond the requirements of the case. Having regard to the manner in which the ground was acquired for the purpose of public walks and pleasure grounds, I do not think any distinction can be drawn between the foreshore and the esplanade proper, and I do not think it unreasonable that persons on the foreshore and the esplanade shall be freed from the importunities of vendors of goods.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to justices.

Animal—Regulation of cowsheds—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 74), s. 34—Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885, articles 7, 8, 13—Regulations of local authority—Ventilation—Air-space.

A local authority has power under section 34 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and article 13 of the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885, to make regulations prescribing the amount of air-space to be provided for each animal kept in a cowshed, the term "ventilation" in that article including "air-space."

Case stated by justices of the borough of Southport.

The appellant, Henry Baker, a cowkeeper, was convicted on the 20th of April, 1897, for having caused a greater number of cattle to be at one time kept in a building used as a cowshed than admitted of the provision of 800 cubic feet of air-space for each cow, contrary to the regulations made by the Corporation of Southport under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885.

By the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, s. 34, the Privy Council* is empowered to make orders "for the inspection of cattle in dairies and for prescribing and regulating the lighting, ventilation, cleansing, drainage, and water supply of dairies and cowsheds in the occupation of persons following the trade of cowkeepers or dairymen," and also "for authorizing a local authority to make regulations for the purposes aforesaid or any of them." By section 58 every such order is to have effect as if it had been enacted by that Act.

By an Order in Council made under this section on the 15th of June, 1885, and intituled the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885, it is provided—Article 7: "It shall not be lawful for any person following the trade of cowkeeper or dairyman to begin to occupy as a dairy or cowshed any building not so occupied at the commencement of this Order" (viz., the 30th of June, 1885) "unless and until he first makes provision to the reasonable satisfaction of the local authority for the lighting and the ventilation, including air-space . . . of the same." Article 8: "It shall not be lawful for any person following the trade of cowkeeper or dairyman to occupy as a dairy or cowshed any building, whether so occupied at the commencement of this order or not if and as long as the lighting and the ventilation, including air-space . . . thereof are not such as are necessary or proper . . . (a) for the health and good condition of the cattle therein. . . ." Article 13: "A local authority may from time to time make regulations . . . (b) for prescribing and regulating the lighting, ventilation, cleansing, drainage, and water-supply of dairies and cowsheds in the occupation of persons following the trade of cowkeepers or dairymen. . . ." The local authority under the above Act and Order is, in a borough, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses acting by the council. The mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Southport, in pursuance of the above Act and Order, made inter alia the following regulation: "Every person following the trade of a cowkeeper . . . shall not cause or suffer any greater number of cattle to be at any time kept in a building used as a . . . cowshed than will admit of the provision of 800 cubic feet of free air-space for each cow."

The appellant was convicted for a breach of this regulation.

Moulton, Q.C. (Pickford, Q.C., and Horridge with him), for the appellant.—The regulation is ultra vires and bad. A local authority has no power under the Act or the Order of 1885 to make regulations as to air-space. "Ventilation" and "air-space" are different things. When "ventilation" is intended to include air-space it is so expressed in the order, as in articles 7 and 8; article 13, under which the regulation was made, enables regulations to be made as to ventilation, but is silent as to air-space.

Macmorran, Q.C. (G. H. Pollard with him), for the respondent.—The regulation is good. Ventilation must be taken to include air-space. Article 13 of the order merely carries out article 8 in detail, and the definition of ventilation in article 8 is incorporated in article 13. The object is that cowkeepers may know from the regulations of the local authority precisely what are the requirements which they have to meet.

He cited Ex parte Kingstown, 18 L. R. Ir. 509; Ex parte Foreman, 35 W. R. 370, 18 Q. B. D. 393; Reed v. Harvey, 28 W. R. 423, 5 Q. B. D. 184.

Moulton, Q.C., in reply, cited Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, [1894] A. C. 347.

Oct. 29.—WRIGHT, J.—By section 34 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, power was given to the Privy Council to make orders authorizing a local authority to make regulations for, amongst other things, regulating "the ventilation of dairies and cowsheds." By section 58, "Every Order of Council shall have effect as if it had been enacted by this Act." Under the powers so given the Privy Council in 1885 made an order, articles 7 and 8 of which deal with "ventilation, including air-space," and article 13 of which gives power to local authorities to make regulations respecting, amongst other things, "ventilation." [His lordship read these articles.] The question is whether the power delegated by the Privy Council to the local authority by article 13 of the order to make regulations as to the ventilation of dairies and cowsheds includes a power to regulate air-space. It is certainly strange that in articles 7 and 8 of the Order in Council the words "including air-space" are expressly put in after the word "ventilation," while in article 13 the word "ventilation" stands by itself. It may be that the omission of air-space from section 13 is intended to have the effect of excluding it from the purview of the local authority. It may be, on the other hand, that the words "including air-space" in articles 7 and 8 are intended to be a definition of the word "ventilation" throughout the order. The local authority for the borough of Southport, purporting to act under the powers so delegated to them, have made a regulation as to the air-space which must be provided in all cowsheds within their jurisdiction. [His lordship read the regulation.]

The suggestion is that that regulation is ultra vires. The justices have held that it is valid and binding, and have convicted the appellant for a breach of it.

It is to be observed that by section 58 of the Act of 1878 the Order in Council is to have the same effect as if it were enacted by the Act itself. What, then, is the effect of that provision on the question which we are considering? The case of The Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, to which we have been referred, decides that in such a case the proper course of construction is to read the original Act and the subordinate legislation together. That seems to me the right principle to adopt. Acting upon that we find that the principal Act authorizes the regulation of "ventilation," and the subordinate legislation, the Order in Council, deals in two places with "ventilation, including air-space," and in a third with "ventilation" pure and simple. Reading the two together it seems to me that there is no such inconsistency as to make article 13, if the word "ventilation" is there construed as including air-space, at variance with the principal Act. Articles 7 and 8 of the Order in Council show that the word "ventilation" in the order includes air-space, and I see no reason why it should not be construed as including air-space also in article 13. If there is any hardship section 14 of the Order gives power to the Privy Council—and now, I presume, to the Board of Agriculture—to cancel any regulation if it is of too restrictive a character or otherwise objectionable. I am therefore of opinion that the justices were right, and that their decision must be upheld.

* These powers are now exercisable by the Board of Agriculture; see 52 & 53 Vict. c. 30, s. 2.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KENNEDY, J.—The only question that we have to decide in this case is whether the regulation of the local authority dealing with air-space is ultra vires or not. Without repeating what has been said by my brother Wright on the construction of the Act of Parliament and the Order in Council, I will only say that there is nothing that satisfies me that a regulation made by a local authority in pursuance of the powers delegated by the Act and Order may not deal with air-space. Does the word "ventilation" when it is used alone in article 13 exclude air-space? It is, no doubt, a difficult question to answer, but since I see nothing in the Act or Order which compels me to hold that the word "ventilation" excludes air-space I think the word may fairly be given its inclusive meaning in article 13, and that the power of regulating ventilation given to the local authority includes the power of regulating air-space. If the argument of convenience may be looked at I think it is certainly more satisfactory that the local authority should fix a definite minimum requirement of cubic feet of air rather than that the cowkeeper should not know what the requirements are. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no reason why the powers of article 13 should not been given this wider meaning, and that the regulation is valid.

TOWNEND v. KIRKHAM. (a.)

Practice—District registrar—Jurisdiction—Power to set aside judgment—Ord. 35, rr. 1, 5, 6.

Where, in an action proceeding in a district registry, the plaintiff has signed judgment in default of appearance, the district registrar has jurisdiction to set the judgment aside on the ground that it has been entered for a larger sum than was in fact due.

The effect of rule 6 of order 35 is that in all matters other than those in which the district registrar has exclusive jurisdiction under rules 1-5, proceedings may be taken either before the district registrar or a master.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers.

The action was brought to recover a loan, and was commenced in the district registry of Manchester. The defendant having made default in appearance, the plaintiff signed final judgment.

The defendant applied to the district registrar to set aside the judgment on the ground that it had been signed for £7 more than was in fact due.

The district registrar set the judgment aside, and directed that judgment should be entered for the proper sum.

On appeal Day, J., held that the district registrar had no jurisdiction to make any order in the action after final judgment had once been entered, and he ordered that the original judgment should stand.

The defendant appealed.

By ord. 35, r. 1: "Where a cause or matter is proceeding in a district registry, all proceedings, except where by these rules it is otherwise provided, or the court or a judge shall otherwise order, shall be taken in the district registry, down to and including the entry of final judgment."

By rule 5: "Where a cause or matter is proceeding in a district registry, all proceedings relating to the following matters—namely: (a) Leave to enter judgments under ord. 16, rr. 50 and 51; (b) leave to issue or renew writs of execution; (c) examination of judgment debtors for garnishee purposes, or under ord. 42, r. 32; (d) garnishee orders; (e) charging orders nisi; (f) interpleader orders, shall, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order, be taken in the district registry."

By rule 6: "Where a cause or matter is proceeding in a district registry, the district registrar may exercise all such authority and jurisdiction in respect thereof as may be exercised by a judge at chambers, except such as by these rules a master or chief clerk is precluded from exercising."

Montague Lush, for the defendant.—The learned judge thought the case was governed by rule 1 of order 35, which gives a district registrar jurisdiction down to final judgment only. But rule 5 gives jurisdiction in matters subsequent to judgment, and rule 6 gives all the jurisdiction which a master has in a London cause. It is clear that in a London cause a master might set aside a judgment by default if it had been obtained improperly. The district registrar, therefore, had jurisdiction in this case.

Carrington, for the plaintiff.—Rule 6 merely enables a district registrar to exercise the jurisdiction which has already been given him in the same way as a master exercises his jurisdiction. If it gave him all the jurisdiction of a master, the preceding rules would be superfluous. The jurisdiction of a district registrar does not extend beyond final judgment except in respect of the matters mentioned in rule 5. In Hood & Sons v. Yates, 42 W. R. 412, [1894] 1 Q. B. 240, it was held that a district registrar had no jurisdiction to make an interpleader order, and in consequence of that decision rule 5 was altered so as to include interpleader orders. Rule 5 does not mention the setting aside of a judgment obtained on default of appearance.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Rule 1 of order 35 says that, where a cause is proceeding in a district registry, all proceedings shall be taken in the district registry down to and including the entry of final judgment. I will not read rules 2, 3, or 4, but I observe that the same word "shall" is used in each of them. Then we come to rule 5, where again the word "shall" is used; it says that all proceedings in certain specified matters which come after judgment shall be taken in the district registry. In my opinion those rules give exclusive jurisdiction to the district registrar in all the matters there mentioned. Then rule 6 says that a district registrar may exercise all such jurisdiction as a master may exercise. I think that that rule, according to its true construction, gives the district registrar concurrent jurisdiction in all matters in which exclusive jurisdiction has not been given to him. The case of Hood & Sons v. Yates has been referred to. In my opinion the judges there went further than was necessary for the actual decision of the case, which was that the master had jurisdiction. I think that without overruling that decision we may state what in our judgment is the true construction of the rules. The action of the Rule Committee in altering the rule in consequence of what the judges said in that case is quite intelligible. I think therefore that the district registrar had jurisdiction, and this his order must be allowed to stand.

Appeal of the defendant from an order of Kekewich, J.

The action was brought for the rescission of a contract between the plaintiff and defendant for the purchase of 150 shares in the Gresham Gold Exploring Syndicate, Limited.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, who was at that time a director of the said company, on or about the 2nd of December, 1895, made certain false representations to him in respect of the position of the company, by which he was induced to buy the said shares. The particular representation was that the company had at its bankers a sum of £87,000 cash undivided.

The defendant by his defence denied that he ever made any of the representations alleged, and asserted that the statement as to the undivided sum of £87,000 was true.

The pleadings having been closed, Kekewich, J., made an order on summons, before the action had been set down for trial, that the plaintiff, the applicant, be at liberty upon three clear days' notice in writing to Messrs. Smith, Payne, & Smith, bankers, to inspect and take copies of, or extracts from, any accounts in the books of the bankers in the name of the Gresham Gold Exploring Syndicate, Limited, pursuant to the provisions of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, but such inspection was to be limited to showing the balances of the said company in the books of the said bankers on the 2nd of December, 1895.

Section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, is as follows: "On the application of any party to a legal proceeding a court or judge may order that such party be at liberty to inspect and take copies of any entries in a banker's book for any of the purposes of such proceedings. An order under this section may be made either with or without summoning the bank or any other party, and shall be served on the bank three clear days before the same is to be obeyed, unless the court or judge otherwise directs."

The defendant appealed.

Mark Romer, for the appellant.—Apart from the Bankers' Books Evidence Act entries in bankers' books would not be evidence against third parties. This order should not have been made unless it was clear that the account, though not kept in the name of the defendant, was, in substance and in fact, kept on his behalf: Howard v. Beall, 37 W. R. 555, 23 Q. B. D. 1; South Staffordshire Tramways Co. v. Ebbsmith, 44 W. R. 97, [1895] 2 Q. B. 669.

A. J. Walter, for the Gresham Syndicate.—I am not a party to the action, and the plaintiff is, in reality, asking me for a proof before the trial, which he has no right to ask for. The Act was not intended for such a purpose; its object was to relieve bankers of the inconvenience of having to produce their books on subpœna.

Ernest Pollock, for the plaintiff.—Arnott v. Hayes, 36 W. R. 246, 36 Ch. D. 731, clearly shows that this process is right, in lieu of a subpœna duces tecum.

He referred to In re Marshfield, Marshfield v. Hutchings, 34 W. R. 511, 32 Ch. D. 499.

Romer replied.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I think this case raises a question of enormous importance to the public and to commercial people in particular. [His lordship stated the facts, and continued:] Just consider what it means. The application is to compel bankers to give leave to somebody else to look at and take copies of entries of a third party who has nothing to do with the litigation. That appears to me to be absolutely contrary to every principle of law relating to discovery and to the settled practice of the court. It was said that the court had power to make the order under section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879. The Bankers' Books Evidence Acts were passed for a very definite purpose. Before the Acts the procedure was to serve a clerk of the banker with a subpœna to attend at the trial and produce the books. That was extremely inconvenient to bankers whose books were in daily use, and so the Acts were passed to protect them from that inconvenience, and they are now protected by sections 3 to 6 of the Act of 1879. These sections were not intended to apply to litigants, but to enable bankers to send attested copies of entries in their books instead of the books themselves. Then comes section 7, which has nothing to do with protecting bankers from inconvenience; it has to do with litigants. [His lordship read the section.] If that is taken literally, it means that any party to a proceeding may take copies of entries of the account of anybody else not a party to the action. Such an interpretation would be simply monstrous, and I will not be a party to any such decision. Obviously the meaning was to give facilities for the taking of copies of entries of persons who are parties to the litigation and no other.

Of course a party to an action may be an undisclosed principal, a banking account in the name of another person being really his, and possibly section 7 can in that case be used to obtain inspection of the account; but when the court is asked to throw open to third parties the accounts of persons who are not parties to the litigation, it ought not, as a general rule, to accede to the request. I do not say that such a thing can never be done, but the court must take care that the section is not made use of oppressively. It may be that at the trial the court may make an order on a person who could be subpœnaed to bring copies of the accounts; we are not dealing with that case here. The plaintiff wants to see the credit standing to the company's account at a particular time. In order to do so he must be able to overhaul the whole account for half a year, and will see all the particulars to which the figures relate; in short, he will have a roving inspection of the account, and against that we must protect third parties.

The order must be discharged altogether, with costs, and the plaintiff must be left to do what he can at the trial, and the bankers must be left to the protection of the Act. It would be far too mischievous and oppressive to make the order.

CHITTY, L.J.—The Act of 1879 is divided into two portions. Sections 3 to 6 are intended to relieve bankers, and section 7 is different, and relates to the parties to the litigation. This is the account of a third person who has been served and objects to have his account inspected before trial. This is an attempt to obtain inspection of the account of a third party by means of section 7. Although in terms it is not said that the account must be that of a party to the action, yet the court ought to exercise the greatest caution in making an order relating to the account of a third person.

In this case the inspection must run over a period of at least five months. In order to ascertain the balance on the 2nd of December the plaintiff would have the right to see the account from the 30th of June preceding to that date; he would be entitled to look, not merely at the figures, but also at the names and the various items, and would ransack the account and obtain particulars of what he had no right to look at.

In my opinion the 7th section was not intended to be used for any such purpose, and it would inflict a great injustice on third persons if such an order as has been made were allowed to stand.

Appeal allowed.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC v. LA COMPAGNIE FRANCO-BELGE DU CHEMIN DE FER DU NOR DE LA REPUBLIQUE SUD AFRICANE. (a.)

Practice—Foreign State plaintiff—Action for appointment of new trustee—Counter-claim for damages for libel—Order excluding counter-claim—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r. 27; ord. 21, r. 15.

The fact that the plaintiff is a foreign state is not a sufficient reason for allowing the defendant to set up by way of counter-claim a claim which he could not set up against an ordinary plaintiff. An order will therefore be made excluding a counter-claim for damages for a libel alleged to have been published by a foreign state, which is plaintiff in an action seeking the appointment of new trustees of a fund in court.

Appeal from North, J.

The plaintiff republic brought an action for the appointment of a new trustee of large sums of money which, in pursuance of an agreement between the republic and the defendant railway company, had been lodged in a bank in the joint names of two trustees, one of whom represented the plaintiffs and the other the defendants. The plaintiffs' trustee had since died. By their defence the defendants submitted that it would be inequitable that the funds should again be placed under the control of the plaintiffs, by being placed in joint names or otherwise, except upon the terms of the plaintiffs agreeing to observe the agreement already mentioned between the plaintiffs and the defendants. By way of counter-claim the defendants claimed, inter alia, £100,000 damages for a libel alleged to be contained in a letter dated the 8th of June, 1895, which the Government commissioner of railways of the South African Republic had written to the defendants, and sent for publication to the London Stock Exchange, where it was accordingly published. In substance, the alleged libel consisted of statements that the conditions of the concession granted by the Government of the South African Republic had not been duly fulfilled, and that the writer of the letter had advised the Government of the Republic not to pay any interest on the share capital of the defendant company (such interest being guaranteed by the Government) until the matter should have been investigated. The defendants alleged that in consequence of this letter the committee of the London Stock Exchange refused to grant a quotation of the shares of the defendant company, and the company suffered serious injury.

North, J., on the application of the plaintiffs, made an order excluding from the counter-claim the defendants' claim for damages for libel.

The defendants appealed.

Cozens Hardy, Q.C., and Vernon R. Smith, Q.C., for the appeal, referred to R. S. C., 1883, ord. 21, r. 15, ord. 19, r. 27, ord. 36, rr. 2, 8, ord. 21, r. 15; Strousberg v. Republic of Costa Rica, 29 W. R. 125; and Annual Practice, 1897, vol. 1, p. 475, where Griendtoveen v. Hamlyn, 8 Times L. R. 231 is cited.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiff Republic were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, and proceeded: I say nothing at all about foreign republics suing or being sued here, and the possibility of actions for libel being brought against or by them. I treat this as an action by a foreign government which submits to the jurisdiction of the court as regards all matters which are properly raisable in such an action. Amongst such questions as can be raised are the questions which, according to our practice, may be raised under a counter-claim, and I suppose that, subject to the rules, the question of libel may be raised. Let us, therefore, treat this as an ordinary action by an ordinary individual subject to the jurisdiction of the court. Does anyone suppose for a moment that this cross-action—for that is what it really is, call it what you like—that this cross-action for libel would be allowed to be tacked on to such a claim as I have suggested, and be brought and tried here along with that other claim? The question has only to be asked to answer itself. Of course it would not. What would be done, whether the thing would be struck out or whether there would be a transfer of part of the action to the Queen's Bench Division, I do not know; but I should think myself that any judge in the Chancery Division would strike it out, and leave the defendants to bring a cross-action. That is precisely what North, J., has done. Then it is pointed out, and truly pointed out, that the position of the defendant would be very different if, instead of the plaintiffs he had an ordinary opponent, against whom he could bring a cross-action. It is said, and it is true, that a cross-action will not lie against the present plaintiffs, unless they submit to be sued here, and really we are asked to put them upon the terms of submitting to be sued here in an action for libel. How can we? It seems to me absolutely wrong, whether it is under ord. 21, r. 15, or under ord. 19, r. 27. I should myself say it falls under both. I should say a joining of this action for libel with this action for the appointment of new trustees and the protection of funds is very seriously calculated, in the words of ord. 19, r. 27, to "prejudice or embarrass the fair trial of the action." I do not know how a judge would do it except piecemeal, and I think he would be perfectly justified in striking it out under that rule. If not, it is quite justifiable to strike it out under the other. The broad question is whether we ought to allow this counter-claim to stand on the ground that if we do not the defendants will be in a difficulty about suing the plaintiffs. I do not think that it is a sufficient reason. I think that the order is perfectly right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord LUDLOW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The principal object in this action is to protect the funds in court and to obtain the appointment of a new trustee. That is the ostensible object. The defendant takes advantage of the republic having brought itself within the jurisdiction of the court here to start a counter-claim in respect of an alleged libel, claiming very heavy damages. That portion of the counter-claim, and the defence which relates to the damages recoverable in that counter-claim for libel, has been struck out by the learned judge, and the question here is whether he was justified in so striking it out. Now, I distinctly say that I express no opinion as to whether a counter-claim, which is really a cross-action, can be brought against the South African Republic. I state no opinion upon it, but for the purposes of the present case I assume it can, and I treat the republic as an ordinary litigant who has come here, and so has brought himself within the jurisdiction of the court here. Now, suppose it had stood in that way, suppose that the plaintiff here, instead of being the South African Republic, had been an ordinary individual; what course would be adopted by the learned judge in regard to a counter-claim of this kind? I unhesitatingly say that under ord. 19, r. 27, or probably under ord. 21, r. 15, the judge would strike out such a counter-claim, and would not permit it. I think that is what ought to be done in this case. Probably it would be struck out in chambers, and the learned judge would say that the plaintiffs could bring an independant action. But then it is said that that is all very well in the case of a private individual, because against him you can bring a cross-action, but that is not the case here, because the defendant could not bring an action for libel against the republic. It is the fact that the republic has submitted to the jurisdiction of this court, and that, it is contended, enables the plaintiffs to do what they are now doing. We are asked therefore to give effect to that which has been done by the republic—namely, to give an advantage to the defendants because the republic has submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts and enabled him to bring an action which he otherwise could not have brought. I do not think that is right. I do not think that can be supported on any ground. I think therefore that the learned judge at chambers was perfectly right in striking out so much of this counter-claim as related to the damages claimed on the ground of libel.

CHITTY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I exclude entirely from consideration, for the purposes of this judgment, the circumstance that the South African Republic is plaintiff, and I deal with the case upon the same footing as if the plaintiffs were ordinary subjects of the Queen resident here. In my opinion it is right, under either or both of the two rules that have been referred to, to exclude from this action the counter-claim for libel. The nature of the action has been already stated by the lord justices. The plaintiffs only ask for the appointment of a new trustees, but the defence raises the question which for the purpose of our present decision may be shortly stated as a claim that the fund is not a trust fund either in whole or in part. It seems to me it would be wrong, on the supposition on which I proceed, to allow this counter-claim for damages for libel to stand. You might no doubt separate the issues, and the issue of libel might be sent to a jury, but I think, for the reasons that have already been given, that it is not right to allow such a counter-claim as this to stand. For these reasons I think the order of North, J., was right in excluding it.

Appeal dismissed.

CARLTON STEAMSHIP CO. v. CASTLE MAIL PACKETS CO. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Berth for loading—Order by charterers—Tides.

By a charter-party a ship was to proceed to a certain dock, or so near thereunto as she could safely get, and there load always afloat as and where ordered by the charterers a cargo of rails. The ship proceeded to the named dock, and was ordered by the charterers to a berth. The depth of the water in the dock was such that it was impossible, as the parties knew, for the ship to leave the dock, after being loaded, till the next spring tides, which would be in about a fortnight's time.

Held (A. L. Smith, L.J., dissenting), that the order given by the charterers was not unreasonable.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Carlton to recover damages from charterers for failure to name a proper berth for loading under the charter-party and for consequent detention of the ship.

By the charter-party, which was dated the 22nd of February, 1897, the vessel was to proceed to Senhouse Dock, Maryport, or so near thereunto as she could safely get, and there load in the customary manner always afloat as and where ordered by the charterers a cargo of rails and proceed therewith to Delagoa Bay.

The vessel proceeded to Maryport, and went into Senhouse Dock on the 28th of February, and on the 1st of March she was ordered by the charterers to a berth in the dock. She had taken on board a quantity of bunker coal, and in consequence thereof she could not then lie always afloat in any part of the dock, and it was clear that the loading of the cargo could not be completed before the 5th of March, when the spring tides would come to an end, and that she could not come out of the dock fully loaded till the next spring tides. The shipowners thereupon received on board about 575 tons of cargo, and then on the 7th of March took the vessel out of the dock to Barrow, and offered to receive the rest of the cargo there.

The charterers refused to deliver any of the cargo except at Senhouse Dock.

On the 16th of March the vessel returned to Senhouse Dock, the loading was proceeded with, and on the 20th of March she sailed from the dock with her cargo on board.

Mathew, J., held that the ship was justified in leaving the dock, and that the charterers were responsible for the delay, and he accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and James Fox, for the defendants.

Robson, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the plaintiffs.

The following cases were cited in argument: Tapscott v. Balfour, 21 W. R. 245, L. R. 8 C. P. 46; Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Morel Brothers, 40 W. R. 58, [1891] 2 Q. B. 647; Shield v. Wilkins, 5 Exch. 304; Nelson v. Dahl, 28 W. R. 57, 29 W. R. 543, 12 Ch. D. 568, 6 App. Cas. 38; The Alhambra, 29 W. R. 655, 6 P. D. 68; Reynolds & Co. v. Tomlinson, [1896] 1 Q. B. 586, 44 W. R. Dig. 150.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—There seems to be some difficulty in this case. Mathew, J., apparently held that the order given by the charterers was a wrong order. We have to deal with a charter-party made between English shipowners and English charterers, and with reference to an English port—viz., Maryport—the like of which exists in many places in England in this respect—that it has a particular depth of water between neap and spring tides and another depth during spring tides. Those depths are published in documents which are in the hands of all charterers and all shipowners, so that both parties when they entered into this contract must be taken to have known the ordinary conditions as to the depth of water in this port. The charter-party says that the ship is to proceed to Senhouse Dock, or so near thereunto as she can safely get. I will assume that she could not safely get to Senhouse Dock within the meaning of the charter-party unless she could come safely out when she was loaded. She could go safely into Senhouse Dock unloaded. But at particular states of the tide she could not come out loaded. But then again in the ordinary course of the tides there were times when she could come out loaded. Therefore, it seems to me she was bound to go in, and she did go in. Now, she was to load as and where ordered by the charterers. For well-understood business reasons charterers generally have the power to order where they will deliver cargo. But, although charterers have the right to name a berth, shipowners usually stipulate, as they did here, that it must be a berth where the ship can load always afloat. In my opinion charterers are bound to give an order to go to a particular berth almost immediately after notice of the arrival of the ship. Here they gave an order on the 1st of March, which was clearly not too late. But I do not think they are bound to give an order which can be immediately obeyed. It may be that no berth is then vacant, though one will be vacant in a reasonable time. I think that if an order is given to go to a berth to which the ship can go in a reasonable time, and where she will then be able to load always afloat, that would be a proper order. In this case the order which was given might be obeyed at the next spring tides—that is to say, in about a fortnight. I cannot see that it was unreasonable to give the order under the circumstances. Therefore, in my opinion, the action, which is brought substantially for having given a wrong order, cannot be maintained, and the appeal ought to be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I cannot think that Mathew, J., was wrong in his decision. I do not feel at all certain that a shipowner need know the character of the ports at which his ships may be, though no doubt this ought to be known to the charterers. I will, however, in this case assume equal knowledge on both sides. When the ship got to Senhouse Dock she was an arrived ship, and there was then an obligation on the charterers within a reasonable time to give an order for a berth where the ship could load always afloat. I cannot read into the contract any reference to the course of nature with regard to the depth of water at different states of the tide. I treat it as a matter of absolute bargain. An order was given within a reasonable time. But what was the substance of the order? It was an order which the ship could not obey within a fortnight. Was that a reasonable order to give? I do not think so. There must be some limit as to the time in which an order can be obeyed, and in my opinion a fortnight is too long. I therefore think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that the appeal should be allowed. The parties had knowledge of the facts, and I do not think there was any unreasonable delay of which the plaintiffs can complain. There was no duty on the defendants to provide an immaculate berth.

Appeal allowed.

(a.) Reported by R. C. MACKENZIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A society certified after 1856, but before 1874, has, therefore, power to alter its rules so as to provide for losses incurred by reducing the shares; and it makes no difference whether this is done by amending the existing rules or by substituting a new set of rules.

Decision of Stirling, J., 45 W. R. 700, reversed.

Appeal from Stirling, J. (reported 45 W. R. 700).

The society was formed in 1863 under the Building Societies Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), s. 1 of which provides "that it shall and may be lawful for any number of persons in Great Britain and Ireland to form themselves into and establish societies for raising, by the monthly or other subscriptions of the several members of such societies, shares not exceeding the sum of £150 for each share, such subscriptions not to exceed in the whole 20s. per month for each share, a stock or fund for the purpose of enabling each member thereof to receive out of the funds of such society the amount or value of his or her share or shares therein, to erect or purchase one or more dwelling-house or dwelling-houses, or other real or leasehold estate to be secured by way of mortgage to such society until the amount or value of his or her shares shall have been fully repaid to such society with the interest thereon, and all fines and other payments incurred in respect thereof, and to and for several members of each society from time to time to assemble together, and to make, ordain, and constitute such proper and wholesome rules and regulations for the government and guidance of the same as to the major part of the members of such society so assembled together shall seem meet, so as such rules shall not be repugnant to the express provisions of this Act, and to the general laws of the realm, and to impose and inflict such reasonable fines, penalties, and forfeitures upon the several members of such society who shall offend against any such rules as the members may think fit. . . ." The society was incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874. That Act, by section 7, repealed the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, but so as not to "affect any subsisting society certified under the said Act, until such society shall have obtained a certificate of incorporation under this Act; and this repeal shall not affect the past operation of the said Act." Section 13 provides that "any number of persons may establish a society under this Act, either terminating or permanent, for the purpose of raising, by the subscriptions of the members, a stock or fund for making advances to members out of the funds of the society upon security of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estate by way of mortgage; and any society under this Act shall, as far as is necessary for the said purpose, have power to hold land with the right of foreclosure, and may from time to time raise funds by the issue of shares of one or more denominations, either paid up in full or to be paid by periodical or other subscriptions, and with or without accumulating interest, and may repay such funds when no longer required for the purposes of the society." Section 16 provides that "the rules of every society hereafter established under this Act shall set forth (1) the name of the society and the chief office or place of meeting for the business of the society; (2) the name in which the stock or funds of the society are to be raised, the terms upon which paid-up shares (if any) are to be issued and repaid, &c.; (3) the terms upon which shares may be withdrawn and upon which mortgages may be redeemed." Section 18 provides that "any society under this Act, certified previously to the passing of this Act, may alter or rescind any rule or make any additional rule by the votes of three-fourths of the members present at a special meeting called for the purpose, of which meeting notice, specifying the proposed alteration, rescission, or addition, shall be given to the members in the manner provided by the rules of the society, or in the absence of such rules by letters sent through by post seven days previous to such meeting; and any society hereafter established may alter or rescind any rule, or make any additional rule, in the manner its rules direct."

The Building Societies Act, 1894, s. 25, sub-section 2, provides that after the expiration of two years from the passing of that Act, the Act of 1836 "shall be repealed as to all societies certified thereunder after the year 1856."

Until 1897 the rules of the society provided that "any member may, subject to the provisions of rules 73 and 91, withdraw all or any part of his shares upon giving one month's notice in writing, dating from any subscription, to the manager, when such member shall be entitled to receive back his subscriptions, with such portion of the profits realized as may have been posted to his credit either by way of interest or bonus, together with interest circulated up to the date of the notice" (rule 71); that "the rule formerly numbered 72 was rescinded at a special general meeting of the society on the 13th of January, 1891" (rule 72); that "in the event of the assets of the society being insufficient to meet the liabilities thereof, the directors may order that a sum sufficient to discharge a proper proportion of such liabilities shall be deducted from the amount payable to any member on withdrawal" (rule 73); and that "the funds of the society shall be applied solely for the purposes set forth in these rules, and in manner therein provided—firstly, in payment of all the expenses of the society authorized by the rules; secondly, in payment of the interest, dividends, or bonuses due to the holders of investment shares; thirdly, in making advances to members, notwithstanding the currency or expiration of any notices of withdrawal by other members; lastly, in repaying subscriptions to members withdrawing their shares" (rule 91).

Rule 118 dealt with dissolution of the society, and provided: "In case three-fourths in number and value of the investing members of the society for the time being, present at a general meeting specially convened for the purpose, shall resolve that no new business shall be transacted, then the society shall cease to transact any new business." The same rule further provided that the directors were to get in the assets, and to pay and discharge all the liabilities of the society, and make arrangements with borrowing members for the redemption of their securities; and that "when all the liabilities and expenses shall have been discharged, the surplus assets shall, from time to time, as the same shall be got in, be divided among the investing members in the proportions in which they may be entitled to the same; and when the whole of such surplus assets shall have been so disposed of the society shall be, and be deemed to be, absolutely at an end."

Through the defalcations of some of its officials the society had lost a large sum of money, and several meetings of the members had been held with the view of considering what ought to be done. Ultimately, in May, 1897, there had been passed certain resolutions, some of which were complained of, altering the rules of the society. The first alteration which it is necessary to mention was one with regard to rule 71, in which the provision that a member should be entitled to receive back his subscriptions with a proportion of profits was now struck out, and a provision substituted that he should be entitled to receive "the amount standing to his credit in the books of the society." In place of what was formerly in rule 72 this was inserted: "The amount due from the society to each member in respect of any share or shares held by him on the 1st of December, 1896, shall be deemed to be and taken as thirty-three fiftieths of the net amount paid on such share or shares, anything in these rules to the contrary contained notwithstanding." Rule 73 was altered so as to read thus: "The directors may at any time order that a sum sufficient to discharge a proper proportion of any loss actual or anticipated incurred by the society shall be deducted from the amount payable to any member on withdrawal."

The plaintiff, who was the holder of fully paid-up shares in the society, then commenced an action, on behalf of himself and all other members of the society, claiming an injunction to restrain the society and their directors and officers from acting upon the alteration of the rules, and from dealing with the funds of the society otherwise than in accordance with the rules as they stood before the alterations.

Stirling, J., held that the alteration made in rule 72 was ultra vires of the society, and granted an injunction as to the alteration of that rule (see 45 W. R. 700).

The society appealed.

Wurtzburg replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This society was established in 1863, before the Building Societies Act, 1874, was passed. It was afterwards incorporated under the Act of 1874 soon after that Act was passed. That being the state of the society, the real question is, By what Act of Parliament was it governed when, in May, 1897, the members altered their rules, or made rule 72? Those are the three material dates, which we must keep in our minds. What then, in May, 1897, was the state of the legislation applicable to this society? So far as the society was concerned, the Act of William 4 was absolutely repealed. Section 25, sub-section 2, of the Building Societies Act, 1874, repealed it altogether, several previous enactments having partially repealed it. This society was certified after 1856, and therefore as regards it the Act of William 4 is entirely gone, and no agreement which could be based on that Act of Parliament or on any of the sections it contains would be legitimate, or can be attended to. That, therefore, is one matter distinctly ascertained. Now, another question which arises is: What is the legislative enactment in force in May, 1897, which relates to the alteration of the rules of this society? As to that, there are two sections applicable. The first of the two is section 18 of the Act of 1874, which is very wide. Under that section this society can—and could in May, 1897—alter or rescind any rule, or make any additional rule, by the vote of three-fourths of the members. The other section which was applicable is section 1 of the Building Societies Act, 1894, which runs thus: "The rules of every society under the Building Societies Acts established or substituting a new set of rules for its existing rules after the passing of this Act, shall set forth . . . (f) the manner in which losses are to be ascertained and provided for." I understand that to mean every society established after the passing of this Act, or, if established before, substituting after the passing of this Act a new set of rules for its existing set of rules. The importance of that section will appear presently. We come back to this question: What is there in any of those subsisting enactments which prevents the society doing what it has done? I need not refer to those enactments. It was suggested by counsel that we had to consider—and Stirling, J., passed his judgment upon the view that the court had to consider—section 16 of the Building Societies Act, 1874. But the truth is that that was an oversight on the part of the learned judge. That section does not apply to this society at all, and we have nothing to do with it now. The same observation applies to Knight v. Tabernacle Building Society (not reported on this point), which was cited to us. It is clear that there has been a slip; for unless that were so I cannot suppose that there would have been any difference of opinion on this point between Stirling, J., and this court. At all events, neither section 16 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, nor the case of Knight v. Tabernacle Building Society applies to this case. We come back, then, to this. A shareholder of this building society says that it was not competent for a meeting duly called in accordance with the Acts to pass the rule which I am about to read. On the 18th of May, 1897, a duly-constituted meeting passed, by a majority of three-fourths, this rule. [The Lord Justice read rule 72 as amended, and proceeded:] The reason why that rule was passed, why three-fourths of the members thought it desirable to reduce the shares, is perfectly intelligible. The society had sustained a loss of £30,000, owing to the defalcations of some of its officers and other causes. How was that loss to be met? The meeting came to the conclusion that the most expedient course was to reduce the shares; for clearly everybody must contribute to the loss—it was a loss which fell upon them all. It seemed to the members present at the meeting that, as it was a loss that had to be shared by all, the fairest way was to reduce the shares all round. What is there in any of the Acts which makes it incompetent for three-fourths of the shareholders present at a meeting to pass such a rule as this? I cannot see anything to show that there is any illegality at all in what was done by the majority of the meeting. Even if section 16 of the Act of 1874 had still applied, I should have doubted whether the rule was ultra vires; but all doubt is removed by the language of the amending Act passed in 1894. It was perfectly competent for this society, if it had chosen, to substitute a new set of rules for the old set; I see nothing at all to prevent that. I merely make that observation for the purpose of expressing my opinion that there is nothing "unwholesome or improper," to use the phrase in the Act of 1836, in what has been done by the majority of the shareholders. The Act of 1836 is gone, but, to vary the phrase, what has been done cannot be said to be ultra vires merely because an amended rule has been inserted in the old set instead of a new set being adopted. I cannot see in the Acts any sign that that is to make any difference.

There has clearly been a slip and an oversight in the court below. No judge, and nobody of any experience at the bar, can wonder that a slip should occur in regard to this series of Acts. I do not say that they are actually the worst in the Statute Book, for some other groups of Acts also are exceedingly complicated; but certainly the Building Societies Acts are in a very bad state now. The appeal must be allowed, but without costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question raised by this case is whether, when a building society has lost part of its capital, it can alter its rules so as to affect the rights of members who have entered into contracts under the rules as they previously existed. Is, then, this alteration ultra vires? It seems to me that there was a slip before Stirling, J. This case depends on section 18 of the Act of 1874, because the Act of William 4 was repealed absolutely by the Act of 1894. Section 16 of the Act of 1874 does not apply to this case as appears by the language of section 16. This society was established after 1856 but before 1874, and therefore section 16 has no application to the present case. Over and above that, by the Act of 1894, section 16 of the Act of 1874 is repealed. In no sense, therefore, can section 16 of the Act of 1874 have any application to this case, and all that remains is section 18 of the Act of 1874, which (so far as it deals with the power of a a society to alter its rules) is as large and comprehensive as it well can be, provided that the assent of three-fourths of the members is obtained at a special meeting. I do not mean to say that that section would be sufficient to entitle any meeting by a three-fourths majority to alter the constitution of the society, but I think it clearly gives full power to alter the rules so long as the alterations merely relate to the internal rights of the society and its members inter se. It cannot be said that what was done here went beyond an alteration as to the internal rights of the members and the internal management of the society. I do not hesitate to say that in the circumstances it probably was a right thing—I will use the word a "wholesome" thing—to do. I think this alteration was intra vires and that the new rule is legal, right, and proper.

CHITTY, L.J.—The plaintiff's contract as a member of this society has always been subject to the terms of the contract being altered by new rules made within the powers conferred upon the society. The society was established under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and obtained its certificate under the Act of 1874. I proceed to inquire what power of altering and rescinding rules it had in May, 1897. In my opinion its power to do that was conferred by section 18 of the Act of 1874. That section gives to every member of the society the safeguard that the majority to carry the rules rescinding or altering the existing rules must be a three-fourths majority. In section 18 there is in terms no limit placed upon the power. I think, for the reasons which have been stated, that the rule-making and rule-altering powers in the Act of William are entirely gone, and that, therefore, we have not got to consider the meaning of the vague words "proper and wholesome," which occur only in that Act. But under section 18 there is no power to change the nature or constitution of the society, and the rules must be confined to the internal rights of members of the society. There is nothing, of course, which would allow the society to say that they would not pay their outside creditors. There are, therefore, obvious limits to the power of making and rescinding rules; but in the present case, what the court has to deal with is a rule which, in my opinion, has been made fairly and equitably, and which is not directed against particular individuals, but affects all the members equally.

It was said that instead of passing this rule it would have been better to let the heavy loss which had been incurred stand as a loss in the books of the society. I think that was one of the matters left by the Legislature within the discretion of the society acting by a sufficient majority of the members. It is for the benefit of all concerned that this great loss, instead of being left to appear year after year in the society's books, should be finally written off from the the books of the society. At any rate, that is a matter within the competency of the society. I agree with what has been said as to the slip which was made in the court below, and which is not to be wondered at. Section 16 of the Act of 1874 did not apply to this society, but section 1 of the Act of 1894 did apply, and I think there is considerable force in the argument founded on the latter section. On the question whether this was a fair and proper rule to make, it is clear that this society had the power of making rules, and, instead of making two or three rules, could, if it had chosen, have made an entire new set, and that this new rule, if it had been one of such a set, would have been justified. It seems to me that the difference between making one rule and making a set is a mere matter of form, and that the case cannot turn upon that.

Appeal allowed, without costs.

Administration — Practice—Priorities—Rates—Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 62), s. 1, sub-sections 1 (a), 6; s. 3.

The priority conferred by section 1, sub-section 1, of the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888, applies in the administration of the insolvent estate of a person who has died since the 31*st of December,* 1888, the date of the commencement of that Act; but does not apply in cases of death prior to that date.

This was a summons taken out in an administration action raising the question whether certain rates ought to be paid in priority to the claims of other creditors.

John Heywood died on the 6th of January, 1896, intestate.

On the 29th of March, 1897, the usual order was made at the instance of creditors for the administration of the estate of John Heywood. In the prosecution of that order it appeared that the estate was insufficient for the payment in full of the intestate's debts and liabilities, and the question raised by the summons, which was taken out by the persons claiming priority, was whether certain rates, including poor rates, general district rates, and highway rates, due at the death of the intestate were to be paid in priority to the other debts of the intestate.

The case was argued on the 27th of October.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 6.—STIRLING, J.—The point arises upon the terms of the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888, but before dealing with that statute it is desirable to consider the previous legislation on the subject.

Section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, provides that: "In the administration by the court of the assets of any person who may die after the commencement of this Act, and whose estate may prove to be insufficient for the payment in full of his debts and liabilities, and in the winding-up of any company under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, whose assets may prove to be insufficient for the payment of its debts and liabilities, the same rules shall prevail and be observed as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors and as to debts and liabilities provable as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt."

It is quite settled that this enactment introduced into the administration of insolvent estates and the winding up of insolvent companies some only, and not all, of the rules of bankruptcy; and considerable difficulty has arisen in determining which of those rules apply to administrations and windings up. In the case of In re Albion Steel and Wire Co. Sir G. Jessel, M.R., held that poor rates and local rates (which under section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, had priority in bankruptcy) had not priority in the winding up of a company in liquidation, saying that the meaning of the enactment (Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10) was "simply that the rules in bankruptcy shall apply so far as relates to the proof and receipt of dividends out of the assets of the company." On the other hand, in In re Association of Land Financiers, decided in 1881, Malins, V.C., held that the priority given by the same Bankruptcy Act to servants' wages extended to the winding up of companies, and he declined to follow In re Albion Steel and Wire Co.

In that state of the authorities there was passed the Companies Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 28), which conferred priority in the winding up of companies on certain debts for wages but not for rates. In the same year was passed the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), which, by section 40, provides as follows. [His lordship read the section and continued:] In 1888 was passed the statute which I have now to construe (51 & 52 Vict. c. 62). [His lordship referred to section 1, sub-sections 1, 2, 5, 6, section 2, sub-section 1, section 3, section 6.] The effect of this Act is to introduce into the law of bankruptcy the priorities which are there mentioned. That Act came into operation on the 1st of January, 1889, and it has been, therefore, in operation eight years. I have thought it right to make inquiries as to what has been the practice in chambers during that period, for I need not say that many hundreds of insolvent estates have been administered by the court in that time. The result of those inquiries is that I find there is really no fixed practice. Throughout the whole of that period one master appears to have adopted one course and another the opposite; and even in the chambers of the same judge different masters have adopted different practices; and I cannot find that during the whole of that time the question has ever been brought before a judge of this division personally even in chambers, and certainly there is no adjudication on the subject.

In 1895 there was decided by the Court of Appeal the case of In re Leng. It was there held that the claim of a widow for money lent to her husband for the purpose of his trade or business was by the combined effect of section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, postponed to the claims of other creditors.

This case seems to me to be decided on the principle expressly stated by the present Master of the Rolls in his judgment that "the rules in bankruptcy as to debts and liabilities provable . . . include all rules expressly enacted by any statute and made applicable in the event of bankruptcy."

It is contended on behalf of the creditors for rates that this principle ought to be applied in the present case. It is not disputed that this priority would be imported into the administration of insolvent estates by courts of equity if section 1 of the Act of 1888 stood alone; but it is said that section 3 expressly limits the operation of the Act to receiving orders, orders under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act and the winding up of companies. If this latter contention prevails section 3 will operate as a repeal of the statutory provision of the Judicature Act, 1875, as interpreted by the Court of Appeal in In re Leng, so far as relates to administration of insolvent estates of deceased persons in courts of equity.

In my judgment this is not the true effect of section 3. The statute deals directly with administration of estates by courts having jurisdiction in bankruptcy and in the winding up of companies; no reference is found in it to administration by courts having the ordinary jurisdiction in equity. Section 3 appears to me to provide that not every administration in bankruptcy or winding up is to be affected by the Act, but only those where an order has been made after the period fixed for the commencement of the Act; I do not think it was intended by the Legislature to exclude the application of section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875. By the combined effect of section 1, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1888, and section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the limitation imposed by section 3 of the Act of 1888 has been imported into the administration of estates by courts of equity—that is to say, the rule introduced into bankruptcy by the Act of 1888 will apply only where the date of the death (which is by section 1, sub-section 6, to be substituted for a receiving order) occurs after the commencement of the Act.

I have the less difficulty in arriving at this conclusion in that it agrees with the opinion expressed by the Master of the Rolls in In re Leng. The Master of the Rolls says this: "Whether debts entitled to priority in bankruptcy are to be treated as entitled to similar priority in administering the assets of a deceased insolvent was a question on which decisions were conflicting (compare In re Albion Steel and Wire Co., In re Association of Land Financiers). All doubt on this point was, however, removed by an Act passed in 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 62, s. 6, sub-section 6), which makes the rules in bankruptcy applicable." It is quite true, as was pointed out in the argument, that his lordship does not make any express reference to section 3 of the same Act, but it seems to me most improbable that that section should have been overlooked.

Trustee — Executor guilty of devastavit — Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.

A testator died in June, 1894, with assets reckoned at £22,000, and debts as then known under £100. His executor paid an immediate legacy of £300 to the widow, and made other payments for the benefit of the children. In November advertisements for creditors were issued. In December a writ was served on the executor by certain large landowners claiming an account of rents received by the testator as their agent.

In spite of this action the executor continued to make payments to the beneficiaries, without going to the court for directions, until judgment in April, 1896, when about £26,000 was found due to the plaintiffs from the testator's estate.

Held, that the executor, under the circumstances, had acted reasonably in paying the widow the £300 and such other payments necessary for the maintenance of the family up to the date of his receiving the writ; and that he should be relieved to this amount under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896.

Further consideration.

Samuel Kay, a solicitor at Manchester, had for many years acted as agent and collector of rents for Sir Thomas Mosley, and his successor, the plaintiff, Sir Oswald Mosley.

Samuel Kay died on the 27th of June, 1894, leaving a will of which the widow and the defendant Keyworth were respectively executrix and executor.

By the will an immediate legacy of £300 was to be paid to the widow and the rest of the property was given to the widow for life, and on her death to the children.

The £300 was paid to the widow, and some small payments made to the children.

In August, 1894, some claim was made on behalf of the plaintiff, Sir Oswald Mosley, against the testator's estate for rents received and not accounted for.

In November the will was proved, and it was stated that the assets were about £22,000, and that the debts, as then known, did not amount to more than £100.

On the 30th of November, 1894, the defendant advertised for creditors.

On the 17th of December, 1894, the plaintiff issued the writ in the present action claiming an account of all rents and other moneys received by the testator, Samuel Kay, deceased, as agent of the late Sir T. Mosley and the plaintiff, or which but for the wilful default of the said Samuel Kay ought to have been so received; payment of what should be found due on taking such account, and administration of Samuel Kay's estate if the defendants did not admit assets.

The defendant Keyworth continued to allow the widow to receive the income of the estate until judgment was pronounced on the 21st of April, 1896, whereby the defendants were ordered to pay to the plaintiff £3,511 on account of rents received by Samuel Kay. It was also referred to the official referee to take an account of rents received by Samuel Kay on behalf of the plaintiffs and not accounted for, and on this about £26,000 was found due to the plaintiffs.

It was contended by the plaintiffs that the defendant Keyworth was personally liable to make good what had been paid to the widow on account of income and the £300 legacy, in all about £2,000, and the defendant claimed to be relieved under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896.

Farwell, Q.C., and Dauney, for the defendant, asked for relief under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, contending that the defendant had acted reasonably within the meaning of that section.

Levett, Q.C., and A. R. Kirby, for the plaintiffs.

ROMER, J., having reserved judgment.—It is clear that section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, read after section 1, sub-section 2, applies to the case of an executor who has been guilty of devastavit, and it is also clear that in this case this executor has acted honestly. The question is, has he acted "reasonably" and in the words of section 3 ought he "fairly to be excused for the breach of trust and for omitting to obtain the directions of the court in the matter in which he committed such breach"?

Here the facts were that the testator at the time of his death was of good reputation, left assets to the amount of £22,000, and there was certainly no ground for imputing that he had been guilty of dishonesty, or that his debts were anything but small. How was the executor to act under these circumstances. The estate was apparently solvent, the will bequeathed an immediate legacy to the widow for urgent expenses, and there were the children to maintain and the household to be kept up. Money had to be found, unless the executor had reason to suspect that the assets would be insufficient—which he had not. It would be a monstrous thing that an executor should in such a case be bound to at once cut off all supplies and let the family go to the workhouse, and he only acted reasonably in paying the £300 legacy and making the other small payments on account of income that were reasonably necessary, until the testator's debts could be fully ascertained.

The old liabilities against an executor for devastavit were very hard. His position was somewhat relieved by the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, which enabled an executor to distribute assets after advertisement for creditors. It was further relieved by this Act of 1896, but in construing this Act the provisions of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, should be remembered, and the proper course for a prudent and reasonable executor to pursue thereunder, which is to advertise for creditors as soon as possible after his testator's death, and having notice of any claim not to pay legatees without making due provision for such claims.

There was not such delay in advertising as would prevent the executor being entitled to relief, but when he had notice of such a serious claim as was disclosed by the writ in the present action he could not reasonably go on paying beneficiaries except at his own risk. He ought to have ascertained the extent of the claim or applied to the court for directions, in which case the court would certainly not have authorized further payment to the beneficiaries. He did not come to the court but acted on his own responsibility.

I do not desire to narrow the effect of the Act of 1896, but each case must be dealt with according to its own circumstances. I have power under that Act to grant relief wholly or partially, and I grant relief to the defendant to the extent of £570, which included the £300 legacy; but in the exercise of my judicial discretion I cannot allow the payments made after the writ.

In re AMALGAMATED SYNDICATE (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Memorandum of association—Ancillary clauses—Substratum gone—"Just and equitable"—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 79, sub-section 5.

A company formed to carry on a temporary business as its main object, but whose memorandum of association also stated other object clauses, not as defining a succession of objects different to the main object, but as referring to matters incidental to it, should be wound up and its surplus assets distributed among the shareholders by its directors, when the temporary business which was its main object has been accomplished, for it would be ultra vires to carry on any other business mentioned in the ancillary clauses.

Where, however, the directors propose to carry on such ancillary business instead of winding up the company, the court, on a shareholder's petition, will make a compulsory order.

This was the petition of shareholders of the company that the syndicate should be compulsorily wound up.

The syndicate was incorporated on the 20th of May, 1897, its memorandum of association contained the following clauses: "(a) To acquire and take over as a going concern the undertaking and all or any of the assets and liabilities of the Diamond Jubilee Syndicate (Limited), incorporated in the month of April, 1897, and with a view thereto to enter into the agreement with Harold Maximilian Seare, of Finsbury House, Blomfield-street, in the City of London, on behalf of the Jubilee Syndicate (Limited) referred to in clause 2 of the company's articles of association, and to carry the same into effect with or without modifications." "(b) To acquire and take over as a going concern the undertaking and all or any of the assets and liabilities of the Diamond Jubilee Syndicate (No. 2) (Limited), incorporated in the month of April, 1897, and with a view thereto to enter into the agreement with Harold Maximilian Seare, of Finsbury House, Blomfield-street, in the City of London, on behalf of the Diamond Jubilee Syndicate (No. 2) (Limited) referred to in clause 2 of the company's articles of association, and to carry the same into effect with or without modification." "(c) To acquire and take over as a going concern the undertaking and all or any of the assets and liabilities of the Diamond Jubilee Contract Corporation (Limited), incorporated in the month of April, 1897, and with a view thereto to enter into the agreement with Harold Maximilian Seare, of Finsbury House, Blomfield-street, in the City of London, on behalf of the Diamond Jubilee Contract Corporation (Limited) referred to in clause 2 of the company's articles of association, and to carry the same into effect with or without modification." "(d) To carry on all kinds of promotion business, and in particular to form, constitute, float, lend money to, assist, and control any companies, associations, or undertakings whatsoever, including any companies, associations, or undertakings for the purpose of acquiring all or any of the property and liabilities of this company." "(e) To act as house agents, surveyors, and builders." "(f) To acquire, sell, and deal in rooms, premises, stands, seats, and places of observation in connection with any procession, spectacle, entertainments, sports, exhibition, demonstration, or public gathering of any description, and to supply refreshments or lodgings and accommodation for any persons attending, witnessing, or interested in the same."

There were also other clauses of a similar character to (d), (e), and (f). The main objects of the companies mentioned in the first three clauses had been the acquiring of sites and the erection thereon of seats for viewing the Diamond Jubilee Procession held in June, 1897.

The business in connection with the Jubilee had resulted in a loss to the syndicate, but the directors still held a portion of the subscribed funds, and with these now proposed to embark in some of the businesses mentioned in the later clauses of the memorandum of association and declined to wind up the syndicate. Certain of the shareholders therefore presented this petition.

Alexander, Q.C., and the Hon. M. Macnaghten, for the petitioners.—The substratum of the company is gone, and it should be wound up. It has of necessity ceased to carry on its main business, and the directors do not propose to wind it up, but to carry on other business. It is therefore "just and equitable" that the court should wind up the company under sub-section 5 of section 79 of the Companies Act, 1862, as this is ejusdem generis to the circumstances mentioned in the preceding clauses of the section. The object to which the directors now propose applying the company's funds is an illegitimate one and ultra vires, and a shareholder is entitled to have the company wound up: Re Crown Bank, 38 W. R. 666, 44 Ch. D. 634.

Ashton Cross and Stewart Smith, for shareholders supporting the petition.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Vernon, for the syndicate.—A very small number of shareholders support the petition. The substratum of the company has not gone. Clause (d) and the following ones in the memorandum are just as much objects of the undertaking as (a), (b), and (c). They are not general words here, for the objects are plainly stated, and the company is entitled to undertake them, and a winding-up order should not be made: In re New Gas Co., 25 W. R. 643. Even if the proposed undertaking is ultra vires, the proper remedy is to commence an action to restrain the directors from carrying on this further business; there should not be a winding-up order: In re Pioneers of Mashonaland Syndicate, 41 W. R. 492, [1893] 1 Ch. 731; Ex parte Fox, 18 W. R. 1083, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 176. In re Crown Bank is distinguishable. In In re Anglo-Mexican Mint Co., W. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I think I ought to make the order for the compulsory winding up of this company. I agree that the petition can only be supported as coming within sub-section 5 of section 79 of the Companies Act, 1862, but, in my opinion, it can, or ought to be, supported under that clause. This amalgamated syndicate was formed, as appears from paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) of its memorandum of association, to take over the business of certain companies formed with a view to providing seats to view the Diamond Jubilee Procession. The Diamond Jubilee is over, and any loss or profit which was to be incurred or gained by carrying out what appears on the face of the memorandum of association to have been the principal object of the syndicate must now be divided. It is admitted that there was a loss which is said to be about 77 per cent. of the whole subscribed capital, although the amount is, perhaps, immaterial. All that remains to be done is to return to the shareholders the balance or wreckage, after deducting the losses and expenses. It is, of course, within the function of the company and its directors and officers to perform this duty, and to adjust matters among the shareholders. But it is suggested by the petition that the company should be wound up by the court, in order that what is left may be duly distributed. If nothing was left to be done but to make such division and adjustment, and there were no other circumstances in the case, I do not think the court would or could make the winding-up order. But it is said that in this particular instance it is "just and equitable" that the court should take upon itself to wind up the company, because the principal business which the company was formed to carry on has come to an end, and that the directors, instead of setting about to divide and adjust the balance of assets, are contemplating entering on a new business, and that this is ultra vires. The company cannot enter on business of the nature of its principal and primary business, because that is connected with the jubilee, which is a thing of the past, and in that state of things it is said the syndicate ought at once to be wound up; and as the directors, as far as one can judge by the evidence, have no intention of winding up, that this syndicate, the substratum of which is gone in the sense I have mentioned, should be wound up by the court. It is also said that the business which the directors have in contemplation is ultra vires of the syndicate; but it was argued on the other side that this is not so, and in support of that view they refer to the general object-clauses of the memorandum, beginning with clause (d). Now, all these clauses are so wide that it is impossible to suggest any business which would not be included therein if they are not read as including only matters incidental to the main or primary business, and my answer is that I ought not to read the later object-clauses as defining a succession of objects different from the main object, but to read those clauses as only referring to matters incidental to the primary object. It is incredible that those who subscribed for shares thought that providing seats, &c., to view the jubilee procession was only one among many objects of the syndicate. Practically one cannot doubt that anyone who took shares in this syndicate understood that he was taking shares in a company which would begin and end with the jubilee. Arriving, as I do, at the conclusion that the business of the company has come to an end, why is it not "just and equitable" to wind up the syndicate without waiting till the views of the directors are submitted to a meeting of the shareholders? I think I ought not to wait, because I think the views of the directors, ex facie, show that an act which is ultra vires is intended. And there are other matters which affect my discretion—e.g., the question as to the fitness of this board to carry out the division and adjustment of this residue. If that were the only question, I do not say that it would not be one to be decided by the domestic forum of the shareholders, but when the substratum is gone in the sense I have mentioned, I not only might but ought to bear in mind that the directors are not applying themselves to distribute the salvage, but are contemplating business which is not within the scope of the memorandum. If these matters are taken into consideration, the primâ facie right of the shareholders to have the question settled by the domestic forum is gone, and the matter is left to the discretion of the court.

Under the pressure of this petition the directors have now issued a prospectus which is more remarkable for that which it does not tell than for the facts which it narrates and which still leave the shareholders in the dark as to what is going to be done with their money. There is a general statement of what the directors have done, but it is not enough; though it is enough to show that whatever their plans may be they have not waited to consult their shareholders' views, but have to a certain extent acted on their own. I am not going to place much reliance on this, but I cannot help being struck with the fact that the syndicate was formed to carry on those businesses which had formerly been carried on by the three companies, and I have no information as to the amount of cash which was handed over either by the shareholders of those companies to their companies or by those companies to the Amalgamated Syndicate, but there is an amount of reticence about this which makes me doubtful. Then it is said that though the meeting of shareholders has not yet been held yet that there has been such an expression of opinion of shareholders in court to-day as to lead me to dismiss the petition; but whereas there has apparently been about £6,000 of share capital paid up the total number of shareholders both supporting and opposing the petition together represent only agout £3,000 of capital, but it would seem that of those shareholders who appear or have the right to appear there is a considerable majority against the petition, but the answer given to this is that the evidence shows that those shareholders have exercised no independent judgment whatever. I must therefore consider the sort of view which the shareholders have given to the petition, and, under the circumstances, I do not think there is any such expression of the wishes of the shareholders as to preclude me from doing what I think will be in the interest of the company. The wishes of the shareholders and creditors in winding up and of the latter in bankruptcy are to be regarded, but in each case there is a difficulty in getting people to apply their reasoning faculties to the matters before them and in this case I am not satisfied with the reasons put forward. Mr. Bramwell Davis, the counsel for the company, has called my attention to Ex parte Fox, and says that it affords authority for the proposition, which no one disputes—viz., that where the company is proceeding to do something ultra vires the shareholders have a right of action to restrain it, but that they have no right to come to this court for a winding-up order under the "just and equitable clause." I agree that that is generally a true proposition. I also agree that there is a class of matter which should be left to the shareholders to decide, but I do not think Ex parte Fox goes the length of saying that where the court has to consider whether it should take on itself to adjust the rights of the shareholders of a company, the substratum of which is gone, it may not take into consideration the fact that the directors intend to enter upon a business which would be ultra vires of the objects of the company. The matter is dealt with in the following way in Buckley on the Companies Act (7th ed., p. 245): "So, where a company is proceeding to do something which is ultra vires a shareholder has a right in an action on behalf of himself and all other shareholders to restrain the company, though every shareholder but himself be acquiescent, but has no right to come for a winding-up order under the 'just and equitable' clause," and Ex parte Fox is cited as an authority. But it is plain that this passage is a mere illustration of a previous one on the same page, which runs: "There is no doubt that the 'just and equitable' clause gave the court power to wind up a company in cases not coming under the first four heads (of section 79), but there must be strong ground for exercising the power, at any rate at the instance of a shareholder."

Without going into details I repeat what I said during the argument, that the stringency of the ejusdem generis rule has been much relaxed of late. At all events, in my judgment it is "just and equitable" that this company, the business of which has come to an end with the Diamond Jubilee, should be wound up by the court.

There will be the usual compulsory winding-up order.

Landlord and tenant—Compensation for improvements—Notice of claim—Time—Determination of tenancy—Farm buildings held over by tenant—Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 7.

Where, under the terms of his lease and the custom of the country, the tenant of a farm held over the farm buildings for a period after he had given up possession of all the agricultural land,

Held, that the determination of his tenancy within the meaning of section 7 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, took place when he gave up the agricultural land, and that a notice of claim for compensation given after that date, but more than two months before he gave up the buildings, was bad.

In re Paul, 24 Q. B. D. 247, 38 W. R. Dig. 99, distinguished.

Appeal from the refusal of the registrar of the county court of Yorkshire, holden at Halifax, to appoint a referee under section 9, sub-section 6, of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883.

The appellant was the tenant and the respondent was the landlord of a farm comprising agricultural land and buildings at Illingworth, near Halifax. By the terms of the lease and by the custom of the country the tenant was entitled, upon giving six months' notice, to give up the land on the 2nd of February in any year, and to retain the buildings until the following May.

In June, 1896, the appellant gave notice to the respondent that it was his intention to quit the farm on the 2nd of February, 1897. He gave up possession of the land on that day, and of the farm buildings on the 1st of May following.

On the 26th of February, 1897, the appellant gave notice to the respondent that he claimed compensation in respect of the unexhausted value of certain improvements executed by him on the holding, and that he had appointed a referee.

The respondent did not appoint a referee, and the appellant took out a summons in the county court for the appointment of a referee to act for the respondent. The application came on on the 14th of June, 1897, and was by consent heard by the registrar.

The registrar held that the tenancy was determined on the 2nd of February, and that the notice of claim for compensation not having been given two months prior to that date the provisions of section 9 of the Agricultural Holdings Act did not apply, and the county court had no jurisdiction to appoint a referee.

Section 7 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, provides that "a tenant claiming compensation under this Act shall, two months at least before the determination of the tenancy, give notice in writing to the landlord of his intention to make such claim."

Section 8 provides that the landlord and the tenant may agree on the amount and mode and time of payment of compensation, and that if they do not so agree the difference shall be settled by a reference.

Section 9 provides for the appointment of referees by the parties, and by sub-section 6 enacts that "if for fourteen days after notice by one party to the other to appoint a referee . . . the other party fails to do so, then, on the application of the party giving notice, the county court shall, within fourteen days, appoint a competent and impartial person to be a referee."

On the appeal any objection on the ground that—the county court having disclaimed jurisdiction—the proper remedy was by mandamus was waived on behalf of the respondent.

Beverley, for the appellant.—The notice of claim was in time. The buildings which were held over were part of the holding, and the tenancy was not determined as to the buildings until May, more than two months after the notice was given. It is sufficient if the notice be given two months before the giving up of such portion of the holding as is last retained by the tenant: In re Paul, 24 Q. B. D. 247, 38 W. R. Dig. 99.

Clavell Salter, for the respondent.—The notice was given after all the agricultural portion of the holding had been given up, and was therefore too late; where different portions of the holding may be given up at different dates the date of the determination of the tenancy for the purposes of the Act is the date at which the last agricultural portion is given up. The time at which the tenant is entitled to the compensation is "on quitting his holding at the determination of a tenancy" (section 1). The Act contemplates that the quitting of the holding and the determination of the tenancy shall be simultaneous, and the holding to which the Act applies must be agricultural or pastoral (section 54). Lord Watson, in Black v. Clay, [1894] A. C. 368, 43 W. R. Dig. 161 (decided on section 7 of the Scotch Act, which is identical with section 7 of the English Act except that the notice required is four months instead of two), expressed the opinion that a notice given after all the agricultural land had been given up, but before the buildings were given up, would be out of time. In In re Paul the notice was given more than two months before the surrender of a part of the agricultural land. Section 7 of the English Act gives the landlord until fourteen days after the expiration of the two months to decide whether he will make a counterclaim, and if that period does not expire until after the land has been quitted, a new tenant may have entered and the landlord will be unable to view the land for the purpose of ascertaining whether there has been any waste or breach of covenant by the old tenant.

Beverley, in reply.—The relation of landlord and tenant existed until May, and the buildings retained were required for agricultural purposes and were part of the holding as defined by the Act.

WRIGHT, J.—With the assistance of the Scotch case (Black v. Clay) I entertain no real doubt as to this case. The Act says in substance that the tenant shall be entitled to compensation on quitting his holding at the determination of his tenancy, and that a holding within the Act must be either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral; subject to that a holding is "any parcel of land held by a tenant" (section 61). Therefore the right to compensation is given in respect of an agricultural holding on the determination of the tenancy of such a holding. On the 26th of February there was no tenancy of an agricultural holding within the Act. The agricultural land was given up on the 2nd of February, and the time for giving notice of claim expired two months before that date. Black v. Clay is an authority for that proposition. In the case of In re Paul the notice was given two months before about two hundred acres of meadow land was given up, and the court considered that while that land was retained the tenancy subsisted. For these reasons I think that the decision of the registrar was right.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. In re Paul seems to me to point to the conclusion that where there is a separate determination of the tenancy of the agricultural portion of a holding the right to compensation is gone if the claim be not made in due time before the tenancy of that part of the land is determined.

BENSAUDE v. THAMES AND MERSEY MARINE INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Insurance — Marine — Policy on freight—Exception—Claim consequent on loss of time—Delay by peril of sea.

A time policy of marine insurance against total loss of freight of a ship contained the following exception: "Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time, whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise."

While the ship was proceeding on a voyage under a charter her main shaft broke by perils of the sea, the damage being of such a character that the necessary delay for repairs frustrated the objects of the adventure, and the owners lost their chartered freight. In an action by the owners against the underwriters,

Held, that the claim was within the terms of the warranty, and therefore the underwriters were not liable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 45 W. R. 114, [1897] 1 Q. B. 29, affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.), reversing that of Collins, J., 45 W. R. 114, [1897] 1 Q. B. 29.

The facts are set out in the report in the court below.

The action was brought by the appellants upon a policy of marine insurance against total loss of freight on the steamship Peninsular.

The ship broke her main shaft owing to perils of the sea, and the consequential delay led to the total loss of freight.

The defendants, the underwriters and present respondents, relied upon the exception in the policy set out in the headnote.

Collins, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, but this was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who held that the claim was within the warranty, so that the defendants were not liable, against which the plaintiffs, the present appellants, now appealed.

Bigham, Q.C., and Bucknill, Q.C. (Leck with them), for the appellants.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the respondents, were not heard.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—This case has been very ably argued for the appellant, but I think none of your lordships entertain any doubt as to the conclusion at which we must arrive. If the words on which the question turns are to be read as part of the contract it is impossible to support the judgment of Collins, J. The words, if they are part of the contract, seem to be very plain; they are these: "Warranted free from any claim consequent upon loss of time arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise." The Peninsular (the vessel insured by a policy which contained these words by way of exception), as a matter of fact, broke her main shaft. It is not denied that if it was capable of being repaired within such time as would have enabled her to complete the adventure there would have been no loss of freight. The reason why there was loss of freight was that the repairs would have taken so long a time that the object of the adventure would have been defeated. That is how the loss of freight arose.

It has been assumed—and, indeed, it underlies the whole of the judgment of Collins, J.—that the right to insist upon the payment of the insurance money as upon a total loss of the freight was consummate at the moment the main shaft broke. Now, there is a fallacy underlying that form of the argument. It assumes that there must be a sufficiently ascertained condition of damage to show at once that the loss must have accrued, because the damage was of such a character that it could not be repaired in the time. But that is not so, for it would be only a question of evidence, which one might either ascertain at that time or wait until the facts had proved it by the occurrence of those facts subsequently. But the reason why the loss of freight had been incurred must be that the damage was of such a character that there was an impossibility of prosecuting the voyage within the time within which it was necessary to prosecute it. The facts here have been ascertained, and we now know why the freight was lost. Why was it? Not simpliciter because the main shaft was broken, but because the main shaft was broken under special circumstances—that is, at a distance from any place where it could be repaired within such a time as would have enabled the vessel to prosecute her voyage. But then the question comes, whether this is included in the language which I have read—"warranted free from any claim consequent upon loss of time arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise"? The main shaft being broken in consequence of a peril of the sea, what is the consequence of that? The consequence of that is that the vessel cannot within the time, perform the voyage. Is that, or is it not, a "claim consequent upon loss of time arising from a peril of the sea"? If this exception is part of the contract, and if it is applicable to the contract into which the parties have entered, I really am wholly incapable of following the argument that the present claim does not come literally within the words.

But then there is a sort of faint effort made to suggest that it is not part of the contract at all. Nobody actually says that it is not; nobody has ever ventured to say in terms that it is not; but there is a sort of insinuation to the effect that this warranty is only upon a piece of paper pasted on the margin of the policy. What is the relevancy of that? It either is, or is not, part of the contract. If it is part of the contract it is perfectly immaterial what part of the contract it appears in. It might as well have been incorporated in the original policy itself. But then it is said—or when I say it is said, perhaps that is overstating it—it is rather suggested that this may not have been a sort of stipulation that was applicable to the particular contract which the parties were making. It appears to me that this case itself shows that those words can receive a reasonable and intelligible meaning as applicable to the contract into which the parties were entering. Then why am I to reject the clause? Is it because it is pasted on? Is it because it is aside of the rest of the contract? No one can gravely suggest that. Then I have to construe this as part of the contract, and, as I have already said, this case itself furnishes an illustration of what the parties were intending to do. They intended to except out of the liability they had otherwise entered into, a claim which was consequent upon loss of time arising from a peril of the sea. If the claim was consequent upon loss of time occasioned in that way, then the warranty was to apply. This claim seems to me to be in the strictest sense consequent upon loss of time so occasioned in any ordinary and reasonable meaning that can be put upon the words. Therefore I think the judgment of the court below was perfectly right, and I move your lordships that it be affirmed.

Lord WATSON.—In this case I think it is part of the appellants' own case that the breaking of the shaft of The Peninsular, owing to a peril of the sea, rendered inevitable such delay in the prosecution of her voyage as entitled the charterer to determine the adventure. The loss of freight, in my opinion, was consequent upon that delay in this sense, that but for delay occasioned by the breaking of the shaft there would have been no loss to claim. The only question that remains is, whether the clause, which is one of the conditions pasted upon the document forming the contract between the parties, is to receive effect or no? For my own part, I think there has been no cause whatever shown for rejecting it, and I can only add that I entirely agree with the opinions expressed by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, because I think with them that the case which occurs here falls precisely within the words of the exception which are introduced by their conditions. I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord HERSCHELL.—This is a policy against total loss of freight. The learned counsel for the appellants were unable to suggest any case or class of cases to which the words of the warranty would apply, unless it were to such a case as is now before your lordships. I quite agree that if you find in a policy, as you commonly do, a number of stipulations inserted, and with reference to the subject-matter of a policy one of those stipulations is, on its natural construction, inapplicable, it would not be right for the purpose of finding a meaning for that as applicable to that particular contract to torture or strain its language. The natural conclusion would be that the common form had been used with the insertion of certain warranties or conditions not applicable to the particular case as the policy was completed. This is, of course, not an uncommon occurrence. But if with reference to the subject-matter of the policy the particular stipulation is applicable without any straining or torturing of the language, then it is the duty of the court construing the contract to give that natural meaning and construction to it as applicable to the subject-matter of the contract. Now, can these words be properly applied to a policy against total loss of freight? It seems to me that they can, and that the present case is an illustration of a perfectly proper application of them. The whole basis of the claim, of course, must be the loss of the subject-matter insured—that is, the freight. That loss must arise from one of the perils insured against. What is the meaning of saying that the underwriter is not to be liable for any claim consequent upon loss of time? It must mean that, although the subject-matter insured has been lost, and although it has been lost by a peril insured against, if the claim depends on loss of time in the prosecution of the voyage, so that the adventure cannot be completed within the time contemplated, then the underwriter is to be exempt from liability. It seems to me, not only is no violence done to the words, but they receive the natural, the ordinary and reasonable, signification when they are applied to such a case as this.

Lord SHAND and Lord DAVEY concurred.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) reversing a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B., and Wright, J.) upon a special case stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11. The case is set out at length in the court below (44 W. R. 621), the short question being whether the London County Council were rateable as occupiers of Brockwell Park, which they had acquired under the London Council (General Powers) Act, 1890, and which they were by statute directed to lay out and maintain for the public, there being no duty imposed on the council to acquire such, and the expenses of maintenance being greater than the incomings. The Court of Appeal had decided that the London County Council were not rateable.

Lewis Coward replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—In this case the question is whether Brockwell Park is rateable, and, if so, what is to be the principle upon which it is to be rated.

The facts which raise the question may be very simply stated. In 1891 the London County Council purchased the land and buildings which now form the park under the powers of an Act which, when purchased, cast upon them the perpetual obligations to maintain and preserve it as a park for the perpetual use of the public for exercise and recreation.

The special case goes on to state some other things which appear to me to be irrelevant. We have nothing to do with the previous history of the seventy-eight acres of which Brockwell Park consists, nor are we concerned with the question whether it would be rateable if it were otherwise held and enjoyed. The main question, and indeed, as it appears to me, the only question, is whether it is now rateable at all; and I am of opinion that it is not. I do not think there is here a rateable occupation by anybody. The "public" is not a rateable occupier, and I think that one sentence disposes of the case. I think the Putney Bridge case is expressly in point, and I can draw no distinction between an artificial structure with a road over it for the use of the public and a park for the like purpose of allowing the public to go into and use it. I think the Putney Bridge case was rightly decided, and I think it is strictly in point in this case. The fact that the park is vested in the County Council does not make them the occupiers. It would be absurd to contend that wherever the legal estate is there is occupation. A road is vested in some one, but if a public road there is no occupation of it any more than of a milestone or a direction-post. I have hitherto dealt only with the question of occupation, and, as I have said, I think there is no occupation at all, the County Council being merely custodians and trustees for the public.

But I do not disagree with the reasoning of A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ., as to the rateability of an occupation where an occupation exists. No tenant would give anything for an occupation which would not give him a capacity to earn more than the rent which he is called upon to pay for it, and if the statute, as in this case, prevents him from earning anything, there can, under the Parochial Assessment Act, be no rateable occupation, as under that Act the rate is to be measured by the rent which a tenant would pay. It appears to me that the nature of the occupation here is such that there can be no rateable occupation in the sense in which those words are explained by many cases which it is not now necessary to refer to.

The law is, I think, now settled, and the case of the occupying owner, which has caused some confusion, is now clear enough; and upon this point also the Putney Bridge case seems to me in point. Once it has been found, as in this case, that the occupation cannot, as a matter of law, be a beneficial occupation, there is an end of the question. I say as matter of law; because that it does not give a beneficial occupation as matter of fact is nothing to the purpose. Here there is no possibility of beneficial occupation to the County Council; they are incapable by law of using it for any profitable purpose—they must allow the public the free and unrestricted use of it.

It is hardly necessary to deal with the other point (if it can be called another point) in respect of the mansion-house and refreshment-rooms. They are and must remain part of the park, and are no more capable, or in fact subject, to different considerations than the park itself. They are and must be part of the park. They cannot be separated from it, and are within the principle which I have already explained.

For these reasons I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The question raised in this case is whether the respondents are liable to be rated as occupiers of a public park which is vested in them solely for the purpose of maintaining it for the use of the public.

The park was acquired under the powers of the London Council (General Powers) Act, 1890. That statute empowered the council to purchase by agreement certain lands, and provided that, when they had acquired the same, they should "hold the same and every part thereof as a park, and lay out and maintain and preserve the same and every part thereof as a park for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation." The statute also enabled the council to enclose the lands for the better preservation thereof for public use, and to adapt the buildings thereon for the public benefit; to erect lodges for the accommodation of keepers and others employed in the maintenance and management of the park, and such other building as they might think requisite for refreshment rooms, band-stands, and other conveniences. These powers were all strictly ancillary to the maintenance of the park in perpetuity for the use of the public.

Small sums of money are received by the council for licences to supply refreshments in the park, and for the grazing of the herbage; but the case states that the necessary expenses of maintaining the park as a whole with the buildings on it for the purposes of the Act far exceed any sums of money which are or could be derived from licences for the supply of refreshments or for grazing rights or otherwise.

In order to determine whether the respondents are liable to be rated in respect of the park and its adjuncts, the question which has to be answered is, at what rent (if any) the hereditaments might reasonably be expected to let, taking one year with another. It is well settled that in answering this question regard must be had to any restrictions which the Legislature has imposed upon their use, and the hypothetical tenant must be supposed to take them subject to these restrictions. Bearing this in mind, it seems clear that the park and the buildings thereon can have no rateable value; no tenant would give anything for them, seeing that every part of them is dedicated to the public use, and that the small sums of money which might be received in respect of them would, as the case finds, be more than absorbed by the expense of keeping them in order. It was argued, however, for the appellants that, on the authority of the Erith case, the respondents ought to be considered as among the possible hypothetical tenants, and that, as they made a considerable contribution towards the cost of purchasing the park, they would have been willing to pay a rental for its use. In my opinion the Erith case has no application. The land on which the pumping stations were constructed, the rateability of which was there in question, was not by statute dedicated to that use. The London County Council could place there pumping stations where they pleased; they could remove them elsewhere at any time they thought fit, or dispense with them altogether if they adopted some other method of dealing with their sewage, and could sell or let the land to a tenant whose use of it would be unrestricted. About the rateability of the land there, there could be no real controversy. The only question was what was its rateable value, and whether the county council could be taken into account in enquiring what the hypothetical tenant would give. It was held that they might, inasmuch as their statutory duties imposed upon them the obligation to provide for the disposal of the sewage. Here, these very lands and every part thereof by statute must be held in perpetuity for the use of the public, and the question is whether, under these circumstances, they are rateable at all. I think that on principle they are not, and the Putney Bridge case, which, in my opinion, was rightly decided, is not distinguishable from that under consideration. Moreover, I am not satisfied that the County Council are occupiers of this park for rating purposes, though the legal possession is no doubt vested in them. They seem to me to be merely custodians or trustees to hold it and manage it for the use of the public. This was the view taken by some of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal with regard to the position of the county council in relation to Putney Bridge. I concur in the view they expressed, and in my opinion it is equally applicable to Brockwell Park. For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

TURNER v. STALLIBRASS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Action founded on tort—Bailment—Agistment—Injury to animal—Negligence—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.

The plaintiff delivered a horse to the defendants to be agisted in consideration of a daily payment, and the defendants negligently turned the horse into a field in which there was a barbed wire fence covered with long grass, whereby the horse was injured. In an action to recover damages for the injuries to the horse, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £30.

Held, as the negligence relied upon was a breach of the common law duty arising out of the bailment, that the action was founded on tort within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and the plaintiff was entitled to costs upon the High Court scale.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers.

The action was brought to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff's horse by reason of the negligence of the defendants.

The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff delivered to the defendants a horse to be agisted, kept, and taken care of by them in consideration of a payment of one shilling a day, and the defendants promised in consideration thereof to safely agist, keep, and take care of the horse, yet that the defendants in breach of the contract negligently put the horse into a field where there was a wire fence hidden by long grass, whereby the horse was injured.

The facts as proved showed that the plaintiff delivered a horse to the defendants to be agisted, and that the defendants turned the horse into a field in which was a barbed wire fence covered with long grass, in consequence of which the horse was injured.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £30, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff for this amount. Upon the taxation of costs the master was of opinion that the action was founded on tort and that the costs should be taxed upon the High Court scale. Upon appeal, Day, J., was of opinion that the action was founded on contract, and that the costs should be taxed upon the County Court scale.

The following cases were referred to: Taylor v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 43 W. R. 120, [1895] 1 Q. B. 134; Kelly v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 43 W. R. 497, [1895] 1 Q. B. 944; Marzetti v. Williams, 1 B. & Ad. 415; Boorman v. Brown, 3 Q. B. 511; Legge v. Tucker, 5 W. R. 78, 1 H. & N. 500; Corbett v. Packington, 6 B. & C. 268; Bullen & Leake's Precedents of Pleading, 3rd. ed., 275.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion this is an action founded on tort within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and the costs should be taxed upon the High Court scale. If the action is one in which the plaintiff, in order to succeed in his claim, need not rely upon and prove a contract, it is an action founded on tort. If, on the other hand, it is necessary for him to rely upon and prove a contract, it is an action founded on contract. The question, therefore, is whether it was necessary for the plaintiff to rely upon and prove a contract. It was held long ago in Bryant v. Herbert, 26 W. R. 898, 3 C. P. D. 389, that the form of the pleadings is not material upon this question, and that case has been followed in Taylor v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., and Kelly v. Metropolitan Railway Co. In my judgment it is also immaterial how the plaintiff's case is opened at the trial, or how the judge directs the jury, though, if the latter, consideration is material, the learned judge in this case directed the jury as if this was an action of tort. In my opinion the cause of action in this case can be maintained without proof of a contract of agistment. There was a bailment upon proof of which the duty arose not to be negligent. The plaintiff therefore need only prove the bailment, the breach of duty, and the damages. That being so, this action was founded on tort within the meaning of section 116. The appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The section divides actions into two classes for the purpose of determining what costs are to be allowed. Before the action is tried it can be seen into which class it falls. It is not material to consider how the action is conducted or how it is tried. The pleadings also are not conclusive. If the plaintiff is obliged to rely upon a contract, then it is an action founded on contract. If, on the other hand, he is not obliged to rely upon a contract, it is an action founded on tort.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Some confusion may perhaps be caused by saying that the question depends upon whether the plaintiff is obliged to rely upon a contract or not. A bailment arises out of some relation between the parties, some meeting of the minds, but that is not such a contract, if it can be called a contract, as determines whether an action is founded on contract or on tort within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The necessity of proving a bailment does not dispose of the question whether the plaintiff is obliged, in order to succeed, to rely upon a contract. The question comes in after that. Having got the common law duty and rights arising out of the bailment, then if the plaintiff alleges that the defendant was bound to do something more than was embraced in the common law obligation, the action is founded on contract. If the plaintiff is only obliged to rely upon the common law obligation, then it is an action founded on tort. That seems to me to explain all the cases, and the difference between misfeasance and non-feasance. It seems to me that whether the complaint arises out of misfeasance or non-feasance, if it comes within the ambit of the common law obligation, the action is founded on tort. But if it does not come within the common law obligation and something more is required, the action is founded on contract. If, therefore, in order to support the plaintiff's claim, it were necessary to import into the contract of agistment some obligation which the common law did not import, then it would be an action founded on contract. In my opinion there is no such necessity here, and therefore this is an action founded on tort.

Appeal allowed.

Bill of sale—Execution creditor—Sale by sheriff by order of court—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11—R. S. C., ord. 57, r. 12.

The jurisdiction conferred on the court by ord. 57, r. 12, ought not to be exercised against a mortgagee, unless there is a reasonable ground for assuming that the sale will produce more than sufficient to answer the just claims of the mortgagee, so as to leave a surplus available for the execution creditor.

Semble, the effect of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, upon the execution and the proceedings thereon, on request made by the official receiver for delivery of the goods, would be to preclude any proceedings being taken by the execution creditor under ord. 57, r. 12.

Appeal from an order of Ridley, J. (sitting as Vacation Judge).

On the 11th of August, 1897, one Tegner executed a bill of sale in favour of the appellant Smith to secure £300 at 30 per cent. interest, repayable on the 11th of November next.

In September the landlord distrained on the grantor of the bill of sale for rent, and on the 30th of September the sheriff seized the goods comprised in the bill of sale at the instance of Stern, who had obtained a judgment against Tegner.

On the 1st of October Smith, the claimant, sent in his claim under the bill of sale, and shortly afterwards paid off the landlord.

On the 7th of October the sheriff issued an interpleader summons, and on the same day a receiving order was made against the debtor.

On the 15th of October an adjudication in bankruptcy was made, and on the same day the master in chambers directed a sale on certain terms which were subsequently varied by the order of Ridley, J.

The bill of sale holder, Smith, appealed.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—The order directing the sale by the sheriff is in no form authorized by any statute or rule of court. The court has no right to interfere with a legal mortgagee and order a sale by the sheriff when the security is doubtful. There are three enactments in the Bankruptcy Acts bearing on this—section 9 (2) and section 45 of the Act of 1883, and section 11 of the Act of 1890, which replaced section 46 of the Act of 1883. The effect is that the execution creditor is squeezed out. The order was wrong and ought to be discharged, and the sheriff should be directed to withdraw.

They referred to Ex parte Halling, In re Haydon, 26 W. R. 182, 7 Ch. D. 157; Forster v. Clowser, [1897] 2 Q. B. 362, 45 W. R. Dig. 123; and The Merchant Banking Co., of London v. The London and Hanseatic Bank, 55 L. J. Ch. 479, 34 W. R. Dig. 122.

A. H. Carrington, for the official receiver and trustee in bankruptcy.—The order is quite correct, and jurisdiction is obtained under ord. 57, r. 12. Section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, does not apply and does not contemplate a case where there is the complication of bankruptcy as here. [LINDLEY, M.R.—Have you any authority to say that section 13 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, or ord. 57, r. 12, has ever been applied to bankruptcy?] No. The master and judge both thought the order advisable.

J. P. Earle, for the execution creditor.

Rose-Innes, for the sheriff.

Reed, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 30.—LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts, and continued: The execution creditor is relying with the trustee in bankruptcy upon the right to have this property sold under ord. 57, r. 12. The case is distinguishable, so far as I know, from any case which has arisen yet, by reason of the operation of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, which was relied on very strongly by counsel for the appellant, as rendering the application of ord. 57, r. 12, inaccurate in the present case. Now I will read the section of the Bankruptcy Act first. Section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, runs thus: "Where any goods of a debtor are taken in execution, and before the sale thereof, or the completion of the execution by the receipt or recovery of the full amount of the levy, notice is served on the sheriff that a receiving order has been made against the debtor, the sheriff shall, on request, deliver the goods and any money seized or received in part satisfaction of the execution to the official receiver, but the costs of the execution shall be a first charge on the goods or money so delivered, and the official receiver or trustee may sell the goods, or an adequate part thereof for the purpose of satisfying the charge." Now what was done is very curious. In this case the trustee in bankruptcy has not asserted his right to the goods under section 11. He has not requested, in other words, the sheriff to deliver his goods to him nor to pay the money to him. He has appeared on the interpleader proceedings, and he has, so to speak, made use of the execution creditor's judgment in order, if he can, to compel the sale of these goods under ord. 57, r. 12. That is a curious proceeding, and it is important, because before I had read this section 11 as carefully as I have since done, I was rather impressed by the argument addressed to us by the claimant, Mr. Smith's counsel, that the bankruptcy put an end to the execution. It only does so at the option of the trustee. If he chooses to assert his rights, the execution creditor seems to me to have no rights, but if the trustee takes the course which he has taken, not of asserting his rights, but of backing up the execution creditor, and getting what he can by that process for the purpose of inducing the court to make an order which it otherwise would have no jurisdiction to make, then it appears to me that section 11 does not invalidate the execution. That gets rid of a considerable part of the argument which was addressed to us.

Now I come to ord. 57, r. 12: "When goods or chattels have been seized in execution by a sheriff or other officer charged with the execution of process of the High Court, and any claimant alleges that he is entitled, under bill of sale or otherwise, to the goods or chattels by way of security for debt, the court or a judge may order the sale of the whole or a part thereof, and direct the application of the proceeds of the sale in such manner and upon such terms as may be just." That is copied, and reproduced with slight variations, from section 13 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, and the effect of it is quite obvious from the history of that Act and what we all know, and what we shall find very concisely stated in Day, J.'s book, at p. 361. The comment is this: "This section confers new and valuable powers. Hitherto, if the claimant established a title to goods of however great value by way of security, for however small a sum, the execution was defeated absolutely, as the court had no power to provide for the realization of the security and the disposal of the surplus or for the payment of the debt and discharge of the security by the execution creditor. This defect is now mended, and a convenient and much-used scheme for defeating creditors is interrupted." Now comes the question, How are we to deal with this rule under those circumstances? I am not prepared to say but that the course taken by the trustee in bankruptcy is illegal or improper, and I am not prepared to say that ord. 57, r. 12, cannot be invoked, having regard to what has been done in the present case. If the trustee had asserted his rights against the execution creditor under section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, I doubt whether ord. 57, r. 12, would have been applicable. My present impression is that it would not; but the trustee has not asserted such rights, and I will assume that ord. 57, r. 12, can be still invoked by him and the execution creditor. But ord. 57, r. 12, was not intended to deprive secured creditors of the benefit of their security, and when this will, or very likely will, be the case the court ought not to direct the sale, but ought to direct the sheriff to withdraw. There are three cases which arise in practice. First of all, the case where the security is ample and where the bill of sale holder or the execution creditor tries to assert his rights; he defeats the other creditors. That is the common case which section 13 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, was intended to rectify. The bill of sale holder cannot stand upon his rights when it is plain that he is defeating the execution creditor, which, of course, involves the assumption that after paying off the bill of sale there will be something left. That is an easy case. Now, the next case is where the security is plainly deficient. Then, on the hypothesis that there is nothing for the execution creditor, it follows that there will be a deficiency, and that even if there were a sale there would not be a surplus. Then it follows as a matter of course that the only proper course is to direct the sheriff to withdraw. What has the execution creditor got to do with it if he cannot possibly get anything out of it? That is an easy case. The third case is somewhat more doubtful and more difficult. It is when there is a doubt whether the security is sufficient to pay off the secured creditor or not. The proper course in such a case is for the court to say, "Unless you, the execution creditor, will guarantee the secured creditor against loss by sale we will not order the sale." Here the execution creditor and the trustee have declined to redeem and declined to give any guarantee at all against any loss. That has induced me to look more carefully than I did in court, into the evidence, and upon the evidence I am perfectly satisfied that if these goods are sold by the sheriff it is extremely doubtful whether there will be enough to pay the bill of sale holder. As to there being a surplus for the execution creditor, of course I cannot say what the result of a sale might be, but the surplus might be nothing; it might be a shilling, or sixpence, or a few shillings. Well, under those circumstances, how can it be just to enforce a sale and deprive him of his security? That is to abuse the rule, not to put it into operation in a case, to meet which, it was passed. It is said that this view is opposed to a decision of this court in Forster v. Clowser. I do not think so at all. It appears to me perfectly consistent with it. What the Court of Appeal did there was this: they were satisfied that there was enough to pay off the bill of sale holder that which they considered was the sum properly payable to him. I think the court went a long way in anticipating the date of payment. That is nothing. I am satisfied they never would have deprived him of his security; they were satisfied, in other words, that upon the sale and the payment to him in full of what they thought he was entitled to there would be a surplus left for the execution creditor. That is quite a different case. Here I am satisfied that it is extremely doubtful whether there will be a shilling for the execution creditor. The conclusion which I have arrived at is that if there is an enforced sale by the sheriff, of the nature we are all acquainted with, there will not be twenty shillings in the pound for the secured creditor. Under those circumstances it appears to me this appeal ought to succeed. The proper order will be that the sheriff is to withdraw, and there must be no action against him. The execution creditor must pay him his costs and charges. The execution creditor and the trustee in bankruptcy must pay the appellant here and below his costs, and must bear their own costs themselves, but the order is not to prejudice the right of the trustee to pay his costs out of the bankrupt's estate. We think it would be right, if we could do so, to give the execution creditor a second charge on these goods so that he may be reimbursed the expenses to which he will have to be put, because he has acted with the trustee and under his direction. I am assuming there is a surplus. I do not know that we have any jurisdiction to do that, but it would obviously be right if some arrangement could be made between the trustee and the execution creditor to reimburse the execution creditor the costs which he will have to pay.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. It was argued for the appellant that the execution was wholly put an end to by the 11th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and consequently that ord. 57, r. 12, was no longer applicable inasmuch as the receiving order had been made before the order for sale. It is not necessary to determine what would have been the effect of the 11th section upon the execution and the proceedings thereon if a request had been made by the official receiver for delivery of the goods to him. As at present advised I think that such a request would preclude proceedings by the execution creditor under ord. 57, r. 12. No such request was made; on the contrary the official receiver and the trustee in bankruptcy, both in chambers and before us, supported the application for sale and the order made on that application. In other words they declined to avail themselves of the benefit of the 11th section. It is not easy to see how in these circumstances the secured creditor, whose rights are not affected by the receiving order and the subsequent bankruptcy, can set up this 11th section as a bar; but, again, it is unnecessary to decide this point, and I will assume against him that he cannot. I think, however, that the order, assuming there was jurisdiction to make it, was unjust towards him.

I have carefully considered the effect of the evidence as to the value of the goods, and have come to the conclusion that the sale will not produce a sum sufficient to satisfy the just claims of the mortgagee. A forced sale of furniture by the sheriff without reserve and away from the house is notoriously a disadvantageous method of selling. In my opinion the jurisdiction conferred by the 12th rule ought not to be exercised against the mortgagee unless there is a reasonable ground for holding that the sale will produce more than sufficient to answer the just claims of the mortgagee, so as to leave a surplus available for the execution creditor. In Forster v. Clowser the judge was satisfied that there would be a surplus; the Court of Appeal saw no reason for disturbing his decision on this point; and the majority of the court gave effect to what they considered were the substantial rights of the mortgagee.

VISCOUNT HILL v. BULLOCK. (a.)

Fixtures—Movable chattels—Stuffed birds and animals—Mansion-house—Settled estate.

Specimens of stuffed birds and animals, forming part of a natural history collection in a museum built on to the mansion-house, are not fixtures so as to devolve with the freehold under the limitations of a settlement.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The decision of Kekewich, J. (45 W. R. 587), affirmed.

Appeal of the plaintiff from Kekewich, J. (reported 45 W. R. 587).

The action was brought by the Right Hon. Rowland Richard Clegg Hill, Viscount Hill, the tenant for life of the mansion-house and settled estates at Hawkstone, in the county of Salop, and William Slaney Kenyon-Slaney, the surviving trustee of the settlement, for an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, from removing, or causing to be removed, from the said mansion-house any pictures or other chattels fixed to the walls or floors of the said house, or other fixtures therein, or any heirlooms or settled chattels, and also for a mandatory injunction ordering the defendant to restore any such fixtures, heirlooms, and chattels as had been removed by him.

The defendant was the trustee in bankruptcy of the late Viscount Hill, who was adjudicated bankrupt on the 24th of August, 1894, and who died on the 30th of March, 1895.

The defendant claimed (inter alia) the following articles as being the property of the late viscount—namely, the fixed cases, together with the birds and animals and other objects of art and natural history, contained in the rooms called the "Bird Gallery." At the trial of the action the point at issue was mainly confined to the question whether the birds and animals were fixtures or not. It was admitted that the cases, which were fixed to the freehold by means of iron brackets let into the wall, did not pass to the defendant. The cases in the middle of the room were made of wood, and were not fixed, but rested by their own weight. Wooden trays or drawers were fitted into these iron cases, and could be removed at pleasure. The birds and animals were of considerable value, and were mounted in the usual manner, some being also attached to imitation rockwork or branches fitting inside the cases, others not being fastened in any way.

Kekewich, J., held that the contents of the cases were not fixtures attached to the freehold, but were movable personal chattels, and as such devolved upon the trustee in bankruptcy of the previous owner.

The present viscount, the tenant for life, appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Christopher James, for the appellant.—The birds would pass with a conveyance of the house without special mention.

They relied upon D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, 15 W. R. 186, L. R. 3 Eq. 382.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is now admitted that the cases in which the birds were kept were part of the house, and the linings are also admitted to be part of the freehold. It is said further that a conveyance of the house would pass the birds. But is that common sense? After all, in considering what are legal fixtures, we must apply common sense. For what purpose does a man make a collection of birds? In such a collection as this would he ever dream of such a proposition as that he could not take out a bird from its case and put it in another room? Such a contention is absolutely impracticable. It would be contrary to the habits of mankind. The case of D'Eyncourt v. Gregory does not apply. In that case the tapestry and certain unfixed articles were held to pass because they formed strictly part of the architectural design. The birds here are not part of the architectural design.

The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The cases have been held by Kekewich, J., to be fixtures, and they were properly so held. The linings were also held to be fixtures, as part and parcel of the cases. It was not so held with regard to the birds. I am unable to accede to the appellant's argument that they are fixtures. The birds are fixed by gum or glue, or by wire fixed on to the linings. We must look to the degree of annexation; it is extremely slight. But, further, what was the object of the annexation? Was it with the idea of making the birds part of the house? That would be absurd. The wire was used for the purpose of supporting them and making them more convenient to be looked at. They cannot be said in any way to be fixtures.

D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, which was relied upon, has no application here. The result is that Kekewich, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—The appellant's case is that the birds form part of the house. The reasoning is that the room in which they were was built for the purpose of receiving them, and became part of the settled land. The appellant has to face this additional difficulty: he cannot claim the whole, but claims rather more than half. He claims those which are annexed to the freehold by wire, glue, or gum. These adjuncts are employed for the purpose of showing off the birds to greater advantage. Then it is said that the birds form part of the architectural design, and are an ornamental feature of the building; that the second Viscount purported to annex them to the freehold, so that he could not change a single bird if he wished to. That argument answers for itself. Such an idea is preposterous. The paper on the wall is part of the wall—per Lord Romilly: the silk which replaces the paper is part of the wall, and ergo tapestry, ergo birds which replace that.

The result is that the trustee in bankruptcy is brought in. The birds are mere chattels, removable by the person who put them there, and they are now removable by the owner, the trustee in bankruptcy.

The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WRIGHT. (a.)

River—Navigable river—Foreshore—Right to moor vessels—Public right.

The owner of the foreshore of a navigable river holds possession of the soil subject to the right of all persons navigating the river to use the waters in all ordinary navigable ways, including the right to moor their vessels by means of fixed moorings.

Application by the defendant for judgment in an action tried before Cave, J., and a jury.

This was an action for an injunction brought by the Attorney-General on the relation of certain fishermen and boat owners who were accustomed to moor their boats in the estuary of the Thames at Leigh. They complained that the defendant, who was the sub-lessee of a several fishery in the waters in question, and claimed to be in occupation of the foreshore, had interfered with their moorings and cast their boats adrift.

The defendant by way of counter-claim complained that the plaintiffs had wrongfully laid down permanent moorings in the soil of the foreshore, and thereby committed a trespass on his property, and he asked for a declaration that he was entitled to enjoy the soil free from the rights which the plaintiffs claimed on behalf of the public.

The jury found that all persons navigating the waters in question had from time immemorial used the foreshore for fixed moorings, and the learned judge accordingly granted an injunction as asked for by the plaintiffs.

The defendant gave notice of motion that judgment might be entered for him.

Rentoul, Q.C., Stuart Moore, R. Edmondson, and Ernest Saunt, for the plaintiffs, cited Lord Hale's De Portibus Maris, c. 7; and Free Fishers of Whitstable v. Foreman, 16 W. R. 1019, L. R. 3 C. P. 578.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case in a part of the River Thames where it is navigable certain fishermen and owners of yachts and other vessels have put down moorings, which they have marked with buoys, so that each of them can attach his vessel to his mooring, and can from time to time slip his vessel and sail away and on his return attach it again. These moorings—that is to say, the things of which they are formed, the sunken beam of wood or other heavy weight and the chain and buoy attached to it, are the property of the persons who put them down, at any rate they were their property at the time they were put down. The defendant is the lessee of the owner of the soil under the water where these moorings are placed, and he contends that the plaintiffs have no right to put anything into his soil, and he complains of what they have done as a trespass, and claims that he has a right to get rid of that trespass by cutting the chains and sending the vessels adrift, and also a right to take and use the things which the plaintiffs have put into his soil.

Now, what is the meaning of a mooring? It is a phrase used in connection with the sea, and it means not merely the bringing of a vessel to anchor, but such a mode of anchoring a vessel as will allow the vessel to leave her anchorage for a time and come back and take possession of it again. The owner of the vessel takes possession of his own anchor and buoy, not of the soil. He does not claim an exclusive right to any measured amount of water, but he claims to be entitled to say that no one has a right to cut his chain or move his buoy. He admits that others may anchor their vessels close to his vessel, but not so as to touch it.

Is that mode of anchoring a vessel a common incident of navigation? Judges must use the knowledge which they possess in common with other persons, and everyone knows that there are two ways of anchoring a ship—one the temporary way, by means of an anchor, which can be dropped and lifted whenever necessary; the other, the more permanent mode, by means of moorings. This latter mode is within the ordinary course of navigation. I think that, when these fishermen and others put down moorings in these navigable waters, they were not exercising a right belonging to them as individuals, but a right belonging to the public generally—viz., to use navigable waters in all ordinary navigable ways, including the right to anchor vessels in either of the two recognized modes, by means of an anchor or of moorings. It follows that the defendant has possession of the soil subject to this public right, and I do not think that the plaintiffs, in order to support their case, require any prescription other than this prescriptive right belonging to the people of this country generally. The defendant therefore had no right to interfere as he did with the plaintiffs' moorings.

It may be that there is a prescription in favour of persons frequenting this particular place. If any such prescription is necessary for the plaintiffs' case, I think there was evidence to support it, and that we may presume a grant either from the Crown or from the lord of the manor. The plaintiffs therefore are entitled to an injunction, and the appeal must be dismissed.

BREAY v. ROYAL BRITISH NURSES' ASSOCIATION. (a.)

*Corporation—Newspaper—Libel—Action against editor—Liability of proprietors—Indemnity—*Ultra vires.

The editor of a journal owned by and published for the benefit of the members of a nursing association (incorporated by Royal Charter) inserted in the journal, on the express instructions of the executive committee of the proprietors, paragraphs which were alleged to be libels on one of the members of the association. An action for libel having been brought by the member against the editor alone, the executive committee resolved to defend such action and to indemnify the editor against costs and damages.

Held (reversing the decision of North, J.), that such a defence of the action was not a misapplication of the funds of the association; and a motion for an interim injunction by one of the members of the association to restrain such application of the funds was accordingly dismissed.

Appeal of the defendants from North, J.

The defendant association (which was incorporated by Royal Charter for objects connected with nursing) were the proprietors and publishers of a journal called the Nurses' Journal, published for the information and benefit of the members of the association. It was superintended by a sub-committee called the Journal and Library Sub-committee, appointed by the executive committee, and was edited by a member of the association, Miss De Pledge.

In July, 1896, the annual general meeting of the association was held, and in the August number of the journal appeared an account of the meeting, together with editorial comments on the part taken at it by Dr. Bedford Fenwick.

Dr. Fenwick being of opinion that these comments constituted a libel on himself thereupon commenced an action for libel in the Queen's Bench Division against Miss De Pledge alone, without joining the association as defendants.

On the 5th of February, 1897, the executive committee at a meeting resolved to defend the action in the name of the association, and their resolution was adopted and approved by a large majority at the quarterly meeting of the general council of the association on the 9th of April, 1897.

Miss Breay, a dissentient member of the association, then commenced the present action, and moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants from expending the funds of the association in defending the action against Miss De Pledge.

North, J., granted the injunction.

The association appealed.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellants.—Miss De Pledge is merely the servant and agent of the association, who are the publishers and proprietors of the journal. If this be a libel, it is the duty of the association to justify it and defend the action, and to indemnify their own servant.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the respondent.—Where there is a contract to indemnify against the consequences of publishing a libel, it cannot be enforced; each one is liable for his own tort: Colburne v. Patmore, 1 C. M. & R. 73; Shackell v. Rosier, 2 Bing. N. C. 634. This is different from the case where a master is liable for his servants' torts. There cannot be any liability for indemnity for costs or debt either by express contract or otherwise; that being so, this association is not justified in expending its funds in defending this action.

No reply was called for.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It appears to us, now that we understand the facts, that the law would be in a very unsatisfactory state if this judgment could be sustained. Here is a society called the Royal British Nurses' Association which was incorporated for certain objects. The association some time ago started the publication of a journal called the Nurses' Journal. Now it appears that in July, 1896, a meeting of the association was held, and an account of that meeting was published with comments in one of the numbers of this journal. How that came about is explained in the affidavit of the secretary. He says that the library sub-committee, or the journal sub-committee as it is sometimes called, were in the habit of employing a lady of the name of De Pledge as their honorary editor of the journal, and that they sent her for publication an account of the meeting with these comments. She put it into the journal. It is said that that reflected upon a member of the association, Dr. Fenwick, and he brought an action against Miss De Pledge for libel, the libel being the publication of the papers so put into her hands by the orders of the sub-committee. If the publication is a libel of course we all know that Miss De Pledge will be liable for it. But it is a most important fact in this case that the association will likewise be liable for the very same thing. They published it, there is no controversy about it at all. It was put into the journal of which they are the proprietors and the publishers, and it was put there by the authority of their sub-committee. To say that there is anything to be tried in the present action as to the liability of Miss De Pledge or the liability of the association is a mistake altogether. There is no question whatever to be tried. Their liability is obvious enough. Now, what takes place? The libel action having been instituted in November 1896, in February, 1897, there is a meeting of the executive committee, and they pass a resolution which is in substance that they resolve to defend that action against Miss De Pledge. Then on the 9th of April 1897, there is the quarterly general meeting of the council, which is, I understand, a larger body, and they approve of the action of the executive committee and resolve to defend Miss De Pledge in that action of libel brought against her by Dr. Fenwick. Then some ingenious persons determine that they will try to stop that, and they get a member of the association to bring an action in the Chancery Division to restrain the association from applying their funds in defending Miss De Pledge.

The question is whether such an action can be supported. Now, the learned judge has held that for the present purpose there is some question to be tried, and he has granted an injunction. On reading his judgment I cannot help thinking that he has been influenced by a view which, I think, is incorrect—that is to say, that there was some unwillingness on the part of the association to be sued in the action for libel or to be made defendants in that action. They cannot make themselves defendants in a libel action; it depends upon the person libelled whether he will sue them or not. But, acting somewhat perhaps in deference to the learned judge's view, they did try to get themselves joined and they failed. They failed very properly in accordance with the ordinary practice relating to parties to actions. But I cannot help thinking that the learned judge was a little influenced by his view that they were not willing to be sued themselves for this libel. I will pass that over, as having nothing in it. Now we must look at the matter with a view to legal principles, and also not forgetting common sense. What is the grievance of Miss Breay, who is a member of this association who is seeking relief from the Chancery Division upon the ground that the funds of the association are being misapplied? What are the association doing? The association are, under the circumstances to which I have alluded, in the position of being themselves liable to be sued, and it is to me as plain as anything can be that if it had suited Dr. Fenwick to bring an action against Miss De Pledge and the association themselves, he could have done so. It is equally plain to me that under those circumstances the association could, of course, have defended that action. They need not have severed from their co-defendant, they were all in the same boat, and the circumstances to which I have alluded show that they are the persons who as between them and Miss De Pledge are really the persons to blame, if anybody is to blame, for this publication. To say that under that state of circumstances they could not have defended the action, including the action against Miss De Pledge as one of the parties, is to me an outrage on common sense. Then let us go a step further. Is it to depend upon Dr. Fenwick whether the association are to be at liberty to defend this action which he has brought against Miss De Pledge alone? Can it make any difference in principle whether they are sued together or sued separately or whether he prefers to sue Miss De Pledge alone? It appears to me that there is nothing whatever which justifies any such distinction being drawn. But let us look a little further. Let us look at the matter in a straightforward, untechnical way. What is it that the defendants are doing? A lady, acting under the instructions of the association's executive committee, has published a libel in their journal, and they say that they do not care whether Miss De Pledge could sue them and compel them to indemnify her or whether she could not, but that under the circumstances they think that it is right and just that they should defend her from the consequences of what she has done in their interests in their paper, and that they will defend her.

Now, supposing this association were not a corporation, is there anything illegal or immoral or improper in a master defending his servant or a principal defending his agent in such a case? Absolutely nothing. Can it be said, then, that is so unbusinesslike that we ought to draw a sharp distinction and say that although an ordinary principal can do it, a corporation cannot do it, even if it is in the same position towards the person whom it defends as if it were an ordinary individual? It would be saying that a corporation cannot do in any ordinary matter of business what everybody else conducting the same kind of business can do. That appears to me to be a proposition which cannot be sustained at all. The very same principle was endeavoured to be applied in the case of Taunton v. The Royal Insurance Co., 12 W. R. 549, 2 H. & M. 135, where a gunpowder ship exploded in the Mersey and where an insurance office intended to pay the damages which occurred from that explosion although not covered by the policy of insurance which they had issued. Wood, V.C., ridiculed the objection. He said it was the ordinary course of business for such claims to be paid whether actually within the policies or not; that it was a good advertisement and a business way of getting business; and the objection was laughed at. Now, should not we be laughed at if we were to say that a corporation could not defend actions against their servants in a case such as this? It seems to me it would be an outrage on common sense. There is absolutely nothing to be tried in this action which justifies the view that the injunction should go until the trial. The appeal must be allowed and the judgment discharged, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of this application both here and below.

LOPES, L.J.—This case, when it is understood, to my mind appears perfectly clear. I arrive at the conclusion that the learned judge in the court below was wrong in the decision which he has given.

Now, the facts that need be stated to show what I mean are very few and very simple. Miss De Pledge is the editor of a certain journal published by this association. She had placed in her hands by a sub-committee of that association a certain document which is said to contain libellous matter. She published it, and she caused it to be circulated. Now, whose publication was that? She was the agent of the association, acting within her authority. In fact, the very document had been given to her by the association. Surely the publication is the publication of the association, and the association are liable in the action that has been brought against her. Why it was brought against her, and not against the association, I do not know. It might have been brought against both of them together, but beyond all question it is really the publication of the association, and they are liable.

Now, in those circumstances, an action, as I said, has been brought against Miss De Pledge, and thereupon a resolution was passed by which it was determined that the funds of the association should be applied in defending it. It is now said by a member of the association, who comes forward and seeks an injunction, that the funds of the association are being improperly applied when they are used for the defence of Miss De Pledge in that action, and that an interim injunction ought to be granted.

Now, just look at it in this way. If Dr. Fenwick had brought the action against the association either alone or together with Miss De Pledge, beyond all question, if a verdict was to be found in favour of Dr. Fenwick, the association would be liable for damages and costs. But is it to be said that because Dr. Fenwick, for reasons best known to himself, has thought proper not to bring the action against the association alone, or jointly with Miss De Pledge, but has determined to bring it against her alone, that the association is to escape entirely, and that Miss De Pledge is to be called upon to pay damages and costs? It seems to me against common sense and justice. In my opinion it is a doctrine which cannot for a moment be entertained.

I think the learned judge arrived at a wrong conclusion when he held that an injunction ought to go.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. For the respondent it was suggested at the Bar that the publication of the journal was ultra vires. That point is not raised in the pleadings, nor was it ever suggested as far as I can make out until some time during the argument before North, J. There is nothing whatever in it. Now, what are the defendants in this action doing? They have resolved by the proper authoritative body that if Miss De Pledge will entrust her defence to them they will undertake it and pay the costs. Clearly the journal is the journal of the association, and it is clear that the association might have been joined as defendants in the action of libel which Dr. Fenwick has brought. I am unable to find out any special reason why, but Dr. Fenwick, quite within his rights, selected Miss De Pledge alone as the defendant. Now, what is her position? She is the honorary editor of this journal, and she published that which is alleged to be a libel, upon the instructions of a sub-committee, lawfully appointed by the executive committee, that has the management of the affairs of the association for the purposes of any question that is here raised before us. She, as honorary editor, merely took the manuscript which was entrusted to her, put in a number of paragraphs, and sent it in the ordinary way for publication. Of course she is liable if there has been a publication on her part, and I will assume without deciding it that she is responsible in the action. Then it is said that it is an action of tort, and that no contract of indemnity would be good. Let all that be granted; but what she has done has been simply—to put it in a legal form—done as the agent or the servant of the association. She is liable, of course, for her own acts according to the law of libel. But the association certainly, on the facts, are liable in respect of this libel if libel it be; and supposing that they had been joined as defendants there would have been a separate liability upon Miss De Pledge and a separate liability on the association.

I cannot conceive that it would be within the bounds of reason to hold that in such an action the association could not have applied its funds for the purposes of the defence generally. Mr. Swinfen Eady says they could not apply them for any part of the defence, so far as related to Miss De Pledge. I think, with great respect to him, that that is an absurd proposition. I agree that probably North, J., had it in his mind, and it formed some ground for his judgment, that the association were not willing to be made parties to the libel action. But an attempt has been made on their part since that judgment was delivered to get themselves made defendants in the libel action. That, however, was an application which could only meet with one fate if opposed by Dr. Fenwick—and it was opposed by him—it must be refused. Dr. Fenwick is entitled to say, "I will not sue anybody but one person in respect of this libel. There may be half-a-dozen persons liable to me, I care not; I will sue Miss De Pledge and Miss De Pledge alone." Now, I think it is a mere matter, as Lindley, L.J., says, of ordinary business, and it would be pushing the doctrine of ultra vires to an absurd extreme if we held that this was not a lawful application of the funds of the association. It is a defence by the masters of the servant—using the term servant in no invidious sense to Miss De Pledge. It is in respect of their act; it is in respect of their publication, because morally as between the two she is not to blame in any way. It seems to me a matter of ordinary common sense that the result is that they can expend their funds in defending this action for her, seeing that she was acting within the scope of her authority, and on the instructions of the body having the control of the journal within the terms of the charter. The result of the action if it were to succeed would be injurious to the association themselves. The association have a common interest in defending the journal in respect of this charge of libel. The only remaining point that I need mention is the suggestion that there is something to try. Mr. Swinfen Eady, when pressed upon the point, at the conclusion of his argument, could only find this, that the question to try was a question of law. So that we have all the facts before us, and it is a matter turning simply upon the documents. In my opinion this is not ultra vires, and I concur in the judgments that have already been delivered.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TEDDINGTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Purchase of land—Land acquired for sewage works—Land "not required" for purpose—Land not immediately required—User of land—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 175.

Circumstances under which lands acquired by a local authority under section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, will be ordered to be sold as "not required for the purpose for which they were acquired" within the meaning of the section, in cases where the whole of the lands is not immediately required for the purpose.

Consideration of the question what is a lawful interim user of such land not immediately required.

A portion of lands which were bought by the defendants, and as to the greater part used, for the purpose of permanent sewage works, was used by them to receive dustbin refuse, and works had been executed thereon for this purpose.

Held, (1) that the whole of the lands were required for sewage purposes; (2) that the defendants had not dealt with any part of it so that it could not be used for sewage purposes, and the plaintiff was therefore not entitled to a declaration that any portion should be sold under section 175; and (3) that, though the works did not make that portion wholly unfit for sewage purposes, such user was injurious to its proper user for sewage purposes and inconsistent with the purpose for which the land was acquired, and was not a lawful user of the land.

Another portion of the same lands was used as a recreation ground, and a path had been made and some benches put there, and the defendants were alleged to intend making a lake and a bathing-place there.

Held, that it was not unlawful to permit this portion, which was not at the time required for the ultimate purpose for which it was acquired, to be temporarily used as a recreation ground, provided that care was taken to prevent any rights from being acquired over it which would interfere with the user of the land for its ultimate purpose whenever required; but

This was an action against the Teddington local authorities, at the relation of a resident, to compel the defendants to sell a piece of land which adjoined his property, on the ground that it was not required for the purpose for which it had been bought—viz., the disposal of sewage.

It appeared that the land in question formed part of a piece of land consisting of some twenty-five acres which had been acquired in the year 1887, with the sanction of the Local Government Board, under the Public Health Act, 1875, for the purpose of permanent sewage works, and most of which had been used for the erection of tanks and machinery and for filtration beds for the purpose of the reception and disposal of sewage. It also appeared that some of the land had been sold as not being required for sewage purposes—in accordance with section 175 of the Public Health Act—but another part had been utilised by the defendants as a place of deposit for refuse collected from dustbins, to receive which trenches had been dug to the gravel surface and drawn to the level of the subsoil. A mound had also been raised. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had also entertained a scheme for turning another part of the unused land into a public recreation-ground, with a lake, bathing-place, and promenade, and had constructed a temporary footpath over the land. The plaintiff alleged that the pieces of unsold land were, within the meaning of section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, "not required for the purpose for which they were acquired"—viz., the reception and disposal of sewage—and submitted that they should be ordered to be sold in accordance with the section.

The defendants alleged that their mode of using this land was not permanent, but merely temporary, and not such as to prevent the land from being used hereafter for sewage purposes; and, moreover, that, having regard to the rapid increase of Teddington in extent and in population, and to the necessity of having reserve land available for these purposes, the land was, in truth, still needed for the purpose for which it had been acquired.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the land in question, in all some eight acres, was not required for the purpose for which it had been acquired under the Act of 1875, an order directing its sale under section 175, and an injunction restraining the defendants from appropriating or using any portion as a site for a public promenade or recreation-ground, or for ornamental water, or for a footpath, or for the purpose of the deposit of house refuse, or for any purpose other than that of the reception and disposal of sewage.

The learned judge found on the evidence that all the land in question was land that should be kept by the defendants for sewage purposes, and would ultimately be required.

Neville, Q.C., and F. R. Y. Radcliffe, for the plaintiff.—(1) The land in question is "not required for the purpose for which it was acquired" within the meaning of section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875. (2) The application of land acquired by a corporation under statutory powers for a particular purpose, but not immediately required for that purpose, to a totally different purpose to that to which it was applied at the time of acquisition is ultra vires. The interim user which the defendants make and contemplate making of this land, so far as it is not now required for sewage purposes, is therefore unlawful. Moreover, it is not a proper expenditure of the ratepayers' money. (3) As to the user for the disposal of dustbin refuse, that is a purpose inconsistent with the purpose for which the land was acquired, and injurious to it, and one which is not justifiable even as an innocent interim user.

They cited Attorney-General v. Corporation of Southampton, 1 Giff. 363, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 2; and Bayley v. Great Western Railway Co., 26 Ch. D. 434, 450, 32 W. R. Dig. 227.

Macmorran, Q.C., and Lewis Thomas, for the defendants.—(1) The council may require the whole of the land at some future time for sewage purposes, and no part of it is within section 175. (2) The user made, as well as that proposed to be made, is a legitimate interim user.

Neville replied.

ROMER, J., after stating his finding as above on the evidence, continued:—It appears to me, therefore, that section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, does not apply to any portion of the land. No doubt at the time when the land was purchased with the sanction of the Local Government Board it was contemplated, as shown by the plan, that part of the land purchased would not be required for sewage purposes. But if I were to hold that the portions contemplated at the date of the purchase as not being then required to be retained for sewage purposes were on that account never to be so used at all, I fail to see what right the local authority had to acquire those portions of the land at all. But in my view the local authority did acquire the whole of the land for sewage purposes, though they contemplated that they might not require the whole of it, and would probably find that they could sell the portions referred to, and they were not conclusively bound to sell the land marked on the plan as not required if circumstances changed and it was found that they did require it. Apparently they have now changed their minds; and, in my opinion, they have come to a wise conclusion, and the land sought to be held is required for sewage purposes. No doubt the council, until very recently, thought that the whole of the land would not be required, and if they had committed themselves irrevocably to the position that part was not required, section 175 would probably have applied. I have considerable doubt on the point, but I give the council the benefit of the doubt, and the conclusion I come to is that they are not precluded from saying that the whole land is required, and they are entitled to retain it. Undoubtedly what they had done misled the plaintiff, and I shall remember that when dealing with the question of costs.

The next question is whether the defendants have dealt with any part of the land so that it cannot be used for sewage purposes. The only parts which that refers to are those on which the trench and mound have been made. Although I think that these works were improper, yet, at the same time, they did not make the land on which they were wholly unfit for sewage purposes. I think they could still be utilized, so that that part of the land cannot now be said to be remaining in the hands of the defendants for non-sewage purposes. The plaintiff is not, therefore, entitled to any declaration that any portion of the land should be sold.

A further question arises. The plaintiff or relator says that the defendants have dealt with parts of the land improperly, and ought to be restrained from further improper dealings with the land. With the exception of the mound and trench nothing has been done of a permanent character. They have made a footpath and put a few benches, and these things only refer to parts not immediately required for sewage purposes. That use is, in my opinion, of a temporary nature only, and one not interfering with the land when required for sewage purposes.

But it has been argued before me that the defendants are not entitled even while retaining vacant land for sewage purposes to, in the meantime, use it for such purposes as are relied upon by the relator in this case. I think it right, therefore, to state shortly the views I take as to what the powers of the defendants are with reference to the interim user of the land not immediately required for use for sewage purposes. Now, I agree that the defendants could not apply the land to or use it for any purpose inconsistent with the purpose for which it was acquired, but in the present case those purposes did not require immediate use of every part of the land for sewage purposes. Some part only was required for immediate sewage works, and the remaining part has to be retained because needed hereafter for those works, and for the actual application of this remaining part for such purposes the defendants could retain it, and one of the purposes for which they acquired it might be said to be such interim retainer. Of course, while so retaining it they could not use or deal with it in such a way as to prevent or substantially interfere with its immediate use for sewage purposes whenever it was needed for those purposes. But, subject to that exception, while retaining it, I do not see how it was inconsistent for the purposes for which they acquired it to use it in any lawful manner in which in its then condition it could be used, provided it did not substantially interfere with the main purpose of drainage for which it was ultimately wanted. I know nothing which makes it unlawful for a council such as these defendants permitting vacant land in their possession, and not at the time required for the ultimate purpose for which they acquired it, temporarily to be used as a recreation ground, provided care is taken to prevent any rights being acquired over it by the public or otherwise which would prevent or interfere with the council using it for such ultimate purposes whenever required.

Now, the case of Attorney-General v. Southampton Corporation, to which I have been referred, in no wise interferes with this view. What was that case? There land had to be held by certain trustees solely for the purposes of recreation, and it was held that those trustees could not use the land even temporarily as a fair for the sale of cattle on the ground that that was not a purpose of recreation. Why? Because the land could not be used according to the trusts even temporarily except for the purposes of recreation.

It was as much a breach of trust in that case to use it temporarily as it was to use it permanently for a cattle fair. Moreover, in my opinion, nothing in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in Bayley v. The Great Western Railway Co., to which my attention has been called, in any way interferes with the views which I have previously expressed. It appears to me, therefore, that nothing has been done with regard to putting these temporary seats and making the temporary footpath there unlawfully. It is to be noticed that in this case I am not concerned with any question as to the money of the ratepayers having been applied in making a temporary footpath, or in placing those seats. It cannot be raised, and is not raised, in this action whether or not they have been acting wrongly in using money of the ratepayers. That I do not know. All that I am concerned with in this action is as to user of the land pending its ultimate user for sewage purposes. As I have said, I think an interim user, if lawful, and not interfering with the ultimate sewage purposes for which the land was required, is justifiable.

Now I have to consider what has been threatened by the defendants as alleged by the relator in respect of this land apart from the mound and trench. As to the camp-shedding and making up the frontage of the river, it is now agreed that that would have been necessary for sewage purposes, but as to the other purposes, especially the making of the lake and the proposed making the frontage up of the land for recreation purposes, and the building of a bathing place, all of which were in dispute, when the correspondence is looked at, and all the facts, I do think that the defendants contemplated using parts of the land not for sewage purposes, nor for justifiable interim purposes. The defendants now assert that they have no intention of making any permanent works or of doing anything which would prevent them from properly using the land for its ultimate purposes. I accept that statement. Therefore I do not think with regard to this part of the case any injunction or special undertaking is required.

With regard to the mound and trench those works clearly were not done for sewage purposes. On the evidence they were most injurious to the land for sewage purposes, and though they did not fatally interfere with the land so as to prevent it being ultimately used in some way for sewage purposes, those works are not justified as an interim innocent lawful user of the land, and are inconsistent with the purposes for which the defendants acquired the land. The defendants consenting to give an undertaking that they will not repeat those works or use this land for the purpose of further digging trenches, removing the gravel, and filling those trenches up with dustbin refuse, I make no order except that the defendants pay the costs of the action.

RALEIGH v. GOSCHEN. (a.)

Crown, prerogative of—Action against Lords of Admiralty—Trespass—Right of subject to maintain—Action, form of—Amendment.

The head of a Government department is not liable for the neglect or torts of any subordinate official, unless it can be shown that the act complained of was substantially the act of the head himself, in which case he would be liable as an individual, despite of his being an officer of State.

The court holding that the above action, which was for trespasses to land, was against the defendants, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the Director-General of Naval Works, in their official capacity and not as individuals, and the plaintiffs having asked leave to amend, if necessary, by also suing the defendants individually, and by adding as parties the persons by whose hands the alleged trespasses had been actually committed,

Held, that leave to amend ought not to be given, for what the plaintiffs were seeking to do was to change one action into another of a substantially different character; and that the action must be dismissed.

Point of law and summons.

This was an action against the defendants, the Right

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hon. G. J. Goschen and others named and described in the title of the action as the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and also against Major Raban, described in such title as the Director-General of Naval Works, for the purpose of establishing as against the Lords Commissioners and the Director-General that they were not entitled to enter upon, or take possession of, or acquire by way of compulsory purchase certain land of the plaintiffs at Dartmouth for a training college for naval cadets.

The plaintiffs alleged (par. 12 of the statement of claim) that the defendants had entered upon a portion of the estate and had placed certain stakes thereon, with a view to the acquisition of the site for the training college, and (par. 17) that the defendants had, by their servants and agents, wrongfully entered upon the property, and surveyed and staked out the site, and threatened and intended to take possession, and they alleged that the defendants contended that they had statutory powers of compulsory acquisition, which they threatened and intended forthwith to exercise.

The plaintiffs submitted that there was no right of compulsory purchase, and they claimed a declaration to that effect and an injunction and damages.

The defendants, by their statement of defence, submitted that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, although entitled in certain circumstances to sue, not being liable to be sued in any of her Majesty's Courts except in cases provided by statute; that the defendants were merely agents of the Crown and only responsible to her Majesty and Parliament; and that they were not liable to be sued in respect of acts done by them as the executive Government, but that the plaintiffs' remedy, if any, was by petition of right. They further submitted that the claim of the plaintiffs was in respect of an alleged tort, for which neither the Crown nor any agent of the Crown, as such, could be sued either by petition of right or otherwise, and that neither the Lords Commissioners nor the Director as such, were liable to be restrained by injunction of any court.

The defendants admitted that the site had been surveyed and marked out under the Defence Act, of 1842, but denied that they, or any of them, had done the acts complained of; and alleged that whatever had been done had been duly performed not by them but by the proper officers or agents of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty acting by the direction of the executive Government under the Crown.

The defendants obtained an order that the point of law raised by the defence—namely, whether the action was maintainable—should be set down and heard before the trial.

The plaintiffs had taken out a summons to amend the proceedings in the action by adding as defendants the civil engineer and two marines who had surveyed and staked out the land, and also by suing the existing defendants in their individual or personal, as well as their official capacity. The plaintiffs had also taken out a summons for the delivery of interrogatories with a view of ascertaining by whom or by whose directions the alleged wrongful acts were done. The point of law was now heard, and by his lordships' direction the summons to amend was also heard.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the defendants in the action.—This is an action for tort against the defendants in their official capacity as members of the executive Government, and such an action will not lie: Gidley v. Palmerston (Lord), 3 Brod. & B. 275, 286; Whitfield v. Le Despencer (Lord), Cowper 754; Canterbury (Lord) v. Attorney-General, 1 Ph. 306, 321; Sullivan v. Spencer (Lord), I. R. 6 C. L. 173; Grant v. Secretary of State for India, 25 W. R. 848, 2 C. P. D. 445, 461; Palmer v. Hutchinson, 6 App. Cas. 619, 30 W. R. Dig. 138). Lord Blackburn, in delivering the opinion of the judges in Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, 14 W. R. 872, L. R. 1 H. L. 93, 111, distinguishes that case from cases of the class mentioned above. Nicholson v. Mounsey, 15 East 384, 391, and Walker v. Baird, [1892] A. C. 491, 41 W. R. Dig. 62, were also cited.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and S. Dickinson, for the plaintiffs in the action.—Petition of right does not lie for tort, and the action is well founded. Acts of trespass were committed by the defendants' authority, and they cannot justify as servants of the Crown which can do no wrong, and are therefore liable to be sued: Feather v. Reg., 6 B. & S. 257, 296, 13 W. R. C. L. Dig. 88; Money v. Leach, 3 Burr. 1742; Mostyn v. Fabrigas, Cowper 161; Rankin v. Huskisson, 4 Sim. 13; Ellis v. Grey (Lord), 6 Sim. 214; Rogers v. Dutt, 9 W. R. 149, 13 Moo. P. C. 209, 236; Musgrave v. Pulido, 28 W. R. 373, 5 App. Cas. 102. Cases of contract do not apply; the remedy in such cases is by petition of right. Grant's case was founded on official responsibility and supports the plaintiffs here. In Walker v. Baird the court rejected the arguments for the defendants here. If the action is defective, the defendants ought to be given leave to amend.

Before hearing a reply his lordship stated the principles which he considered to be applicable to the case as follows:

ROMER, J.—The only question, to my mind, is whether this is not a case in which an amendment ought to be allowed. It appears to me, if any person commits a trespass (I use that word advisedly as meaning a wrongful act or one not justifiable) he cannot escape liability for the offence. He cannot prevent himself from being sued merely because he acted in obedience to the order of the executive Government or of any officer of State, and it further appears to me, as at present advised, if the trespass had been committed by some subordinate officers of a Government department or of the Crown by the order of a superior official, so that the trespass was caused by the order and was in substance the act of the superior official, that superior official, even if he were the head of the Government department in which the subordinate official was employed, or whatever his official position might be, could be sued, but in such case the superior official could be sued not because of, but despite of, the fact that he was an officer of State. I think it is clear that the head of a Government department is not liable for the neglect or torts of officials of the department unless it could be shown that the act complained of was substantially the act of the head himself, in which case he would be liable as an individual, as a stranger committing the act would be.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., in reply.—There are cases in which the head of the department, I think, could not be sued, but that is not the question before your lordship. I only want to guard myself in case it is said hereafter I have made an admission I ought not to. I should be disposed to put it in this way, that if any person, whether officer of State or subordinate, has to justify an act alleged to be unlawful by reference to the authority of an Act of Parliament or State authority or anything of that kind, the legal justification can be inquired into in this court. It does not matter whether the defendant is the head of a department or not. That is simply another way of stating from a different point of view your lordship's proposition. In Cowing v. The Secretary of State for War, where they endeavoured to get an injunction against the Secretary of State for War by reason of the artillery trespassing on a man's land, Jessel, M.R., laid it down in the clearest way that an action would not lie (see the Times of the 23rd of January, 1877). The amendment sought by the plaintiffs ought not to be allowed. The pleadings show that the case sought to be made is a substantially different case from that originally made, and in the interests of the public leave ought not to be given to amend in an action against the heads of a Government department which, as it stands, is not maintainable.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 13.—ROMER, J., after referring to the above statement of the general principles of law applicable to the case, continued: But I will apply those principles and point out shortly what kind of action the plaintiffs might have maintained, and what kind they were not entitled to bring, against the present defendants in respect of the matters referred to in the statement of claim.

The plaintiffs are complaining of an alleged trespass said to have been committed on their land, for which they claim damages, and they ask for an injunction to restrain further trespass on the land, which they say is threatened.

Now, in the first place, inasmuch as the plaintiffs could not sue the Crown for a past or threatened trespass, they could not in respect of any trespass sue the defendants in the capacity of agents for or as representing the Crown. Again, the plaintiffs could not sue the defendants merely on the footing that, as representing a branch of the executive Government, the defendants were responsible for a trespass committed or threatened by some officials or persons in the employment or under the control of the Government or of the Admiralty as a department of the Government, even though those officials or persons purported to act on behalf of or as representing the Crown or the Government or the Admiralty. And, further, even if some of the defendants, acting on behalf of the Crown or of the Government or of the Admiralty, had committed or threatened a trespass, that would not justify the plaintiffs in suing the other defendants, if they had taken no part in the transaction.

On the other hand, the plaintiffs could sue any persons actually committing or threatening the trespass, even though those persons only acted on behalf or by the authority of the Government or of the defendants as representing the Admiralty. Moreover, I do not think the rights of the plaintiffs would of necessity be confined to an action against those actually committing the trespass, who might be some very humble persons. If a trespass was committed by those persons by the order or direction of some higher officials, so as in substance to have been the act of those higher officials, then the latter could be sued. For example, suppose the captain of a ship unlawfully to have ordered some of his sailors to take possession of a house and they obeyed his order, he could be sued for the trespass, even though he himself remained on board his ship and did not personally go into the house. So if any of the defendants had themselves ordered or directed the alleged trespass now complained of by the plaintiffs, and it was in consequence of such order or direction that the alleged trespass took place, or if any of the defendants threatened to order or direct further trespass, then they could be sued. But in this case they could be sued not because, but in despite of, the fact that they occupied official positions or acted as officials. In other words, to sum up shortly the result of the above by the use of convenient phraseology, the plaintiffs in respect of the matters they are now complaining of could sue any of the defendants individually for trespasses committed or threatened by them, but they could not sue the defendants officially or as an official body.

The question, then, before me narrows itself down to this—is the present action one against the defendants as an official body, or is it an action against them as individuals? And in dealing with this question, I ought also to consider the summons to amend issued on behalf of the plaintiffs, and the affidavits filed in support of that summons. Now, on the facts before me, and dealing fairly with the writ and statement of claim, the conclusion I come to is, that the present action was intended to be and is a claim against the defendants in their official capacity, and not as individuals. They are described and sued, except as regards the defendant Major Raban, as the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and he is described and sued as the Director-General of Naval Works. Throughout the statement of claim no distinction is drawn between them, and no act, order, direction, or threat by any of them individually is alleged. Paragraph 1 of the statement of claim sets forth the general nature of the plaintiffs' case, and shows that what the plaintiffs wish to do is to have some general questions decided as between them and the defendants as representing the Admiralty. The correspondence referred to in the statement of claim is with the Admiralty, or with certain officials in an official capacity only. Then, so far as regards trespasses alleged to have been actually committed or threatened, the only material paragraphs are those numbered 12 and 17. Paragraph 12 alleges that the defendants had entered upon some portion of the plaintiffs' estate and placed stakes there. Now, it was admitted before me on behalf of the plaintiffs that it was not suggested or intended to be suggested that the defendants themselves had done this. The paragraph shows that, in this action, when an act of the defendants is referred to what is meant and intended to be alleged is the act of the defendants treated as an official body—that is to say, as a body representing the Crown or Government or as responsible for the acts of all officials or persons acting or purporting to act on behalf of the Crown or of the Government or of the Admiralty. Then all that is contained in paragraph 17 is a general allegation that the defendants by their servants and agents have trespassed and threatened to trespass again. That is to say again, as I understand it, acts alleged against them as an official body on the footing above mentioned. But any possible doubt as to what kind of action this is appears to me to be set at rest by the plaintiffs' summons to amend their writ and subsequent proceedings, and the affidavits filed in support of that summons. The affidavits state that the alleged trespass was committed by two marines acting under the directions of Mr. Shortridge, a civil engineer employed in her Majesty's dockyard at Devonport. Those affidavits do not allege any personal participation in the alleged trespass or any threat of future trespass by, or by the order or direction of, any of the defendants. Then the summons asks for leave to amend the action by suing the defendants in their individual as well as in their official capacity, and by adding the two marines and Mr. Shortridge as co-defendants. In other words, the summons proceeds on the footing that the present action is one against the present defendants in their official capacity only, and I think the plaintiffs' own view as to their action is the correct one.

It follows that in my opinion the present action as it stands is misconceived and will not lie, and the only further question I have to consider is whether I ought to give the plaintiffs leave to amend as asked by them. On consideration, I think I ought not. For what the plaintiffs are seeking to do is to change one action into another of a substantially different character. Apart from the fact that the present action cannot be sustained, while the other might lie, an action against the defendants in their official capacity, supposing it to lie, would differ in most material respects from an action against them as individuals, as will be seen when consideration is paid to questions of discovery, and to the form of any interlocutory injunction or final judgment that could be obtained by the plaintiffs, and as to how and against whom such injunction or judgment could be enforced. Moreover, as pointed out above, the affidavits in support of the summons to amend do not venture to allege any claim against any of the defendants individually. For these reasons I think I ought not to allow leave to amend as asked. If the plaintiffs have in fact any claim against any of the defendants individually, that claim will be more properly and conveniently enforced in a separate action. At the same time I will take care to provide by my order that the dismissal of the present action shall not prejudice any just claim the plaintiffs may have. I therefore order the present action to be dismissed with costs, without prejudice to any claim the plaintiffs may have against the two marines or Mr. Shortridge or against any of the defendants individually in respect of any trespass committed or threatened. The costs of the summons and of any pending interlocutory application will be costs in the action.

Leave to appeal was asked by the plaintiffs and given.

Action dismissed; summons dismissed.

LEWIS v. POOLE. (a.)

Local government—Custody of parish documents—Tithe map and apportionment—Tithe Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 64—Tithe Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 73), s. 17—Tithe Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 93), s. 28—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 17.

Where no order has been made by quarter sessions as to the custody of a document which is required by section 64 of the Tithe Act, 1836, to be kept with the parish documents, the parish council have now power to give directions as to its custody.

A parish council gave directions as to the custody of the copy of a tithe apportionment and map, but the rector, in whose possession it was, refused to comply with such directions. The parish council then obtained an order from the county council confirming the directions of the parish council. As the rector still refused to give up possession of the document, an application was made to two justices by a person interested in lands and rent-charge comprised in the apportionment for an order for the removal of the document into the custody directed by the parish council. The justices decided they had no jurisdiction to make such an order.

Held—without deciding whether the power of the justices to make the order was discretionary or merely ministerial—that they had jurisdiction to make it.

Case stated by the justices of the Droxford Division of Hampshire under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, on the hearing of an application by the appellant under section 28 of the Tithe Act, 1860.

The material facts were as follow: An application was made by Mr. Lewis under section 28 of the Tithe Act, 1860, that the justices of the Droxford Petty Sessional Division of Hampshire should make an order to remove the map and tithe apportionment of the parish of West Meon from the custody of the rector of the parish, the Rev. Canon Poole, and direct that the same should be deposited in the custody of the parish council of West Meon. The appellant was a person interested in the lands delineated in the tithe apportionment and map, and was the chairman of the parish council, but he made the application in order to enforce an order of the county council, dated the 22nd of February, 1897, and not as chairman of the parish council authorized to appear, nor by reason of being inconvenienced by the documents being in the custody of the respondent.

On the 15th of October, 1895, the parish council resolved that the documents should be placed in the custody of the parish council, and notice of this resolution was given to the respondent, but he refused to give up possession of the documents. On the 15th of April, 1896, the parish council applied to the county council, under section 17 (8) of the Local Government Act, 1894, to determine the difference which had arisen between them and the rector as to the custody of the documents, and by an order under seal, dated the 22nd of February, 1897, the county council directed that the said documents should be deposited in such custody as the parish council might direct. A copy of this order was sent to the respondent, but he refused to obey it, and retained the documents.

The appellant thereupon applied to the justices, under section 28 of the Tithe Act, 1860, for an order directing the removal of the documents from the custody of the respondent into that of the parish council or such custody as they might direct.

The justices decided that the order of the county council appeared to be good on the face of it, but that they, the justices, had no power to make the order applied for, and they accordingly refused to make such order, subject to the present case.

The question of law for the court was whether the justices, upon the facts stated, came to a correct decision in point of law, and if not, what should be done or ordered by the court in the premises.

Lord Coleridge, Q.C., and Cancellor, for the appellant.

Macmorran, Q.C., and Gollan, for the respondent.

The court allowed the appeal.

WRIGHT, J.—Two questions arise in this case. The first is whether the directions of the parish council as to these documents ought to be carried out. The second is whether the justices had power to make the order asked for. On the first question, which is the main one, I do not feel much doubt. The Local Government Act, 1894, by section 17 (8) provides that "documents directed by law to be kept with the public books, writings, and papers of the parish, shall either remain in their existing custody or be deposited in such custody as the parish council may direct," and the sub-section gives the county council power, in case anyone objects to the directions of the parish council, to decide which view shall prevail. In the present case the parish council have directed in whose custody a tithe apportionment and map shall be deposited. These documents are documents directed by section 64 of the Tithe Act, 1836, to be kept with the public books, writings, and papers of the parish. The directions of the parish council have been confirmed by the county council, and it seems to me that on these grounds the first question is disposed of. Mr. Macmorran, however, contends that this tithe apportionment and tithe map do not come within the words in section 17 of the Act of 1894, "documents directed by law to be kept therewith," that is, with the parish books and papers. He submitted that under section 64 of the Tithe Act, 1836, though the documents are to be kept with the public books, writings, and papers of the parish, they are to be kept by certain specified persons. In my opinion, whether they are to be kept with the parish documents by one person or by another, they are equally documents directed by law to be kept with the public books and the like of the parish within section 17 (8) of the Local Government Act, 1894.

Then as to the procedure followed. On this part of the case Mr. Macmorran's first objection is based on section 17 of the Tithe Act, 1846, which provides that in certain cases the quarter sessions may appoint a place for the tithe documents to be kept. The quarter sessions have not made any such order here. By section 28 of the Tithe Act, 1860, the justices have jurisdiction, if the tithe documents were in the possession of any person not legally entitled to them, to order the documents to be deposited in such custody as they thought fit. That was a jurisdiction intended to be used judicially. Obviously, Mr. Lewis was a person "interested in the lands or rent-charge" within that section; but it is said, and with great force, that under the section the jurisdiction of the justices was a discretionary jurisdiction, while the jurisdiction they are now asked to exercise is substantially, under the Local Government Act, 1894, ministerial. That does raise a serious difficulty, but, to my mind, not an insuperable one. In my judgment the Local Government Act, 1894, has changed the jurisdiction of the justices, and they ought to hesitate long before overriding the resolution of the parish council, upheld, as in this case it is, by the order of the county council. At any rate I think that, whether that is so or not, the justices have power to make the order asked for. There remains the subsidiary question, whether the rector was a person not legally entitled to the possession of these documents? The answer to that depends on the question that I have already considered as to the meaning of the provisions of the Act of 1894. If the parish council had power to make directions as to the custody of the tithe map, that changed the right of the incumbent, and it was the person designated by the parish council who then became the person legally entitled to the custody of the documents. For these reasons I am opinion that the justices have certainly jurisdiction to make the order asked for.

KENNEDY, J., concurred.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted, with an intimation of the opinion of the court that the justices had power to make the order asked for.

MURPHY v. ARROW. (a.)

Gaming—Betting house—Person found therein—Recognizance—Betting Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119) s. 11.

Persons found in a betting house are liable to the same treatment as persons found in a gaming house, and the magistrate has power, in the case of any person found in a betting house who is arrested therein and brought before him in pursuance of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, s. 11, to order such person to enter into recognizances "no more to haunt, play, or exercise from thenceforth" at any gaming house.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49.

On the 12th of May, 1897, the appellant was brought before the magistrate under a warrant of arrest issued under section 11 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, and the magistrate thereupon ordered him to be bound in his own recognizance in £20 "no more to play, haunt, or exercise from henceforth" at any gaming house, pursuant to section 14 of 33 Hen. 8, c. 9.

On the 4th of May, 1897, the appellant and eighty-eight other persons were arrested on premises known as the Frascati Club, 32, Gerard-street, Soho. The premises were kept and used as a betting house within section 1 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853. Betting had been going on just prior to the arrest of the appellant, which took place at 3.30 p.m.

All the men arrested were brought before the magistrates on the 5th of May. They were remanded on their own recognizances, and, in the case of nine of them, with two sureties in £10 each, to appear on the 12th of May.

On the 12th of May four of the men were charged with having kept the house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. Three pleaded guilty and were convicted and fined. The fourth was discharged.

The appellant and the eighty-four other persons applied to be discharged. This the magistrate refused to do, but ordered them to be bound in their own recognizances in £20 "no more to play, haunt, or exercise from thenceforth" at any gaming house.

33 Hen. 8, c. 9, prohibits the playing of certain unlawful games. Section 14 provides as follows: "It shall be lawful to all and every the justices of peace in every shire, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, and other head officers within every city, town, and borough within this realm, from time to time, as well within liberties as without, as need and case shall require, to come and enter and resort into all and every houses, places, and alleys where such games shall be suspected to be holden, exercised, used, or occupied contrary to the form of this statute; and as well the keepers of the same, as also the persons there haunting, resorting, and playing, to take, arrest, and imprison, and them so taken and arrested, to keep in prison, unto such time as the keepers and maintainers of the said plays and games have found sureties to the king's use, to be bound by recognizance or otherwise no longer to use, keep, or occupy any such house, play, game, alley, or place; and also that the persons there so found be in like case bound by themselves, or else with sureties by the discretions of the justices, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, or other head officers, no more to play, haunt, or exercise from thenceforth in, at, or to any of the said places, or at any of the said games.

The Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 3, empowers justices, &c., to exercise the powers conferred by 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 14, by means of their warrant issued to the police. The form of warrant to be used is given in the schedule and directs the person to whom it is addressed to arrest, search, and bring before the justices as well the keepers of the suspected house as also the persons there haunting, resorting, and playing.

The Betting Houses Act, 1853, s. 1, prohibits any house, office, room, or place from being opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper, or persons using the same, betting with persons resorting thereto.

Section 2 provides: "Every house, office, or place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, shall be taken and deemed to be a common gaming house within the meaning of" the Gaming Act, 1845.

Section 11 provides: "It shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, upon complaint made before him on oath, that there is reason to suspect any house, office, room, or place to be kept or used as a betting-house or office, contrary to this Act, to give authority by special warrant under his hand, when in his discretion he shall think fit, to any constable or police officer to enter with such assistance as may be found necessary into such house, office, room, or place, and if necessary to use force for making such entry, whether by breaking open doors or otherwise, and to arrest, search, and bring before a justice of the peace all such persons found therein, and to seize all lists, cards, or other documents relating to racing or betting found in such house or premises; and any such warrant may be according to the form given in the first schedule annexed to the before-mentioned Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109)."

Purcell, for the appellant.—There was no evidence before the magistrate as to the time the appellant had been on the premises, or whether he had been there before, so as to constitute "haunting" and "resorting to" the premises, and there was no evidence that the appellant was doing anything on the premises on the occasion in question so as to constitute "playing." Betting on horse-races is not a game or an unlawful game within 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 14, or within 2 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 9. Neither of those statutes affect any but persons playing unlawful games. The declaration in the Betting Houses Act, 1853, that betting houses are to be deemed to be gaming houses does not make the Act of 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 14, extend to persons merely betting on horse-races in a house, office, room, or place.

Danckwerts, for the respondent.—It has been the practice of the police courts to treat persons found betting in a betting house in the same manner as persons found playing in a gaming house. That view is supported by Hawkins, J., in Jenks v. Turpin, 13 Q. B. D., at p. 526, 32 W. R. Dig. 84.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The question is whether the magistrate had power to deal with these persons in the way in which he did, that is, to order them to enter into recognizances, or whether he ought not simply to have let the appellant and the other persons go. That question turns upon the construction of a series of Acts relating to gaming and betting, including 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 14, the Gaming Act, 1845, and the Betting Houses Act, 1853. Reading the sections referred to in these Acts in the inverse order, by section 2 of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, a betting house is to be deemed to be a common gaming house. What would be the conceivable object of saying that a betting house is to be deemed to be a common gaming house, unless, for some purposes, at any rate, people who go there are to be treated as persons going to a common gaming house. Section 11 gives the magistrate power to issue a warrant to enter suspected houses and to arrest persons found therein. The warrant is to be in the form given in the first schedule to the Gaming Act, 1845. Now we have to consider the object of that legislation. First, the houses are gaming houses; secondly, there is power to arrest persons found therein; and then, the warrant is to be in the form given in the previous Act. I pass from that Act to the Gaming Act, 1845. The important sections there are the 3rd and the 6th and the schedule. The 3rd section is this: "That in every case (except within the metropolitan police district) in which the justice of the peace," and so on, "now have by law authority to enter into any house . . . it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace upon complaint made before him on oath . . . if he suspect any house, room, or place to be kept or used as a common gaming-house to give authority, by special warrant, under his hand, when in his discretion he shall think fit, to any constable to enter, with such assistance as may be found necessary, into such house, room, or place in like manner as might have been done by such justices," and so on, "and if necessary to use force for making such entry, whether by breaking open doors or otherwise, and to arrest, search, and bring before a justice of the peace all such persons found therein as might have been arrested therein by such justice of the peace had he been personally present; and all such persons shall be dealt with according to law as if they had been arrested in such house, room, or place by the justice before whom they shall be so brought; and any such warrant may be in the form given in the first schedule to this Act"—i.e., the same form which is referred to in the Betting Houses Act, 1853. The warrant (I leave out all the formal parts of it) authorizes and requires the persons to whom it is addressed "to enter and break open doors if necessary . . . and search and bring before me or some other of the justices . . . as well the keepers of the same as also the persons there haunting, resorting, and playing to be dealt with according to law." Therefore the power given by this section is to arrest persons who are found there—"persons found therein"—and then the warrant says you are to arrest the persons there haunting, resorting, and playing. That evidently has reference to some old Act of Parliament, and the old Act of Parliament is the 33 Hen. 8, c. 9, s. 14, of which is as follows: [reads].

Now, this is the concatenation of sections with which we have to deal, and it appears to me, having regard particularly to the form of the warrant, that the idea of the Legislature is perfectly plain, and that when these people are arrested—and everybody agrees that it is perfectly lawful to arrest persons found there whether they are gaming or not—the house is to be treated as a common gaming house; and the language of the warrant shows plainly that they are to be arrested and treated as if they were persons within the statute of Henry 8. That appears to me to be plain. I do not say they are subject to penalties, but the arrest is for the purpose there mentioned, that is to say, binding them over in recognizances. It appears to me that any other construction gives the go-by to the forcible language of the warrant. The warrant takes the form of the statute, and we are not driven to the farce of saying that by law a lot of persons shall be bound over simply for the purpose of saying that they shall be bound over. Such a construction, to my mind, would be ridiculous.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. The appellant and some other persons were found in a betting house. He and they were arrested and taken before the magistrate. No complaint has been made or could be made that, under the warrant issued under the 11th section of the Betting Houses Act, 1853, this proceeding was not justified. There was no evidence against the appellant except that he was found in the betting house. It is not found that he haunted, or was in the habit going to the place.

His case is that he ought to have been then and there discharged; and, seeing that there was no information laid against him, as was the case with the keeper of the betting house who was engaged in the business of it, it is argued that in the circumstances there was no jurisdiction on the part of the magistrate to order him to enter into the recognizances; but I think there was such jurisdiction.

The Betting Houses Act, 1853, imposes penalties upon those keeping and conducting the business of a betting house, and it is quite true that there is no penalty imposed in the Act upon persons resorting thereto. But the 1st section enacts that a betting house is a common nuisance and contrary to law, and by section 2 a betting house is to be taken and deemed to be a common gaming house within the Gaming Act, 1845. That throws us back on that statute, and from that statute we have to trace the legislation as far back as the time of Henry 8. The Acts are for this purpose in pari materiâ; they ought to be construed together, and although possibly the language may not precisely fit, and may be open to some criticism of that nature, yet it seems to me that the intention of the Legislature is reasonably plain. Why is this house declared to be a gaming house within the Gaming Act, 1845? Not for the purpose of the penalties against the keepers and those conducting the business of the house, because that is provided for by the express language of the statute itself. There is some other purpose. It is to bring a betting house within the purview, and to bring the whole case within the reach of, the Act relating to gaming houses. Going back to the Gaming Act, 1845, the language is that persons found in the house may be arrested. Then, referring to the warrant, the warrant is also a matter of very considerable importance, because in its terms it refers back to the statute of Henry 8. The language is language taken from that statute itself. The Legislature seems to have thought that a warrant in that form was applicable to persons found in a gaming house. The statute of Henry 8 empowered the magistrates themselves to enter a gaming house, and to then and there make the arrest of persons found therein, and to bind over the persons so found. I think, putting the statutes together and dealing with them reasonably, the right view as to that which is not now done by the magistrate in person, but is done through the action, as here, of the police acting on a warrant, is that when the matter comes before the magistrate, the magistrate has the same jurisdiction sitting in his court as he had when acting in person under the old statute. I need not refer more particularly to the statute of George 2, which may be passed over.

What could be the object of justifying (which the statute does) the arrest and the taking of the persons resorting to this which we must take to be a gaming house, if the only result were that, unless some charge was preferred against them of being the keepers and conducting the business of the gaming house, they should be then and there discharged? This seems to be a reasonable conclusion, that, putting these Acts together, the result is that the statute of Henry 8 is brought into the Betting Houses Act, 1853, for the purpose of authorizing the magistrate to make such an order as he has made. He has made it in the language of that statute, but I think that the Betting Houses Act, 1853, on a just construction and putting the series of Acts together, gives him the authority to order that the recognizances should be entered into by a person who was found in the place. Upon these grounds I think the magistrate was correct.

Bill of exchange—Action on consideration—Bill outstanding—Dishonour.

Where a buyer of goods has given to the seller a bill of exchange for the price, and the seller has indorsed the bill over to a third party, an action for the price of the goods will not lie while the bill is outstanding, although it has been dishonoured, nor can the plaintiff succeed on the ground that he has got in the bill after action brought but before trial.

Appeal by the defendant from the decision of His Honour Judge Lumley Smith, sitting at the Westminster County Court.

The action was brought to recover a sum of £25 11s. 7d., the balance due for goods sold and delivered to the defendant by W. T. Burnley in July, 1896.

On the 4th of October, 1896, the defendant being unable to pay for the goods in full, a bill of exchange for £20 at three months was drawn by Burnley, accepted by the defendant, and handed by him to Burnley. This bill was indorsed over by Burnley to Bullock (to whom Burnley was indebted), and was presented for payment by Bullock on the 4th of January, 1897, and was dishonoured. Bullock then sued Burnley on the bill.

On the 21st of January, 1897, Burnley issued the writ in the present action in the High Court, the bill being still in the hands of Bullock. Shortly afterwards Burnley filed his petition in bankruptcy, and he was on the 3rd of February, 1897, adjudicated bankrupt.

On the 22nd of February Davis was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy. By an order of the county court, to which the present action had been remitted, Davis was added as a plaintiff. Bullock elected to give up the bill to the trustee in Burnley's bankruptcy, and to prove for the debt as an unsecured creditor. The bill thus came to the hands of Davis before the present action came on for trial.

The county court judge gave judgment for the full amount claimed, the bill to be handed over to the defendant on his satisfying the judgment. The defendant appealed as to £20, the part of the debt which was covered by the bill.

Abinger, for the appellant.—This action will not lie. When a debtor gives to his creditor a negotiable instrument in satisfaction of or as security for the debt, the creditor cannot sue for the debt while the instrument is outstanding (although dishonoured) in the hands of a third party. Nor does he make his case any better by getting in the negotiable instrument during the currency of the action: Bullen and Leake's Precedents, 3rd ed., p. 540 et seq.; Price v. Price, 16 M. & W. 232; National Savings Bank Association v. Tranah, 15 W. R. 1015, L. R. 2 C. P. 556.

Grimwood Mears, for the respondent.—The rights of the creditors are not suspended after the negotiable instrument has been dishonoured. [WRIGHT, J.—But the dishonour does not affect the liability on the bill.] The bill was in the plaintiff's hands at the time of trial, and this is sufficient. The order of the county court judge, that the bill should be given up to the defendant, protects him from being sued on it as well as upon the debt; consequently the reason for the rule relied on no longer applies in this case.

WRIGHT, J.—There are no merits in the appellant's case, but on the point of law I feel bound to agree with his contention. It is settled that where a man is sued upon a debt it is a good defence to say that he has given a bill as security for the debt and that that bill is outstanding in the hands of a third party. When this action was brought the plaintiff was not the holder of the bill, and he cannot by afterwards getting it in give himself a cause of action at the date when he commenced his proceedings. Now that the bill is in his hands it is, of course, open to him to bring a new action; but in the present proceedings I think he must fail. We must, therefore, allow the appeal.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

FIELDING & CO. v. CORRY. (a.)

Bill of exchange—Notice of dishonour—Reasonable time—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 49, sub-section 12.

In an action on a bill of exchange it appeared that the holders handed the bill to their bankers, the Cardiff branch of the G. Bank, who sent it to their agents, the L. and W. Bank, to present for payment. The bill having been dishonoured, the L. and W. Bank sent notice of dishonour on the following day to the G. Bank, but addressed it by mistake to the Cirencester branch. On the next morning, having discovered their mistake, they telegraphed notice of dishonour to the Cardiff branch.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (Collins, L.J., dissenting), that, so far as regarded the giving of notice by the L. and W. Bank to their principals, the requirements of section 49, sub-section 12, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, had been complied with.

Application for judgment in an action tried before Ridley, J., and a jury.

The plaintiffs sued as indorsees and holders of a bill of exchange, dated the 7th of July, 1894, for £120, payable four months after date at the National Provincial Bank of England. One of the defendants, Mrs. Laura Emma Edwards, who was sued as the indorser of the bill to the plaintiffs, pleaded that she had not received due notice of dishonour.

It appeared that the plaintiffs kept their banking account at the Cardiff branch of the County of Gloucester Bank, and they left the bill at that branch in order that it might be sent up to London to be presented for payment. The County of Gloucester Bank forwarded the bill to their agents, the London and Westminster Bank, who duly presented it for payment at the National Provincial Bank of England on Saturday, the 10th of November, 1894. The bill having been dishonoured, the London and Westminster Bank, on Monday, the 12th of November, sent notice of dishonour by post to the County of Gloucester Bank, but by mistake they addressed the notice to the Cirencester branch of that bank, and not to the Cardiff branch. On the morning of the 13th of November, having discovered their mistake, they sent a telegram to the Cardiff branch, giving notice of dishonour. It was admitted that subsequent notices were duly given until notice reached the defendant Mrs. Edwards.

The question was whether the London and Westminster Bank had given notice to their principals in accordance with the requirements of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Section 49 of the Bills of Exchange Act, which deals with notice of dishonour, enacts as follows: "(12) The notice may be given as soon as the bill is dishonoured, and must be given within a reasonable time thereafter. In the absence of special circumstances notice is not deemed to have been given within a reasonable time unless . . . (b) where the person giving and the person to receive notice reside in different places, the notice is sent off on the day after the dishonour of the bill, if there be a post at a convenient hour on that day, and if there be no such post on that day, then by the next post thereafter. (13) Where a bill when dishonoured is in the hands of an agent, he may either himself give notice to the parties liable on the bill, or he may give notice to his principal. If he give notice to his principal, he must do so within the same time as if he were the holder, and the principal, upon receipt of such notice, has himself the same time for giving notice as if the agent had been an independent holder."

At the trial of the action a verdict and judgment were entered for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

Woodfin, for the defendant.

Ashton Cross and R. Edmondson, for the plaintiffs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It is said on behalf of the defendant that, though she received notice of dishonour within the time required by the statute, she is entitled to rely on a failure to comply with the statute in respect of any one of the links in the chain of notices, and that there is a blot in the plaintiff's case in that notice was not given on the 12th of November as required by the statute. A notice was given on that day, and it was given to the right persons, but it was directed to a wrong address. Section 49 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, contains the rules as to notice of dishonour. Sub-sections 5, 6, and 7 show that a notice of dishonour need not be in any special form or in writing at all, and that an insufficient written notice may be supplemented and validated by verbal communication. Then sub-section 12 says that the notice must be given within a reasonable time after dishonour, and proceeds to say that in the absence of special circumstances (which do not exist here) notice is not to be deemed to have been given within a reasonable time unless, where the person giving and the person to receive notice reside in different places, the notice is sent off on the day after the dishonour of the bill, if there be a post at a convenient hour on that day. Here the person to give notice was the London and Westminster Bank, and the person to receive notice was the County of Gloucester Bank, and of course it must be taken that there was a convenient post on the 12th of November, the day after the dishonour of the bill. The London and Westminster Bank gave notice to the County of Gloucester Bank on that day, but they addressed the notice to the Cirencester branch, and not to the Cardiff branch. On the following morning, having found out their error, they telegraphed notice of dishonour to the Cardiff branch, and this must have been received as soon as a letter posted on the previous evening would have been received. I cannot disjoin these two acts; I think that they ought to be treated as forming one continuing act, and that, inasmuch as the object of the statute has been satisfied, the judgment of Ridley, J., ought to stand.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question seems to me to be one of substance rather than of form. If the Act said the address was an essential part of the notice, other considerations would arise. But I think that the real question is, whether the notice came to the knowledge of the person to whom it was addressed. If putting a wrong address does not prevent the notice arriving in proper time, I do not think it can be said that there has been a failure to comply with the Act. The County of Gloucester Bank sent the bill through their Cardiff officers to the London and Westminster Bank to present for payment. The bill having been dishonoured, the London and Westminster Bank sent notice to their principals on the following day, but they wrongly addressed it to Cirencester, and the next morning they corrected their mistake by telegraphing to Cardiff. I think it is clear that the County of Gloucester Bank received notice within the time intended by the Act. I say nothing about the case in which putting a wrong address might lead to delay.

COLLINS, L.J.—I differ from my learned brothers on one point, and I do so with great diffidence. The point is this—Are different branches of a bank to be treated as one and the same person or as different persons for the purpose of receiving notice of dishonour of a bill of exchange? I think they ought to be treated as different persons. In this case the Cardiff branch of the County of Gloucester Bank forwarded the bill of exchange to their agents, the London and Westminster Bank. In my judgment the true view of the case is that the relationship of principal and agent was entablished between the Cardiff branch of the County of Gloucester Bank and the London and Westminster Bank. I do not think that the principals were the County of Gloucester Bank as a single institution. Therefore, when the London and Westminster Bank sent notice to the Cirencester branch on the 12th of November, they sent notice to persons who were not their principals. I find very strong authority for so holding in Clode v. Bayley, 12 M. & W. 51, and Prince v. Oriental Bank Corporation, 26 W. R. 543, 3 App. Cas. 325. It is said that the mistake was cured by the telegram. But admittedly the telegram was not sent within the time mentioned in the statute, and therefore was not a good notice in itself. And in my opinion it cannot have the effect of supplementing the wrong notice sent on the previous day.

Appeal dismissed.

BARING v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Foreign security issued in the United Kingdom—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 82, sub-section 1 (b) (i).

The appellant was the holder of one of a series of bonds given by a newly-formed American company in exchange for bonds in an old company which was being wound up under a reorganization scheme. It was stated on the bond that it should not be valid for any purpose unless authenticated by the trustee's certificate thereon indorsed. The bond was executed by the new company in the United States and delivered to a trust company, which was to act as trustee. The trust company did not immediately sign the certificates on the bonds which were destined for England; but, in order to avoid a heavy premium for insurance, forwarded the bonds unsigned, and at the same time sent over an official to sign the certificates in London. The appellant's bond was handed to him in London after the certificate had been so signed.

Held, that the bond was issued in the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 82, sub-section 1 (b) (i), of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wright and Ridley, JJ.) on a special case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

The instrument upon which the commissioners were required to express their opinion was a bond unregistered whereby the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Kansas (hereinafter called the new company), promised to pay to bearer, or if the bond should be registered as thereinafter provided, to the registered holder thereof, the sum of 1,000 dollars. It was recited that the bond was one of a series issued in pursuance of and secured by a mortgage or deed of trust dated the 12th of December, 1895, executed by the new company to the Union Trust Co. of New York as trustee. The following clause appeared on the face of the bond: "This bond shall not be valid for any purpose unless authenticated by the certificate hereon endorsed of the trustee under said mortgage or deed of trust." The endorsed certificate, as it appeared when the instrument was before the commissioners, was as follows: "Trustee's certificate. Union Trust Co. of New York hereby certifies that this is one of the series of general mortgage 4 per cent. 100-year gold bonds described in the within-mentioned mortgage or deed of trust dated December 12th, 1895. Union Trust Co., of New York, trustee, by E. H. Merritt, vice-president."

The Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad Co. (hereinafter called the old company) was a company incorporated under the laws of Kansas in the year 1859. It had issued a number of mortgage bonds payable to bearer, which were held by various bondholders in America and Europe. In 1895 the old company being in arrear in payment of the interest on their bonds, a scheme of reorganization was proposed, under which the old company was to be wound up and its property vested in a new company. The bondholders who assented to the scheme were to deposit their securities with certain firms, who were styled depositaries, and to receive in exchange a certificate of deposit. By making such deposit each depositor became a party to the scheme, and was to be entitled, when the proper time arrived, to receive in exchange for his certificate of deposit securities in the new company as provided for in the scheme. Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co. were named as the depositaries of bonds for London, and agreed to act as such.

In pursuance of the scheme the new company shortly after April, 1896, executed in the United States a number of bonds, one of which was the bond in question, and delivered them to the Union Trust Co. in New York. At the time when the bonds were so delivered, each had endorsed thereon the trustee's certificate above set out, but such certificate was not then signed. The Trust Co., in further pursuance of the scheme, forwarded a number of the bonds to each of the depositaries in Europe. The Trust Co. were to countersign the bonds before forwarding them, but it was found that the premium to be paid for the insurance of the bonds on their transmission to London would be so heavy that it was arranged that the vice-president of the Trust Co. should proceed to London and countersign them there, and this was accordingly done in the case of all the bonds sent to Baring Brothers & Co., including the bond now in question, the vice-president signing each bond by adding the words "Union Trust Co. of New York, trustee, by E. H. Merritt, vice-president." The bond in question was subsequently delivered by Baring Brothers & Co. to the appellant, the Hon. John Baring, at their office in London in exchange for a certificate of deposit issued by them of which he was then the holder.

The question was whether the bond was issued in the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 82, sub-section 1 (b) (i) of the Stamp Act, 1891.

The commissioners were of opinion that it was issued in the United Kingdom, and they assessed duty at the rate of one shilling for every £10, but they stated this case on the requisition of the appellant.

The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the commissioners.

The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Cohen, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the appellant.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the Crown.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. There was a company called the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad Co., incorporated under the laws of Kansas. In 1895, this company having apparently got into difficulties, a scheme of reorganization was carried out, under which the old company was to be wound up and a new company was to come into existence in its place, the holders of stock and bonds in the old company becoming holders of stock and bonds in the new company. The new company accordingly issued bonds, the form of which is material. By each of them the new company promises to pay to bearer a thousand dollars, and there is an express stipulation on the bond that it shall not be valid for any purpose unless authenticated by the certificate thereon endorsed of the trustee under the mortgage or deed of trust by which it is secured. This certificate, which was to be endorsed upon the bond in order that it might be valid for any purpose, is as follows: "Trustee's certificate. Union Trust Co. of New York hereby certifies that this is one of the series of general mortgage 4 per cent. 100 year gold bonds described in the within-mentioned mortgage or deed of trust dated December 12th, 1895. Union Trust Co. of New York, trustee, by E. H. Merritt, vice-president." Now, that instrument, as it seems to me, is upon its face clearly not a bond at all; it is a mere piece of paper until this certificate has been signed by Mr. Merritt. It was brought into existence as a piece of paper in New York, and in order to avoid the high premium which would have been payable for the insurance of a complete and valid bond during its transit between New York and this country, the parties let it remain an inchoate instrument, and sent it over to this country as an inchoate instrument, and not as a bond at all, and they sent Mr. Merritt over to this country to convert it into a bond when he arrived here. It was so converted in the City of London when Mr. Merritt signed the certificate endorsed upon it in Messrs. Baring's office. Having signed the certificate, Mr. Merritt handed the bond over to Messrs. Baring, who handed it to Mr. John Baring, an old bondholder. The question arises, Where was that bond issued? It was not issued in New York when the piece of paper was given to the Union Trust Co. The piece of paper was handed to the Union Trust Co., but it cannot be said that it was issued. A document is not issued within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, until it becomes an actual valid subsisting document. In my judgment this document was first issued when the certificate endorsed on it was signed by Mr. Merritt, which took place in this country. Until that moment the document had no more validity than if it had been a piece of blank paper. In my opinion this bond was issued in London, and when the certificate was signed it then and there became a marketable security, which it was not before. It is, therefore, a marketable security issued in the United Kingdom, and it is liable to stamp duty of a shilling on every £10. The judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The sole question is whether this instrument which came into the appellant's hands as the person entitled to it under the scheme was or was not issued in the United Kingdom. I cannot entertain a doubt about it. A document is not issued, if it is sealed and put into a box and kept there, nor if it is handed over to an agent with instructions only to part with it on receiving some consideration for it. A document is issued when it gets into the hands of a person who can make it useful. I think that this is the ordinary meaning of the word "issue," and that it is its meaning in the Stamp Act, 1891. During the transit of these documents from New York to London, and down to the moment when the certificate endorsed upon them was signed, no one could have sued upon them or taken advantage of them. When the certificate was signed, and they became complete instruments, and when they were handed over to the persons entitled to them, then, and not till then, they were issued. But it is said that we ought to construe the Act as though it said "issued on behalf of the company." I do not think that that is the true construction of the Act, but assuming that it is, in my judgment this bond was issued on behalf of the company. It was so issued in the ordinary business sense. If a person purchases property and hands the money to an agent telling him to pay the money to the vendor to get the property, that would be a payment on behalf of the purchaser. With regard to Grenfell v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 24 W. R. 582, 1 Ex. D. 242, I think that the judgment of Pollock, B., in that case involves the decision which we are arriving at here. There must be an instrument handed over under circumstances which give a right of action. In my opinion, in the present case there was no issue of this bond in New York, but there was an issue at the time when the instrument, being then a perfect instrument, was handed over to the appellant in London. The issue, therefore, was in the United Kingdom, and the case comes within the Stamp Act.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether this bond is a marketable security by, or on behalf of, a foreign company made or issued in the United Kingdom. The appellant contends that there was no issue in the United Kingdom, because there could be only one issue of the instrument, and that issue took place in New York. He further contends that, if there was an issue of a marketable security in the United Kingdom, the issue was not by or on behalf of the foreign company. I think that the grounds upon which I rest my judgment dispose of both points simultaneously. A scheme was arranged by which a new company was to take over the effects of an old company, and to give the bondholders in the old company its own bonds in substitution for their existing bonds. That involved certain machinery. It was necessary that the titles of the persons claiming as bondholders should be verified, and that no bonds of the new company should be handed over unless the new company was satisfied that the persons to whom they were being handed over had a proper claim to them. Accordingly forms of bonds were prepared by the new company, and on their face they bore a clause providing that they were not to be valid for any purpose unless authenticated by the certificate endorsed thereon. These instruments were delivered in New York with the intention that they should be so authenticated and then issued to the persons entitled to them. That was the scheme; where was it carried out? The document came into existence in an inchoate form in New York; but the company, owing to a difficulty about insurance, took steps to make it certain that it should not be deemed to be issued until it reached England. They sent it over to this country, and at the same time they sent over the trustee who was to sign the certificate; and, after the document had received authentication by his signing the certificate, it was handed by Messrs. Baring to the appellant. Was that an issue in England? It seems to have all the elements of an issue in England, and to have been done in pursuance of the general scheme. Although no doubt the trustees were, in a sense, the mandatories of the persons to whom the documents were to be handed over, their action was part and parcel of the general scheme which dealt with the operation as a whole, and they were merely conduit pipes by means of which this instrument was delivered on behalf of the company to the person entitled to receive it. In my judgment, therefore, the issue took place in the United Kingdom, and it was an issue on behalf of the company.

Appeal dismissed.

MAYOR, &c., OF ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE v. PUGH. (a.)

Local government — Public health — Local statute — Implied repeal of special by general Act — Paving expenses in street—Highway repairable by inhabitants at large—Liability of frontagers—Ashton-under-Lyne Improvement Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. xxxv.), s. 20 —Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 149, 150, 340.

Under a local Act passed in 1849, if any street, whether repairable by the inhabitants at large or not, was not sewered, levelled, paved, and otherwise completed to the satisfaction of the urban authority, the latter might order the frontagers to execute the necessary works, and, upon the frontagers making default, might themselves execute the works and apportion the expenses among the frontagers.

By section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, all streets repairable by the inhabitants at large within any urban district were vested in the urban authority, who were bound to cause them to be levelled, paved, altered, and repaired as occasion might require. By section 150 the urban authority had power, in the case of streets not repairable by the inhabitants at large, to charge the expenses of sewering and paving them upon the frontagers.

Held, that there was nothing in the Public Health Act, 1875, which showed an intention to repeal the above provision of the local Act, and that, therefore, the urban authority could, under that section, charge the frontagers with the expenses of sewering, paving, and otherwise completing a street repairable by the inhabitants at large.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Grantham and Wright, JJ.) on a special case.

The defendant was the owner of land and buildings abutting upon a street, called Mossley-road, which was within the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne, and the action was brought to recover from the defendant as such owner the amount apportioned as his share of the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs, as the urban sanitary authority, in paving, levelling, flagging, and otherwise completing the street.

Mossley-road was a public highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and the plaintiffs claimed power to execute the works and charge the frontagers with the expenses thereof under section 20 of the Ashton-under-Lyne Improvement Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. xxxv.).

By section 20 of that Act: "If any street or part of a street, whether the same be a public highway* or not, and whether the same be already or shall at any time hereafter be laid out and opened to the public within the said borough, be not or shall not be sufficiently sewered, drained, levelled, flagged, paved, and otherwise completed to the satisfaction of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses," the corporation may order such street to be sewered, &c., according to such plan as they shall direct, and thereupon the respective owners of the buildings and lands alongside of or adjoining to such street shall, at their expense, doing the works so far as the same extends along their buildings and lands; and in default of the owners do the works, the corporation may do them, and recover the expenses from the said owners.

* The court held, upon the construction of this section, that the words "public highway" meant a public highway whether repairable by the inhabitants at large or not.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 24, when a street shall have been so sewered, &c., the corporation are to certify and declare the same to be a public highway, and it shall be for ever afterwards repairable out of the highway rate.

Mossley-road was not certified or declared a public highway until after the works in question had been completed.

By section 13 of the Ashton-under-Lyne Improvement Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. clxxi.), section 20 of the Act of 1849 was amended in a manner not material to set out for the purposes of this report.

Mossley-road, not being paved, flagged, and completed to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs, they ordered the work to be done, and gave the defendant and the other frontagers notice of the order and required them to do the work in the parts of the street fronting their respective premises. As the frontagers did not do the work, the plaintiffs did it, and apportioned the expenses among them. The present action was brought to recover such apportioned expenses from the defendant as a frontager, the plaintiffs contending that the defendant was liable for the expenses so incurred under section 20 of the Ashton-under-Lyne Improvement Act, 1849.

The defendants contended (so far as material to this report) that section 20 of the Act of 1849, so far as it applied to highways repairable by the inhabitants at large, was inconsistent with and repealed by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The Divisional Court gave judgment for the defendant.*

The plaintiffs appealed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case it is contended that section 20 of the Ashton-under-Lyne Improvement Act, 1849, was impliedly repealed by the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875. The latter Act is a general Act, while the former is a local Act. The passage which has been read from Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 3rd ed., p. 243, shows that a general Act is not to be construed as repealing a special Act, unless that intention is manifested in clear terms. In London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Limehouse District Board of Works, 5 W. R. 64, 3 K. & J. 123, Wood, V.C., said: "The Legislature, in passing a special Act, has entirely in its consideration some special power which is to be delegated to the body applying for the Act on public grounds; and the preamble of every statute of this kind contains a recital of its being for the public convenience that the particular powers should be granted. When a general Act is subsequently passed, it seems to be a necessary inference that the Legislature does not intend thereby to regulate all cases not specially brought before it; but, looking to the general advantage of the community, without reference to particular cases, it gives large and general powers, which in their generality might, except for this very wholesome rule of interpreting statutes, override the powers which, upon consideration of the particular case, the Legislature had before conferred by the special Act for the benefit of the public." The Vice-Chancellor there gave his reasons for holding that a general Act should not be held to repeal a previous special Act. The same principle was laid down in Thorpe v. Adams, 19 W. R. 352, L. R. 6 C. P. 125, and in the other cases cited in Maxwell. I cannot see any intention in the Public Health Act, 1875, to repeal section 20 of the local Act of 1849. There is a further circumstance in this case which tends to show that the Legislature did not intend to repeal the provisions in the local Act of 1849. Sections 340 and 341 of the Public Health Act, 1875, clearly express the intention of the Legislature in passing the general Act that the local Act should remain untouched, and that the powers conferred by the local Act should still remain in force and unaffected. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment must be reversed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Public Health Act, 1875, is a general Act containing general provisions, which, according to the ordinary rule as to the construction of statutes, are not to be taken as repealing a special Act containing contrary provisions unless an intention is shown to repeal it. When I look at the Act of 1875 I find nothing to warrant the argument that it repeals the local Act. Section 149 of the Act of 1875 imposes upon the local authority the duty of doing certain work, and it follows that, if they cannot impose the expenses of doing the work upon anyone, they must pay for it themselves. By section 20 of the local Act of 1849, the expense of doing that work is imposed on the frontagers. The Legislature never intended that the local authority should lose their rights under their local Act. Then, coming to sections 340, 341, it is clear that local Acts are not dealt with or affected by the general Act of 1875. The local authority are left by those sections to take proceedings under the local or general Act, whichever they may prefer. Section 340, so far from showing any intention that the local Act should be repealed, plainly shows an intention to preserve the rights given by it. It means that if the local Act contains provisions similar to those contained in the Public Health Act, 1875, the local authority may take proceedings either under the local Act or the general Act, with this proviso, that the local authority cannot set up the local Act to get rid of their obligations under the general Act. Section 341 seems to have been added for the same purpose, and to have been inserted ex majori cautela. The appeal must be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—The question is, are the frontagers still under the obligations imposed upon them by section 20 of the local Act of 1849 to pay for certain structural alterations in sewering, draining, &c., the street. Has section 20 been impliedly repealed by the Public Health Act, 1875? I can only say that I entirely agree with what has been said by the other members of the court. The case falls within the general rule stated by A. L. Smith, L.J., as to special Acts not being affected by general Acts. To make the matter still more clear, it seems to me that the express words of sections 340, 341 of the Act of 1875 show that the intention of the Legislature was not to repeal the local Act.

Deed—Escrow—Delivery to stranger, whether necessary to make deed an escrow—Misappropriation of consideration money by person who is agent of both parties—Money never received by grantor—Failure of consideration.

A deed, though delivered to a person who is one of the grantees, may, if such was the intention of the parties, be an escrow in his hands, and evidence is admissible to show upon what terms it was delivered.

A mortgage deed, duly executed and delivered to the mortgagee's solicitor, cannot be impeached in equity on the ground that such solicitor, who acted also in the capacity of banker as well as solicitor for the mortgagor and had authority to receive the mortgage money, becomes bankrupt without paying it to the mortgagor.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiff company from Kekewich, J.

Wynne & Son, solicitors, were the solicitors of the plaintiff company, and also its salaried managers and its bankers. Llewellyn Malcolm Wynne, one of the partners in the firm, was the managing director of the company.

L. M. Wynne was also one of the trustees of a settlement called Arthur's settlement, the continuing trustees of which were the defendants to the action, and Wynne & Son were the solicitors to the trustees.

In May, 1892, Wynne & Son, as the trustees' solicitors, received a sum of £9,500, which they paid into Child's Bank to the credit of their own account there. This sum was to be reinvested in the names of the trustees, and one at least of the trustees knew that it was in Wynne & Son's hands for reinvestment.

The plaintiff company had borrowed on mortgage at 5 per cent. sums amounting to over £9,000. Wynne, about this time, suggested that the money might be got at a lower rate, and the directors adopted his view. All the arrangements for raising the money to pay off the existing mortgages were left to Wynne.

At a meeting held on the 22nd of June, 1893, the directors resolved that a mortgage of certain property to the defendants to secure a sum of £9,000 should be sealed with the company's seal, and accordingly it was sealed, and was signed by two of the directors and the secretary. The date of the document and the days for payment were then blank, and the days for payment were never filled in. The document was given to or left with Wynne.

The plaintiff company never received any part of the £9,000, which was misappropriated by Wynne.

In March, 1895, Wynne became bankrupt.

The plaintiff company then brought this action, claiming to have the deed set aside.

The defendants contended that it had been delivered to Wynne, as their solicitor, and was a valid security in their favour.

Kekewich, J., gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff company appealed.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and H. C. Hawkins, for the appeal.—The deed was delivered only as an escrow: Watkins v. Nash, 23 W. R. 647, L. R. 20 Eq. 262. The principle of Wall v. Cockerell, 11 W. R. 442, 9 Jur. N. S. 447, covers this case.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

Lindley, M.R., who, after stating the facts, proceeded: The plaintiff company seek to set aside this £9,000 mortgage on the following grounds—viz., first, on the legal ground that the mortgage never was executed as a deed, but was only an escrow; secondly, on the equitable ground that the mortgagees never gave and that the company never got the consideration for which the mortgage was given. As regards the invalidity of the mortgage as a deed, it is urged that, although sealed, the mortgage was handed to Wynne, not as one of the mortgagees nor as solicitor to the mortgagees, but as solicitor to the plaintiff company, to be delivered to the mortgagees or to be kept by him as their solicitor only when the £9,000, or at least some of it, reached the plaintiff company or was applied in paying off the other mortgagees which the company had arranged to pay off. Kekewich, J., decided this point against the plaintiff company. We take the same view. We are not prepared to go so far as to say that, as Wynne was himself one of the mortgagees and a party to the deed, it could not in point of law be an escrow in his hands. Counsel for the defendants contended that, owing to the mere fact that Wynne was himself one of the mortgagees, the delivery of the deed to him was fatal to its being an escrow. They contended that to be an escrow the deed must be delivered to some person not a party taking under it; in short, to a stranger. In support of this contention reliance was placed on Co. Lit., 31, 36; Shep. Touchstone, 65; and Whyddon's case, Cro. Eliz. 520. No doubt the language used in the authorities referred to, and reproduced in other works on real property and conveyancing, is in favour of this contention. But the language is very general, and we are not at all satisfied that the law is so rigid as to compel the court to decide that where there are several grantees, and one of them is also solicitor of the grantor and of the other grantees, and the deed is delivered to him, evidence is not admissible to show the character in which and the terms upon which the deed was so delivered to him. To exclude such evidence appears to us unreasonable; and we do not think we are compelled by authority to exclude it. We hold such evidence to be admissible, and in so doing we believe we are acting in accordance with modern authorities, including particularly those beginning with Murray v. Lord Stair and ending with Watkins v. Nash. Upon the evidence, however, we come to the conclusion that the mortgage was a complete deed, and that it was given as such, to Wynne in order to enable him to carry out the arrangements to which we have before alluded, and to carry them out as he thought proper.

There remains the more difficult question whether the deed, being good at law, can be impeached in equity. The mere fact that no cash passed when the deed was executed is not enough to invalidate it. The directors knew perfectly well that no cash passed. They were not informed how Wynne intended to carry out the arrangement, but they left him to carry it out as he thought best. It is contended that he had no authority to receive the £9,000 except in cash; but he had the cash from the trustees for investment. Whether the plaintiff company got it from him is another matter. If the credit entry of the 1st of June, 1893, is a trustworthy entry made by Wynne & Son, who had the trustees' money to invest, and who were the plaintiff company's managers and bankers, the entry will represent a real transaction between the plaintiff company on the one side, and the Arthur trustees on the other; for Wynne & Son, as the managers and bankers of the company, had implied authority from the company to place to their credit any money placed in Wynne & Son's hands for the company or directed to be paid to the company; and Wynne & Son had ample authority from the Arthur trustees to deal with their money in Wynne & Son's hands by debiting them with it and carrying the amount to the credit of anyone who banked with Wynne & Son and who gave a proper mortgage for it. We have come to the conclusion that the credit entry was made to represent a real transaction, and that if it had been known and questioned at the time no one would ever have complained of it as in any way irregular or improper. But when Wynne & Son became bankrupt, and it was discovered that they had not carried out the arrangements which were contemplated, the plaintiff company very naturally quarrelled with every step in the transaction.

But the case does not by any means depend solely on the foregoing considerations. As between the plaintiff company on the one side and the Arthur trustees on the other, the plaintiff company have, in our opinion, no equitable right to set aside the mortgage. The plaintiff company have, in our opinion, enabled their managers and bankers to make representations to the mortgagees that their money was invested on the security of property belonging to the plaintiff company. Such representation has been made; the mortgagees had every reason for believing it to be true, they did believe it to be true, and they acted on that belief by ceasing to inquire after their money. They were not bound to make any further inquiry. Had they done so it is obvious that the deed would have been produced to them. These circumstances turn the scale against the plaintiff company, and distinguish this case from Wall v. Cockerell, which was so much relied upon by the counsel for the appellants. In Wall v. Cockerell there was no authority to borrow on the security of the impeached deed; there was no relation of banker and manager on the one side and customer on the other; there was no money of the mortgagees in the hands of the agent of the mortgagor; there was no credit in account. Moreover, the mortgagor was induced to execute the mortgage by misrepresentation. Lord Chelmsford distinctly said so, and Lord Westbury merely said it was not necessary to put the case so high. In Coupe v. Collyer the impeached deed was held to be only an escrow; there was no relation of banker and customer; and the mortgagees never placed money in the hands of the mortgagor's solicitor for investment. On these grounds we are of opinion that the decision appealed from was correct.

We have purposely abstained from saying anything about notice to either party through Wynne of what he did or knew. The case turns on the facts and not on any doctrine of notice. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord LUDLOW having agreed to this judgment before his retirement, it can be passed and entered as the judgment of the court which heard the case, and be dated August 10.

Appeal dismissed.

App. Bankruptcy.
(A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L.JJ.) — Oct. 29.

In re CLARK.
Ex parte CLARK. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Judgment debtor—Foreign subject—Application for committal—Receiving order—Jurisdiction of court—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 6, 103, sub-section 5.

In the case of an application under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, for the committal of a foreign subject domiciled abroad, and who, within a year before the application, has not ordinarily resided in England or had a dwelling-house or place of business therein, the court has jurisdiction, under section 103, sub-section 5 (d), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, if it think fit, to decline to commit, and in lieu thereof, with the consent of the judgment creditor, to make a receiving order against the debtor.

This was an appeal by the debtor, Matteo Clark, against a receiving order made against him by Day, J., on the 9th of August, 1894, under section 103, sub-section 5, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon an application by a judgment creditor, under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, for the committal of the debtor.

The debtor was a member of a firm of Clark & Co., which carried on business as railway contractors at Buenos Ayres and in London. On the 11th of May, 1897, Messrs. Schultze & Co. recovered judgment against the debtor for £2,500, on a bill of exchange drawn up by the Buenos Ayres firm and accepted by the London firm. Being unable to obtain payment of the debt, Schultze & Co. took out a judgment summons against the debtor, and at the hearing of the summons Day, J., came to the conclusion on the evidence that the debtor had, since the date of the judgment, had the means of paying the debt, and that there was therefore a case for committal; but in the exercise of his discretion the learned judge made a receiving order in lieu of committal under section 103 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It was admitted that Clark was not at the date of such receiving order domiciled in England, or had within a year previous to it resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

England within the meaning of section 6 (1) (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The debtor appealed on the ground that he was not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, and that the learned judge had no jurisdiction to make the receiving order.

Section 103 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is as follows: "Where under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, application is made by a judgment creditor to the court having bankruptcy jurisdiction for the committal of a judgment debtor, the court may, if it thinks fit, decline to commit, and in lieu thereof, with the consent of the judgment creditor, and on payment by him of the prescribed fee, make a receiving order against the debtor. In such case, the judgment debtor shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy at the time the order is made."

Section 6 (1) (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is as follows: "A creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless . . . (d) The debtor is domiciled in England, or within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition has ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England."

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—The debtor being a foreign subject, and not having ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England within a year before the date of the application, the judge had no jurisdiction to make a receiving order against him. In Ex parte Blain, In re Sawers, 28 W. R. 334, 12 Ch. D. 522, it was held that the Court of Bankruptcy has no jurisdiction to make an adjudication of bankruptcy against a foreigner domiciled and resident abroad. This principle was recognized by the Court of Appeal in In re Pearson, 40 W. R. 532, [1892] 2 Q. B. 263. That is the broad principle of the law as contained in section 6, sub-section 1 (d), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; and section 103, sub-section 5, of that Act, which gives power to the court to make a receiving order in lieu of a committal order must be read subject to it. Even assuming that there was jurisdiction to commit, there was no jurisdiction to make a receiving order. In a previous case against the present debtor, In re Clark. Ex parte Beyer, Peacock, & Co., 45 W. R. 118, [1896] 2 Q. B. 476, the issue of a bankruptcy notice and its service upon the debtor was held to be good, but no petition was presented, as there was no jurisdiction to do so.

Reed, Q.C., and Hansell, for the respondent, were not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I think this appeal must be dismissed. It is an appeal asking us to set aside a receiving order which has been made against one Matteo Clark, who formerly carried on business as a railway contractor in Buenos Ayres and London. In December, 1895, the execution creditor issued a writ against Matteo Clark on a bill of exchange. On the 11th of May, 1897, judgment was obtained for £2,500. On the 7th of July the debtor, not having satisfied the judgment, was served with a judgment summons asking for a committal order. Day, J., before whom the matter came, was satisfied that Clark had had some means since the judgment to satisfy the debt, and that on the evidence before him there was a case for a committal, and that being so, he had ample jurisdiction, in the exercise of his discretion, under section 103 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and with the consent of the judgment creditor, to make, as he did, a receiving order against him.

Now, the first point raised before us was that Clark did not come within sub-section 6 of section 103, upon the ground that he was not a person against whom a bankruptcy petition could be presented, because that could only be done in the case of a debtor who was at the time domiciled in England, or who, within a year before the date of presentation of the petition, had ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England, which the debtor in this case had not, and that therefore a receiving order could not be made against him. In my opinion there was jurisdiction, notwithstanding, to make the order. The point we have to decide is as to the construction of section 103, sub-section 5, and my opinion is that where a judge has jurisdiction to commit a debtor under section 5 of the Debtors Act of 1869, he may, if he thinks fit, in lieu of making a committal order, and in mercy to the debtor, make a receiving order against him. This sub-section is in favour of the debtor, and to save him from going to gaol, and my opinion is that under it my brother Day had full jurisdiction to make this receiving order if he had evidence before him which satisfied him that the debtor had possessed means. I think it is clear that such evidence was before the learned judge, and I am of opinion that he was quite right.

This order must therefore stand.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We are here dealing with a man who evidently was not ignorant of the working of the bankruptcy laws, and who made preparations in anticipation of his financial difficulties by assigning his furniture to his wife. This evidence was before the judge, as also was the debtor's bank pass-book. I have no doubt whatever that Day, J., had jurisdiction to make the necessary order. The cases which have been cited appear to me beside the point. The debtor was within the jurisdiction at the time and was clearly in contempt, and might have had a committal order made against him, and in such a case the judge may, under this section, with the consent of the judgment creditor, in lieu of making such an order and in mercy to the debtor, make a receiving order.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the question of jurisdiction I have no doubt. The true test seems to me to be, not whether the judgment debtor is domiciled within the jurisdiction at the time for the purpose of presenting a petition against him, but whether he is within the jurisdiction for the purpose of having a committal order made against him. On the question of evidence of means on the part of the debtor I think Day, J., was quite justified in coming to the conclusion he did, and I think that the receiving order ought to stand.

Appeal dismissed.

LEACH v. LEACH. (a.)

Inland revenue—Probate duty—Proceeds of plantation in Jamaica—English testator—Share bequeathed to

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

English legatee—Death of legatee—Liability of estate to probate duty.

An English legatee of a share of the proceeds of sale of a West Indian plantation, which was devised by an English testator, after the expiration or failure of certain prior interests, in trust for sale and division of the proceeds, died before the expiration of prior interests for life.

Held, that his share ought to be regarded as an English, and not as a foreign, asset; and probate duty was consequently payable in respect thereof.

Petition.

This was a petition for the distribution of funds, subject to the trusts of the will dated in May, 1837, of Francis G. Smyth, who died in June, 1839; but the only point with which this report deals is a question which arose as to the payment of probate duty on the death of a legatee under the will in respect of a share bequeathed to him of the proceeds of a plantation in Jamaica.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in his lordship's judgment.

In addition to the authorities there referred to, the following were cited: Laidley v. Lord Advocate, 15 App. Cas. 468, 39 W. R. Dig. 196; Attorney-General v. Hope, 2 Cl. & Fin. 84; Attorney-General v. Ailesbury (Marquis), 36 W. R. 737, 12 App. Cas. 672.

Neville, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the petitioners.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

ROMER, J.—The question as to probate duty which arises in this case may be shortly stated as follows: A testator, who at the dates of his will and death was living and domiciled in England, made an English will whereby, in effect, he devised and bequeathed a plantation in Jamaica to trustees upon trusts for the benefit of certain persons for life and their issue, and upon the deaths of those persons and failure of issue upon trust to sell the plantation and divide the proceeds amongst several persons therein named. The trustees were at the above dates domiciled in the United Kingdom, and one of them after the testator's death proved the will in England and acted as trustee, and as trustee in this country held the plantation upon the trusts of the will. The trust for sale ultimately took effect, and the proceeds of sale of the plantation became divisible amongst the several persons named in that behalf in the will or their legal personal representatives. One of those persons (I will call him the legatee), who was at the time of his death living and domiciled in England, died while the persons entitled for life were in existence, and the question is whether probate duty is not payable here on his death in respect of his interest under the will. Now, that interest was admittedly of the nature of personalty, and the question, therefore, narrows itself down to this—Is the interest to be considered an English asset or to be treated as foreign because the plantation was situate in Jamaica? In my opinion it is to regarded as an English asset. The case is governed by the principles which led to the decision of the Attorney-General v. Sudeley (Lord), 44 W. R. 340, [1896] 1 Q. B. 354, and the judgment of Lopes, L.J., as reported [1896] 1 Q. B., at p. 363, applies almost word for word to the case before me, and that judgment was approved of and adopted by the lords in the House of Lords when it came for consideration before them on appeal: Sub. nom., Sudeley (Lord) v. Attorney-General, 45 W. R. 305, [1897] A. C. 11. At the time of his death the only right the legatee had in the case before me was to have the trusts of the will duly performed, and in particular to have the trust for sale carried into effect at the due time, and the net proceeds of the sale, after paying costs and the expenses of the trustee, divided between the legatee and the other persons entitled. As matters stood he was not entitled to the plantation itself or to any specific part of share of it. The trustee was not a trustee of the plantation or of any specific part or share of it for him; all the legatee was entitled to was his proportion of the net proceeds of the plantation after realization. He had no claim against the plantation to recover it or any portion of it; that was claim enforceable only by the trustee. The right of a the legatee as against the trustee was only to have the trusts of the will administered. Administered where? The testator was domiciled in England, his will was proved in England, his trustee was in England, and the money recoverable would in the ordinary and proper course be brought to England. The trustee could be properly and in the ordinary course sued in the English court by the legatee, who was in England. The asset was an English equitable chose in action, recoverable in England, and an English and not a foreign asset, and as such subject to probate duty here.

It was suggested as against the Crown, that possibly under some circumstances an action might have been brought by the legatee to enforce his rights in Jamaica. I am bound to say that at present I do not see what action could have been properly brought there. But even admitting that, under some conceivable circumstances or change of circumstances, some action might have been brought there, the question is not in what place under extraordinary circumstances an action might be brought, but what place under existing circumstances was the natural and proper place in which the legatee should enforce his rights? In other words, what was the proper forum for deciding upon the legatee's claim? and the answer to this clearly is that the forum was English. And in reference to this view I may refer to the case of In re Cigala's Trusts, 26 W. R. 257, 7 Ch. D. 351, and the observations of Jessel, M.R., in that case.

I therefore decide that the probate duty is payable.

Settlement — Voluntary settlement — Construction — Estoppel.

By a post-nuptial settlement in 1892 the plaintiff, who was the only child of her parents, conveyed to the trustees property to which it was expressed she was entitled under her parents' settlement. At that time her only interest was a vested interest in reversion expectant on her mother's decease, liable to be divested by the exercise of her mother's power of appointment as the surviving life tenant under the parents' settlement.

In 1897 the mother exercised her power in favour of the plaintiff absolutely.

Held, that the property the plaintiff thus took was not bound by her post-nuptial settlement.

Action to have a voluntary settlement set aside or rectified.

By a marriage settlement dated the 15th of April, 1874, made on the marriage of Maresco Lloyd

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Frederick and Maria Louisa Frederick, the parents of the plaintiff, certain lands at Cappagh, in the county of Dublin, were conveyed to trustees on trust to pay the rents, issues, and profits to M. L. Frederick for life as therein mentioned, and it was thereby agreed that the trustees should invest the residue which after certain payments therein mentioned should remain of the purchase moneys to arise from the sale of an undivided one-fourth share of certain other hereditaments situate at Lambeth and Camberwell, and pay the interest and annual profits to the said Maresco Lloyd Frederick for his life, and after his decease to the said Maria Louisa Frederick for life, and after the decease of the survivor should stand possessed of the said land and premises thereby granted and of the residuary money, stock, funds, and securities, dividends and income in trust for all such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of the marriage as therein mentioned in such manner as the said Maresco Lloyd Frederick and Maria Louisa Frederick should jointly appoint, and in default as the survivor should by deed or deeds with or without power of revocation and new appointment or by his or her will or codicil appoint, and in default of any such appointment in trust for all the children of the marriage as therein mentioned.

The only child of the marriage was the plaintiff, E. E. H. Lovett, who married when not quite seventeen on the 28th of January, 1892.

The voluntary settlement in question in the action was dated the 27th day of July, 1892, and was expressed to be made in pursuance of an order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855, the settlement recited that the share in the lands at Cuppagh subject to the trusts of the settlement of the 15th of April, 1874, therein referred to as the principal indenture of settlement, were vested in the surviving trustee thereof on trust to pay the net rents to the said Maria Louisa Frederick for life, and after her death to hold the said lands on trust for the plaintiff. The indenture further recited that there was vested in the said trustee an undivided fourth part of certain lands at Lambeth and Camberwell, therein called the "London Estate," on trust to sell as therein directed and to invest the proceeds and pay the income to the said Maria Louisa Frederick for life and after her decease to hold such proceeds on trust for the plaintiff. By the operative part of the indenture the plaintiff, E. E. H. Lovett, as settlor, conveyed all her reversionary interest under the settlement of the 15th of April, 1874, to trustees on trust for conversion and to pay the income to the plaintiff for life and then to her husband for life, and on the death of the survivor upon the usual trusts for the benefit of their issue with a trust in default of issue in favour of the plaintiff. In the conveyance of the "London Estate" the words were used that the settlor conveyed to the trustees "all that the net residue of the proceeds of the sale and conversion of the said undivided fourth part of the 'London Estate' to which the said E. E. H. Lovett is entitled under the principal indenture in remainder expectant on the decease of the said M. L. Frederick." The settlement contained no covenant to settle after-acquired property and no power of revocation, and no reference was made in it to the overriding power of appointment which the plaintiff's mother, M. L. Frederick, had under the settlement of 1874.

By a deed-poll dated the 5th of August, 1897, M. L. Frederick, in exercise of the power contained in the settlement of the 15th of April, 1874, irrevocably appointed that the trustees of that settlement should stand possessed of the property therein comprised in trust for the plaintiff, her executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely.

The chief question was whether the interest taken by the plaintiff under this exercise by her mother of her power of appointment was comprised in the voluntary settlement of the 27th of July, 1892.

Neville, Q.C., and O. Leigh Clare, for plaintiff.—The plaintiff only intended to convey by the settlement such property as was then vested in or belonging to her: Sweetapple v. Horlock, 27 W. Ashton Cross, for R. J. A. Lovett.

ROMER, J.—The result at which I have arrived, no doubt, may appear somewhat startling, but after consideration, contrary to my first impression, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief she claims.

The cases that have been cited before me, I think, establish, and, in my opinion, it is now the law, that if a person assigns his interest in property whether real or personal to which at the time he is entitled in default of appointment by another person, and afterwards he obtains that property under an exercise of the overriding power of appointment, he can claim the property notwithstanding the assignment and even though the power was limited to a class of which he was one, and though that power and his interest in default of appointment were both created by the same settlement or instrument, the reason being that the interest he obtained by the exercise of the power was a distinct one from that he possessed at the date of the assignment.

Now I apply that principle to the case before me. I bear in mind that the deed was a settlement by an infant of her then property. Primâ facie it would only pass her then interest under the settlement referred to in the deed, and not an interest she had not then and only obtained afterwards—namely, the interest under the exercise of the power of appointment by the mother. Ought I, in the first place, to construe the deed, dealing with it as a question of construction, as one intended to pass this possible future interest, this expectancy. In the absence of some overwhelming reason to the contrary, I think I ought not to do so, bearing in mind, as I have already said, that the lady was an infant at the time, and seeing that the deed does not purport to pass anything but estates or interests then existing, and does not purport to settle or deal with after-acquired property. In the deed of settlement there is no reference whatever to the power of appointment. Had it been intended to release that power or to prevent its being exercised that could easily have been effected. The power could have been released, or, if so intended, the mother might have exercised it on the settlement, or immediately before it.

There is no covenant in this deed referring to a settlement, and nothing that I can find which binds the mother or the infant in any way to covenant that the power to appoint shall not be exercised.

The main contention of the trustees who have very properly brought before me all the considerations which ought to bear in favour of those claiming under the settlement has been the recital in the deed of the lady's title. I look at that recital, and except that it does not go far enough, so far as it does go, it appears to me accurate. The infant was entitled as the matter then stood, subject to the life interest of her mother, to the property she purports to assign. What the recital does not say, and what no doubt it ought to have said, is this, that her estate and interest was something to be defeated by an exercise of a power of appointment. It appears to me, looking at the considerations I have already pointed out, the form of this deed and the position of the infant, that I ought to give a reasonable construction to this recital and make it accord with the facts, as in fact it does, if you treat it as an incomplete recital or as a recital not stating all the facts, and I think it ought to be treated as a statement of what her then interest was, and as omitting reference to the facts that that interest was defeasible.

Dealing, therefore, with this matter as a question of construction, it appears to me, as I have already said, that I ought not to construe this dsed as intended to pass anything more than the lady's then interest in the property, the property she was then entitled to, and, as I have already pointed out, that would not cover a property, an interest, or an estate which she had not then and did not acquire until after the settlement.

That appears to me really to dispose of this case, for I am satisfied that here there is no estoppel. Certainly, in my opinion, there cannot be any equitable estoppel. The principle of equitable estoppel has been, if I may say so, clearly stated by Lord Selborne in the case which has been cited before me of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans, 22 W. R. 194, L. R. 6 H. L. 352, 360, and it shows that equitable estoppel is not applied in favour of a volunteer, nor in this case can I see any estoppel at all. I can find no estoppel by the terms of the conveying part of the deed, the conveyance being what is called an innocent one, and I can find no estoppel in the recital, for the reasons I have already pointed out, in dealing with the question of construction.

That recital can have a meaning given to it which is in strict accordance with the facts, and need not be construed as a statement of what was not true at the time.

It follows, in my opinion, as I have already said, that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief she has claimed—that is to say, the relief she has claimed at the bar, which is limited to the property which passed under the marriage settlement. There will be a declaration that the interest taken by the plaintiff under the exercise of the power of appointment is not comprised in the settlement.

CARLISLE CAFÉ CO. (LIMITED) AND TODD v. MUSE BROTHERS & CO. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Rooms—Outer walls—Signboards—Derogation from grant.

A lease of rooms in a house constituting a dwelling by itself includes the outer walls of the house so far as they are solely appropriate to the rooms let.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 7th of March, 1896, the plaintiff Todd signed a memorandum in writing as follows: "I, the undersigned, William David Todd, of 7, English-street, Carlisle, shoemaker, agree to let to Mr. Harry T. Muse, of 9, Eden-street, Stanwix, Carlisle, photographer, the studio, workroom, and dressing-room on the top floor of my new building, and the reception-room on the second floor thereof as from this date for one year at the rent of £35, payable quarterly, tenant to pay rates. And I, the undersigned, Harry T. Muse, agree to take the above-named premises on the above-named terms." During the negotiations the plaintiff Todd verbally represented to the defendants, as his lordship held proved, to the effect that the defendants were to have all reasonable facilities for advertising their business on the outside walls. Muse was a member of the defendant firm, and acted on their behalf.

By lease of the 8th of May, 1896, Todd demised to the plaintiff company so much of the house as consisted of the front entrance and the whole of the first and second storeys (except one room on the second storey) together with all fixtures and fittings thereon, as then in the occupation of the plaintiff company, for a term of years, with a verbal agreement that the plaintiff company might place on the front of the house such signboards or advertisements as they should think fit, in particular the sign "Silver Grill" in a position over the cornice above the second floor of the house.

Shortly afterwards the plaintiff company placed the sign with the words "Silver Grill" in large letters in the position mentioned. It thus covered the outer wall of the rooms let to the defendants to a height of two feet and a-half. The defendants objected to this being done, and subsequently requested its removal, but no notice was taken of their objection. They therefore had the sign removed in the night, and placed signs of their own in its place.

Thereupon the plaintiffs brought this action for an injunction against the defendants removing or interfering with the plaintiffs' signs on any part of the front wall, except a signboard over, and show cases about, the doorway.

Eve, Q.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the plaintiffs.—A demise of rooms only carries the space between the walls and the reasonable use of the inside walls: Underwood v. Burrows, 7 Car. & P. 26, 29. It does not include the outer walls or the external fabric of the house, which remains in the landlord: Doe d. Freeland v. Burt, 1 T. R. 701. [BYRNE, J., referred to Shep. Touch., 206, as showing that a feoffment may be made of an upper chamber.] If the outer walls were included in such a demise the tenant might enlarge the windows, subject to restoring them at the end of the tenancy. [BYRNE, J.—Could it be said that a tenant might not place flower pots outside his window?] It is said that we have derogated from our grant, but that is not so. Derogation from a grant is equivalent to a breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment, the true rule as to which is laid down by Fry, L.J., in Sanderson v. Mayor of Berwick-upon-Tweed, 33 W. R. 67, 68, 13 Q. B. D. 547, 551, approved in Robinson v. Kilvert, 37 W. R. 545, 547, 41 Ch. D. 88, 96. If the plaintiffs have prevented the rooms being used as a photographic studio, they have derogated, but not otherwise: Aldin v. Latimer, Clark, & Co., 42 W. R. 553, 554, [1894] 2 Ch. 437, 444.

Mulligan, Q.C., and C. Gurdon, for the defendants, cited the American case of Riddle v. Littlefield, 16 Amer. Rep. 388, the headnote of which is: "The owner of a building leased a 'store' therein. Held, that the lessee had the right to the use and occupation of the outer walls belonging to that portion of the tenement, including the store, for the purpose of posting bills and notices thereon."

BYRNE, J.—The premises let to the defendants, with the exception of the room on the second floor, constitute a little dwelling by itself. It is said that the demise did not include the outer walls of the top story of the house. I think that it did include them so far as they were solely appropriate to the rooms let. No question arises as to whether the use made of the outer walls by the defendants was a reasonable one, for that is admitted. If, then, the defendants had a right to use the outer walls at all, they had a right to use them in the way they have done. I think that they had that right, and that the signboard put up by the plaintiffs was in derogation of that right. I also find that the plaintiff Todd, at the time of the letting, represented that the defendants should have all reasonable facilities for putting up signboards and advertisements, and that the action of the plaintiffs prevented them having these facilities.

GALLAGHER v. RUDD AND OTHERS. (a.)

Licensing Acts—Theatre—Selling intoxicating liquors after closing hour—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94). s. 72—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), ss. 3, 9, 16.

The appellant was convicted at quarter sessions of having sold intoxicating liquors at the bar of his theatre after the performance had ended and after closing hour for ordinary licensed premises in that borough.

Held, that section 72 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which provides that nothing in the Act "shall affect or apply to the sale of intoxicating liquors by proprietors of theatres in pursuance of the Act in that behalf," did not affect the question of closing hours, and that the conviction under section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1874, was therefore right.

This was an appeal by way of case stated from the decision of the quarter sessions of the county of Durham, affirming the conviction by the justices of the borough of Stockton-on-Tees.

The following were the facts: The appellant, Gallagher, was the manager of the Theatre Royal, Stockton, and on the 2nd of September, 1896, he was granted a licence to keep open the theatre for the public performance of stage plays pursuant to the Theatres Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 68). By that licence the theatre was to be closed every Saturday night at half-past eleven.

On the 11th of October, 1896, the appellant was granted a theatre Excise licence under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 39 and 43 & 44 Vict. c. 20, to sell intoxicating liquors by retail in the theatre.

On the evening of Saturday, the 23rd of January, 1897, the performance at the theatre concluded at 10.55 p.m., but the appellant kept one of the bars open until 11.20 p.m., at which time two police officers entered the theatre by a door at the back—the public entrance being closed—and found between thirty and forty people in the bar behind the dress circle. All the people who were in the bar at that time were either persons who were employed in the performance or had been bonâ fide attending the performance as spectators at the theatre that evening.

The appellant was convicted and fined in the nominal penalty of 3s. 6d. and costs.

The question for the opinion of the Divisional Court was whether that conviction was right, the borough of Stockton being a town within the meaning of the Licensing Act, 1874, and the appellant being convicted of an offence under section 9 of that Act.

Section 72 of the Licensing Act, 1872, enacts that "nothing in this Act shall affect or apply to (4) the sale of intoxicating liquor by proprietors of theatres in pursuance of the Act in that behalf."

By section 1 of the Licensing Act, 1874, that Act is to be construed as one Act with the principal Act of 1872, so far as is consistent with the respective tenors of such Acts.

By section 2 of the Act of 1874 all premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail shall be closed as follows: (2) If situated in a town or in a populous place as defined by the Act (a) on Saturday night from eleven o'clock.

R. Luck, for the appellant.—The exemption contained in section 72 of the Licensing Act, 1872, is an absolute exemption from the provisions of the various Licensing Acts which apply to the closing at a particular hour of public-houses in provincial towns. This theatre was duly licensed for the performance of stage plays up to 11.30 on any Saturday night, and up to that hour the public attending the performance can reasonably expect to be served with refreshments. If the performance should be continued until past eleven o'clock on any Saturday, then, unless this conviction is quashed, the proprietor of any duly-licensed provincial theatre must see that all the bars are closed on the strike of the clock although the performance is going on. If the public were admitted after 11 p.m. to a theatre merely for the sake of getting "a drink," the matter might be altogether different, but no such question arises in the present case.

R. I. Simey, for the informant.—I submit that licensed theatres come within the provisions applicable to ordinary public-houses in the same district. The closing hour at Stockton was eleven p.m., and the sale of intoxicating liquor at the bar of the theatre was continued after that hour. The conviction in the case ought to stand.

KENNEDY, J.—I have been asked by my brother Wright, J., to deliver my opinion on this appeal first. I think the decision of the justices was correct, and the conviction must stand. I have come to that conclusion because I think that the true effect of the exemption to theatre proprietors, to whom licences to sell intoxicating liquors at the bars of these place of amusement have been granted—the exemption contained in sub-section 4 of section 72 of the Licensing Act, 1872—is not one which alters, extends, or otherwise affects the ordinary closing hour in a particular district. It is an exemption in their favour to this extent only, that theatre proprietors holding such licences are not bound to go to the justices for a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquor. The exemption is certainly not an absolute exemption from the various other provisions relating to the sale of intoxicating drinks. These places of amusement, when they have a licence, come within the provisions of the Licensing Acts applicable to ordinary public-houses, and the licensees can claim any exemptions which on particular occasions could be obtained by an ordinary publican. There is, no doubt, a good deal to be said on both sides, but I fail to see any balance of general convenience or any reason founded on public policy in favour of a view contrary to the one I have already expressed.

The question of the closing hour is not expressly dealt with under a licence to sell intoxicating liquors granted to a theatrical proprietor, who can therefore sell liquors so long as he does not contravene any express enactment in the Licensing Acts and escapes any objection which may be raised to the way he conducts his business by the justices of the particular district. If this conviction were quashed it might be used as a precedent by other theatre proprietors to keep these places of amusement open after closing hours, where, for a time at any rate, liquor could be supplied to persons who chose to go there solely for the purpose of getting "a drink," and evading those provisions of the Licensing Acts which would be in force against publicans in the same district. It is worth noticing that there are similar limitations with regard to the sale of liquor on packet boats and at canteens, and that those licences are also granted for the sale of intoxicating liquors on special occasions, "but subject and pursuant to the provisions in the Act in that behalf enacted."

For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed.

WRIGHT, J.—There seem to me to be very great difficulties in deciding this question. On the whole, having regard to the findings of the justices in the particular case before us, I think the view expressed by brother Kennedy is right, and I concur with him in thinking that this appeal must be dismissed.

Conviction affirmed.

"THE CLYMENE." (a)

Ship — Pilotage — London district — Vessel navigating within her own port not having passengers on board— Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 191, 192, 625—Distressed seamen not passengers.

The 625th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, provides (inter alia) that the following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall, without prejudice to any general exemption under this part of the Act, be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district (that is to say): "(5) Ships navigating within the limits of the port to which they belong."

The term "passengers" in this section does not include "distressed seamen" for whom a passage home has been required to be provided under the sections of the above Act relating to distressed seamen; and the master of a ship belonging to the port of London, when navigating within the limits of that port, and only carrying, in addition to himself, his officers, pilot, and crew, "distressed seamen" placed on board in accordance with the last-mentioned sections, is not bound by compulsion of law to employ a pilot.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the sailing barge Phœbe, against the steamship Clymene, of 895 tons, to recover for the damage sustained in a collision between The Phœbe and The Clymene in Galleons Reach in the River Thames, on the 26th of February last, when The Clymene was in charge of a duly licensed Trinity House pilot. The action was commenced in the City of London Court, and was transferred to this court by order on the 14th of April last.

The owners of The Clymene appeared to defend the action on the merits, and also raised the defence of compulsory pilotage; alleging in their defence that, at the time of the collision, The Clymene was carrying five passengers.

The action was heard on the 5th and 8th of July last, before Barnes, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

Evidence was given to the effect that, at the time of the collision, The Clymene was proceeding up Galleons Reach bound on a voyage from Leghorn and Genoa to London, and had on board her, in addition to her pilot, master, officers, and crew, no other persons other than five distressed seamen, to whom the master of The Clymene had been required to afford a passage home, under sections 190-93 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, by the British consuls at Leghorn and Genoa, and in respect of whose conveyance and maintenance the aggregate amount of three shillings a day for each distressed seaman was payable by the Board of Trade. These sections, so far as material to this report, are in terms as follows:

190.—The Board of Trade may make regulations with respect to the relief, maintenance, and sending home of seamen and apprentices found in distress abroad; and may, by those regulations (in this Act referred to as the Distressed Seamen Regulations), make such conditions as they think fit with regard to that relief, maintenance, and sending home. . . .

191.—(1) The following authorities—that is to say . . . British consular officers . . . may, in accordance with and on the conditions prescribed by the Distressed Seamen Regulations, provide for the maintenance until a passage home can be procured of the following seamen and apprentices (who are in this Act included in the term distressed seamen)—namely, (a) Seamen and apprentices to the sea-service, whether subjects of Her Majesty or not, who, by reason of having been discharged or left behind abroad or shipwrecked from any British ship or any of Her Majesty's ships, are in distress in any place abroad; and (b) Seamen and apprentices to the sea-service, being subjects of Her Majesty, who have been engaged by any person, acting either as principal or agent, to serve in a ship belonging to the Government or to a subject or citizen of a foreign country, and are in distress in any place abroad.

(2) For the purpose of providing a distressed seaman with a passage home, the authority shall put him on board a British ship, bound either to the United Kingdom or to the British possession to which the seaman belongs (as the case requires), which is in want of men to make up its complement; or, if there is no such ship, then the authority shall provide the seaman with a passage home as soon as possible in any ship, British or foreign, bound as aforesaid.

(3) The authority shall endorse on the agreement with the crew of the ship if a British ship, on board of which a distressed seamen is placed, the name of every person so placed on board. . . .

192.—(1) The master of every British ship so bound as aforesaid shall receive on board his ship, and afford a passage and maintenance to all distressed seamen whom he is required, under this Act, to take on board his ship, not exceeding one for every fifty tons burden; and shall, during the passage, provide every such distressed seaman with a proper berth or sleeping place, effectually protected against sea and weather.

(2) On the production of a certificate signed by the authority by whose directions any such distressed seaman was received on board . . . and a declaration made by the master before a justice of the peace, and verified by the Registrar-General of Shipping and Seamen . . . the master shall be entitled to be paid in respect of the maintenance and passage of every seaman and apprentice so conveyed, maintained, and provided for by him, exceeding the number of any wanted to make up the complement of his crew, such sum per diem as the Board of Trade allow.

(3) If any master of a British ship fails, without reasonable cause, to comply with this section in the case of any seaman or apprentice, he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds.

On the 8th of July, 1897, Barnes, J., found that the collision had been solely occasioned by the fault of the pilot in charge of The Clymene, and reserved the question of law—whether or not, on the facts given in evidence, such pilot was, by compulsion of law, acting in charge of The Clymene—to be separately argued by counsel.

July 9.—The reserved question of law was argued.

Sir Walter Phillimore and Butler Aspinall appeared for the plaintiffs.—They referred to section 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894,* and contended that under the provisions of that section The Clymene at the time and place of the collision was exempted from being compelled to employ a pilot, as she was not carrying passengers, but only five distressed seamen whom the master of The Clymene was forced, under a penalty, to take aboard his ship, and for whose conveyance nothing equivalent to fares has been paid.

Pyke, Q.C., and A. E. Nelson, for the defendants.—The distressed seamen on board The Clymene were passengers within the meaning of that term in section 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. They were on board her in addition to her complement, and it is inmaterial that the master of The Clymene was compelled to afford them a passage, or that the amount payable in respect of them by the Board of Trade was not as great as the defendants would have charged in the absence of the Board of Trade regulations as to distressed seamen.

BARNES, J.—I have already decided that the collision in this case was solely the fault of the pilot of the defendants' ship. The defendants, however, allege that that pilot was employed by compulsion of law, and that therefore they are not liable for the collision. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contend that the pilot was not on this occasion employed by compulsion of law, and that therefore the defendants are responsible for his acts. The whole question turns upon a very short point—namely, whether, upon the true construction of the pilotage clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, pilotage was compulsory upon The Clymene, the defendants' vessel, at the time and in the place where the collision occurred. Now, whether pilotage was compulsory simply depends in this case upon whether The Clymene was, at the time of the collision, carrying passengers or not, inasmuch as under the 622nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, "subject to any alterations to be made by the Trinity House, and to the exemptions under this part of this Act, pilotage shall be compulsory within the London district"; whilst by section 625 of the same Act a vessel navigating within the limits of the port to which she belongs is exempted from compulsory pilotage, when not carrying passengers. The facts of the case are that, at the time of the collision The Clymene had on board five distressed seamen, who had been placed on board her—one at Leghorn and four at Genoa—under the orders of the British consuls of those places respectively, made under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, as to distressed seamen (sections 190-193). These men were on board The Clymene at the time of the collision, and the question is whether they were "passengers" within the 625th section above mentioned. It is agreed that The Clymene was a ship belonging to the port of London, and was, at the time of the collision, navigating within the limits of that port; and therefore, if she was not carrying passengers, she comes within the exemption I have referred to as contained in the 625th section of the Act of 1894; whilst if she was carrying passengers, she was subject to compulsory pilotage, being outside the exemption in question. Now, I have stated the circumstances under which these five men were on board The Clymene, and I do not think it necessary to again refer at length to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, relating to distressed seamen—namely, sections 190, 191, 192, and 193. These sections speak for themselves, and impose upon the master of a British vessel, subject to restrictions as to number, the obligation to receive distressed seamen, as defined in the Act, on board his ship, and afford them a passage home and maintenance; such sum by way of payment being allowed to the master, on the arrival of the ship, as the Board of Trade sanctions. In this case the sum so paid was three shillings per day per man. Another section of the Act of 1894 to which I think it necessary to refer is section 237 (2). That section provides that every seafaring man whom the master of a ship is, under the authority of this Act, compelled to take on board and convey shall, so long as he remains in the ship, be deemed to belong to the ship, and be subject to the same rules and regulations for preserving discipline, and to the same fines and punishments for offences constituting or tending to a breach of discipline, as if he were a member of, and had signed the agreement with, the crew. There is no definition of the word "passenger" in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, except for the word when used in the third part of the Act—the part dealing with passenger and emigrant ships—and the expression "passenger" for that special purpose is, by section 267, to include "any person carried in a ship other than the master and crew, and the owner, his family and servants." It is obvious that this definition has no application to the special class of persons now under consideration, and it leaves the meaning of the term "passengers" in section 625 to be gathered from the ordinary interpretation of the word as applicable to the subject or occasion on which it is used. In my judgment, the use of the word in the 625th section is in the sense in which under ordinary circumstances persons are carried as passengers on board a ship, and involves the principle of an agreement to carry the passenger and the payment of a fare; and I am of opinion that these distressed seamen, whom the shipowner was compelled to take on board, and for whom he was paid what practically amounts to little more than maintenance, were not passengers within the meaning of section 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. It follows that it was not compulsory on The Clymene to be placed in charge of a pilot, and the owners of The Clymene cannot be held free from liability for the damage occasioned by the pilot's sole fault or default.

* Section 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act provides (inter alia) as follows: "The following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall, without prejudice to any general exemption under this part of this Act, be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district and the Trinity House Outport district (that is to say) . . . (5) Ships navigating within the limits of the port to which they belong."

KENT COUNTY COUNCIL v. LORD GERARD. (a.)

Highway—Extraordinary traffic—Person by whose order such traffic has been conducted—Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23.

The respondent contracted with several persons for the delivery to him at E. of various materials required for building and other operations, the price being payable by him on acceptance if according to sample, the price including free delivery at E. The respondent neither employed the persons who conveyed the goods there, nor did he pay them for such conveyance. The surveyor found, in pursuance of the provisions of section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, "that extraordinary expenses had been incurred by reason of excessive weight passing along the highway or extraordinary traffic thereon."

Held, that the respondent was not the person, within the meaning of section 23, by whose order such weight or traffic had been conducted along the highway, and he was therefore not liable for the extraordinary expenses in repairing the road thereby occasioned.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 45 W. R. 513, [1897] 1 Q. B. 351, affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Rigby, L.J.; Lopes, L.J., dissenting, reported 45 W. R. 531, [1897] 1 Q. B. 351) reversing a decision of the Divisional Court (Cave and Wills, JJ.).

The facts are stated in the report below, and also in the judgments of their lordships.

Asquith, Q.C., and R. M. Bray (Hohler with them), for the appellants.

They referred to Hill v. Thomas, 42 W. R. 85, [1893] 2 Q. B. 333. The judgment of Cave, J., which refers to all the cases, and particularly to Williams v. Davies, 44 J. P. 347. Lord Gerard intended that the trucks should be brought along this road: Lapthorn v. Harvey, 49 J. P. 709, is distinguishable.

Channell, Q.C., and G. Edwardes Jones, for the respondent, were not heard.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The only question that arises in this case is whether Lord Gerard was a person by whose orders certain extraordinary traffic had been conducted along a highway within the meaning of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878.

The facts are these: Lord Gerard was making considerable alterations on his estate in Eastwell Park, and in the dwelling-house which existed in that park. He entered into contracts with certain persons for the supply of materials. Under all those contracts the materials were to be supplied to him at a certain price at Eastwell Park. With the mode in which the materials were brought there he had nothing to do. The goods whilst they were being conveyed there were not his goods, and no property passed or could pass to him until delivery at Eastwell Park. Lord Gerard did not employ the persons who conveyed the goods there, and he did not pay them for such conveyance. What he did was to buy the goods which were brought to Eastwell Park, and to pay a certain price for them delivered at Eastwell Park.

The surveyor has found, in pursuance of the provisions of section 23 of the Act to which I have alluded, "that extraordinary expenses had been incurred by reason of excessive weight passing along the highway or extraordinary traffic thereon." The question then arises whether Lord Gerard is the person by whose order such weight or traffic had been conducted along the highway. There are various persons who might be mentioned connected with the conveyance of traffic along a highway about whom everybody would be agreed that traffic was conducted by their orders. I do not propose to define those persons. I do not propose even to give illustrations which will occur to every one of the persons to whom those words would apply, because I might be misunderstood as limiting the persons coming within the section to those whom I gave as an illustration; and as it would be impossible or inexpedient to give an exhaustive definition of the persons by whose orders the traffic would be conducted within the meaning of the section, I think it better not to attempt to give any definition at all. All your lordships have to consider is whether Lord Gerard was the person in the present instance by whose orders this traffic was conducted. It is contended on behalf of the appellants that he is that person, inasmuch as it is said that he ordered these goods which were to be delivered at Eastwell Park, and that order involved the necessity of bringing the goods to Eastwell Park, and therefore he was the person by whose order these goods were brought, and the traffic so conducted.

The word "order" is, of course, ambiguous in the sense in which it was used by counsel in the proposition to which I have just called attention. It is, no doubt, a word in frequent use with reference to the supply of goods by a tradesman, and even then it is used in different senses. If I give an order (as it is called) to a tradesmen for the supply of certain goods, I may have previously received a communication from that tradesman which will make my so-called "order" the completion of a contract, and will impose on him the obligation of supplying those goods. On the other hand, I may give an order (using as it is commonly used precisely the same word) to a tradesman for the supply of goods, and that order imposes no obligation on him at all; he is entitled, if he pleases, to do nothing upon it, because my order does not of itself create any contract until he has accepted it, and agrees to supply the goods I have ordered. Therefore the word "order" is frequently used with reference to ordering goods from tradesmen in a sense that cannot be called strictly legitimate, because it means an order which is no order; it imposes no obligation; there is no liability for disobedience to it, and no duty to obey it. But the argument on behalf of the appellants is this—that whenever a person orders goods from a tradesman in either of the senses to which I have referred (and I will assume in the present case that the order was given in the former sense, although I am not quite certain that it was so in every case), upon such an order being given to a tradesman, then, if that order involves the conduct of extraordinary traffic along a highway, the person who gave that order or direction to the tradesman is the person by whose order the traffic is conducted along the high road. I do not think that is the natural meaning to give the words of the section. It seems to me necessarily to go this length—that whenever I enter into a contract for the supply of goods, and the performance of that contract involves the carrying of an extraordinary weight by any person along any highway, that traffic is conducted by my order within the meaning of the section. I do not think it is possible to stop short of that. In the course of the argument the length to which such a proposition would carry one was pointed out. It seems to me that this would be altogether an unreasonable construction of the section, and I do not think it is a legitimate construction, having regard to the language used. I observe that the learned judges in the court below who have been in favour of the appellant's view have altered the words of the statute in describing the transaction. Cave, J., alters the word "by" into the word "at"—"at whose order." Lopes, L.J., for the word "by" substitutes "in consequence of." The simple answer is, That is not what the statute has said. The statute has said "by whose order the traffic was conducted"; and if the person sought to be charged has had nothing to do with the conduct of the traffic or the mode in which it is to be conducted, and has had no power to give orders in relation to it or in reference to it, then I think it is impossible to say that it was by his order that the traffic was conducted. That, really, is the short ground on which I decide this case.

It has been suggested that, if this construction be the correct one, there might be extraordinary traffic along a road induced by the act of a particular individual who is building a house, for example; and if that traffic were distributed amongst several people owing to the orders being given to several different people for the goods, then, notwithstanding that there was extraordinary traffic, there would be no person who could be rendered liable for the injury caused by that extraordinary traffic. That may be true. On the other hand, if the words "by whose order the traffic was conducted" were referred to the person who gave the orders for the goods, you might have a man in business conducting a large traffic distinctly under his orders along a highway, and the several persons for whom he was building houses, for example, having only ordered an amount of goods, the carriage of which would not lead to extraordinary traffic, they would be under no liability.

It was suggested that under the terms of this section both the person by whose order the traffic was conducted in the strict sense of the word would be liable, and also the person whose purchase of the goods led to the excessive traffic. I think there would be considerable difficulty in working out the rights of the parties upon such a construction of the section; but the objection which I take to it is this: In that case you would be interpreting the words "by whose order the traffic has been conducted" in two entirely different senses—one, as it seems to me, the proper and natural sense, the other a strained and unnatural sense. The truth is that the contention of the appellants amounts to this—that "by whose order the traffic has been conducted" must be interpreted as meaning "at whose instance" or "for whose benefit the traffic has been conducted." That might or might not have been expedient legislation; but, at any rate, to my mind that is not the legislation to be found in the enactment. I think it is quite possible that some of the cases which the Legislature would have desired to cover by an enactment of this description are not covered by the language used. That is not an unknown experience in legislation. Certain obvious cases occur, and are intended to be met; other cases which might seem to fall within the same principle are found not to be met, the language being limited to those which were in view at the time the enactment was drawn up.

It would not be legitimate, in my opinion, to strain the language used in order to make it apply to a case to which it does not legitimately in its terms apply, on account of the supposed intention of the Legislature, and the theory that that supposed intention can only be effectually carried out by giving to the words a meaning which they do not naturally bear.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be affirmed.

Lord WATSON.—The special case stated by the court of quarter sessions for the eastern division of the county of Kent submits for decision a single question of law arising upon the construction of section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878. I have had little difficulty in arriving, with the rest of your lordships, at the conclusion that the question ought to be answered in the affirmative.

It must be assumed as matter of fact that extraordinary expenses to the amount of £750 have been incurred by the appellants in the repair of the Faversham and Ashford main road from its junction with the London and Dover main road at Faversham to the lodge-gate entrance to Eastwell Park, in consequence of the damage caused by reason of excessive weight passing along the same and of extraordinary traffic thereon. The traffic in question, whether excessive in weight or extraordinary in the sense of its being beyond the ordinary requirements of the district, consisted of materials conveyed along the Faversham and Ashford main road, in locomotives or in wagons hauled by locomotive power, to Eastwell Park, where they were used in improvements executed upon his estate by the respondent, Lord Gerard. Section 23 enacts that the appellants may recover these extraordinary expenses in a summary manner "from any person by whose order such weight or traffic has been conducted."

The court of quarter sessions held that the respondent was not within the meaning of the statute a person by whose order the excessive weight or traffic which did damage to the road had been conducted. A Divisional Court, consisting of Cave and Wills, JJ., quashed the order of the quarter sessions and restored an order of the petty sessions, by which it had been adjudged that the respondent should pay to the appellants the said sum of £750 with costs. In the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls and Rigby, L.J. (Lopes, L.J., dissenting) reversed that judgment and affirmed the finding of the quarter sessions.

It now becomes necessary to notice those findings of fact in the special case which tend to explain the connection which the respondent had with the traffic which has given rise to the appellants' statutory claim. The substance of these findings admits of being shortly stated. The respondent contracted with several persons or firms for the delivery to him at Eastwell Park of the various materials required for his improvements, the price being payable by him on the acceptance of such materials as were according to sample, and including all claims of the sellers for carriage to their destination or otherwise. The property in these materials did not pass to the respondent until they were examined and delivery accepted at Eastwell Park, and he neither employed nor incurred any liability to the carriers by whom they were conveyed to that destination. The respondent was aware that it was the intention of the parties who had undertaken to supply the materials to forward them by the Faversham and Ashford main road; but it had not been expressly found, and it does not appear to me to be a matter of reasonable inference from any of the facts found, that the forwarding of the materials by that route was made a term of any contract for their supply, so that the respondent could have declined to accept them if they were sent from another place than Faversham or by a different route. On the other hand, I think it clearly appears that the respondent had no right to interfere either with the goods themselves or with the persons by whom they were conveyed along the road which is under the jurisdiction of the appellants.

The single point arising for decision in this appeal is whether, in these circumstances, the conveyance of the materials or their conduct along the appellants' road was ordered by the respondent within the meaning of section 23. The words of the clause must be construed according to their ordinary signification, unless the context of the statute is sufficient to show in the first place that some other meaning was intended, and in the second place what that other meaning was. Nor does it appear to me to be doubtful that, in cases where the order is not said to have been given by the owner who is forwarding the the goods, or by the person whom he has employed to carry them, but by the purchaser to whom the goods are to be delivered at the end of their transit, who, until they reach that point, has no interest in them, the latter cannot, in the ordinary sense of the words, be said to have ordered their conduct by a special route, unless he has interfered and given instructions to that effect which have been obeyed, or has made it part of his contract with the seller that the goods shall be forwarded by that route and no other. To construe the words otherwise would, in my opinion, be as unreasonable as to affirm that a person who ordered goods of a tradesman for acceptance on delivery had also given orders as to the route by which they were to be sent, if he happened to know the road to his house which must be used or was invariably used by the tradesman's carts. Lopes, L.J., who formed the minority of the Appeal Court, appears to have arrived at a different result from his brethren of the majority, by reading the word "order" as it occurs in section 23 as signifying not an order given with respect to the conveyance of goods either to a contractor for their supply or to his carrier, but the initial order given to the contractor which led to his sending the goods and employing a servant or carrier to convey them. The Legislature is no doubt competent to enact such a provision, but it would be a novel rule to make a person who has contracted to purchase goods, if they are found according to sample, responsible for all orders given with respect to the conveyance of the goods before they are delivered to him, if he happened to be aware that these orders would be given. With such matters the purchaser has really no concern. I am by no means satisfied that an enactment imposing liability upon the originator of the work for orders given by persons independent of him in relation to the carriage of materials which they had undertaken to deliver would be to the advantage of the road authority. One contractor for building materials or their carriage may be employed by fifty or a hundred different persons, and if he has actually ordered the transport by a particular road he will be liable for all the damage done to it, if excessive in the sense of the Act. But if the liability rested on his employers, each and all of them might escape on the ground that the amount of his carriages were not per se excessive or productive of damage.

But I entertain a strong objection to any canon of construction which introduces by implication into a statutory clause qualifying expressions which are not there, and alters the plain meaning of words which are to be found in it. I may add that, in my opinion, the intention of the Legislature must be inferred from the language which it has used; and that whilst I have been unable to discover for myself, the appellants' counsel did not attempt to direct my attention to any context which gives a colour to the interpretation suggested by Lopes, L.J.

I therefore concur in the motion that the order of the Court of Appeal be affirmed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

In regard to the facts of the case I think it only necessary to say that it appears from the special cases stated by the justices, that Lord Gerard, in making his arrangements for the building of an addition to his house, stipulated with every one with whom he dealt that the materials which were to be brought to that house and ground should be purchased, and were purchased, at a price inclusive of delivery. In no case did Lord Gerard himself, by his servants, conduct any traffic upon the road in question, nor did he by hiring wagons or engines to go along the road by himself use the road in any way. Nevertheless, it is said that by virtue of the provision in section 23 of this statute he is responsible for the result to the road of the extraordinary traffic that passed over it.

I think with your lordships that there is nothing in the language of this statute which would warrant imposing liability in such circumstances. It is a condition of liability resting upon any one that the surveyor shall issue his certificate to the effect that "extraordinary expenses have been incurred" in repairing the highway "by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same or extraordinary traffic thereon." The question here is—if such a certificate is issued, on whom does the liability rest? It is at once to be observed, I think, that the clause which follows does not say that the liability shall rest upon him who has caused the extraordinary traffic to be there. It is not that the liability shall rest upon him at whose instance or for whose benefit that traffic has been initiated. It is not even as Lopes, L.J., read it, for the purpose of giving a ground for his judgment, that there should be liability upon the person in consequence of whose orders the traffic has been carried on. The words used in the statute are these—that the expenses shall be recovered "from any person by whose order such weight or traffic has been conducted." One would naturally expect to find in a provision of this kind that the person who really used the road and did conduct the traffic would be responsible for the result, and for my part, I read the statute as meaning that and nothing less or more. A large contractor or other person with a number of vans and road engines which are in use does not work those vans or engines himself—he gives orders to the persons who are in his employment to work them. The words of the statute seem to me to fit that very case. The additional expense rendered necessary for the repair is to be recovered "from any person by whose order such weight or traffic has been conducted." That appears to me to strike at or to apply to the master having himself ordered his servants to conduct the traffic upon the road, and to no one else. So far as I can see there is no recondite or secondary meaning to be attached to the words "by whose order." I agree with my noble friend Lord Watson that those words must be taken in their ordinary and natural signification; and taking them so, I think they lead to the result I have now stated. I think one cannot fairly interpret the words "by whose orders" by referring them to someone who has made a contract which leads somebody else to give an order to conduct the traffic on that road—namely, the contractors with whom he was engaged, or the persons who in fact conducted that traffic.

Upon these grounds, I am of opinion that the interpretation which was put upon this clause by the Divisional Court, and which had some sanction in one of the previous cases, is not sound, and I agree entirely in the view which has been taken by the Court of Appeal, that the interpretation of the statute is that which I have endeavoured to explain.

It was argued that Lord Gerard was aware that the materials must come by this road in the fulfilment of these contracts. Indeed, it was suggested that the contracts might be read as if he had so stipulated I agree with my noble and learned friends who have spoken, that the facts do not warrant any such observation. It was no term of the contract with Lord Gerard that the materials should come by that road, and for my own part I am not prepared to say, even if there had been in the contract with Lord Gerard a stipulation that these materials should be brought by that road, that would be in a sense within the meaning of the statute a bringing of the traffic by his order along the road, for I think that the person who conducts the traffic or gives his orders to his servants to conduct it, is the person who is liable under the statute.

Again, it was said that if this reading of the statute were adopted, as it must now be, mischief would result which was not anticipated. It was said that there would be a great deal of traffic which would wear down the roads, and for which there would be no means of recovering the cost of the repair. For my own part I can scarcely see that that evil will occur, or, if it does, it appears to me that it must be in a very limited degree. If there be any extensive work going on for which a road of this kind is used, and several contractors are using it each to a certain extent, and the surveyor gives his certificate that there has been extraordinary traffic, but it appears that two or three different persons have contributed to a material extent to the injury of that road, I, for my part, can see no reason why an action should not lie against each of those persons; and therefore the hardship suggested in this supposed case does not appear to me to have any substance in it.

For these reasons I concur in thinking that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Lord DAVEY.—I cannot doubt that the judgment of the Court of Appeal in this case ought to be affirmed.

The question is, "By whose order" was the traffic conducted? I am of opinion that primâ facie the traffic was being conducted by order of the person to whom the goods at the time being belonged, at whose risk and under whose control those goods were being carried, and not the less so because the goods were being carried by the merchant in pursuance and in performance of a contract of sale and delivery to a purchaser at another place. In such a case the goods when on their way to a place of delivery are at the risk and under the control of the vendor, and I do not think, in the ordinary use of language, the traffic can be said to be conducted by the order of the purchaser, though no doubt the goods are being so carried in consequence of his order.

It appears to me that Lopes, L.J., in his dissenting judgment, puts very clearly the points upon which I venture to differ from him. He says, in the course of his judgment: "Is it to be said, if I order a truck of coals from a coal merchant, and his wagons, owing to the excessive weight of the coals, do damage, that the damage is to be attributed to the order given to his carter by the coal merchant, and not to my order, which is the effective cause of any action being taken by anybody? With great deference to the Lord Justice, I answer that question, "Yes, it is so to be said if the test of liability is to be by whose order the traffic is being conducted." The Lord Justice subsequently says: "I read 'by whose order' as if it was 'in consequence of whose order.'" I do not think that that is a legitimate change of the words used in the Act, and I do not think that Lush, J., and Bowen, J., as he then was, in the case which has been referred to—Williams v. Davies—so read the Act. At any rate, I think it is a wrong reading of the Act, and therefore I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

BOULTER v. JUSTICES OF KENT AND OTHERS. (a.)

Licensing Acts—Licence—Refusal to renew—Appeal to quarter sessions—Costs—Non-appearance of objector—Jurisdiction to give costs against objector—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), ss. 31, 50—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 27—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 43), s. 7—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 13.

Justices at a licensing meeting are not a court of summary jurisdiction, and therefore section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, does not apply to an appeal from them to quarter sessions; that court has no jurisdiction to order an objector to the renewal of a licence to pay the costs of the appeal.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 45 W. R. 4, [1896] 2 Q. B. 306, reversed.

Reg. v. Justices of Glamorganshire, 40 W. R. 436, [1892] 1 Q. B. 621, overruled.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.), 45 W. R. 4, [1896] 2 Q. B., 306, affirming a decision of the Queen's Bench Division discharging a rule nisi for a certiorari, 44 W. R. 603, [1896] 2 Q. B. 1.

The appellant Boulter, in August, 1895, served upon the holder of a public-house licence written notice of his intention to oppose the renewal of the licence at the general annual licensing meeting. The appellant appeared and opposed the renewal, which was refused. The licensee of the house appealed to the quarter sessions, and notices of appeal were duly served upon the objector and upon the clerk to the justices. Neither the appellant nor the licensing justices appeared upon the appeal, and the court of quarter sessions renewed the licence and ordered the appellant to pay the costs of the appeal. The appellant thereupon obtained in the Queen's Bench Division a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up for the purpose of being quashed that part of the order which ordered the appellant to pay the costs of the appeal, but the rule was subsequently discharged by the Queen's Bench Division, and the decision of the Queen's Bench Division was affirmed, with costs, by the Court of Appeal.

Asquith, Q.C., and Horace Avory (Blaiklock with them), for the appellant.—This was not a matter within the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. Any one of the public or even a justice may be an objector: Licensing Act, 1872, s. 42, sub-section 2. It is only in the case of new licences that provision is made for the payment of costs by an objector. By the Alehouse Act, 1828, s. 27, it is only a person who thinks himself "aggrieved" that can appeal. There is no "conviction or order" within section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49).

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and H. F. Dickens, Q.C. (A. H. Bodkin with them), for the respondents.—The definition of a "court of summary jurisdiction" has been expanded in 1884 and affirmed in 1889. It was made as comprehensive as possible. Reg. v. Glamorganshire Justices covers this case. The objector here initiates the litigation.

[Lord DAVEY.—You have got to show that it was an order made in pursuance of the Summary Jurisdiction Act. You come under the Licensing Act.]

Horace Avory replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—This case may be compendiously stated as raising the question whether justices at a licensing meeting are a court of summary jurisdiction, and I am of opinion they are not. I do not think they are a court at all. The whole licensing system has been conducted under a a code of its own, and the Act of 1828 has provided a variety of provisions, and has constituted a form of procedure which does not appear to me primarily to come under the description of a court. It is true that justices are selected as the persons who are to exercise the jurisdiction, whatever that jurisdiction is; and, indeed, the Act of 1828 appears to have been thought by its authors to require an interpretation clause of its own, as it says, "to remove doubts as to the meaning of certain words in the Act." Among other things, it was enacted that the word "justice" should be deemed to mean a justice of the peace. I think in the whole course of legislation the distinction between a court and something which is not a court has been preserved. In section 4 of that Act the words used are "licensing meeting." By section 9, "when at any of the meetings aforesaid any question touching the granting, withholding, or transferring of a licence shall arise, such question shall be determined by a majority of the justices who shall be present when such question shall arise, and every licence granted under the authority of the Act is to be signed by the majority of the justices present when such licence shall be granted." It will be observed, not an order of court, but merely the signature of the majority of justices. Section 21 draws a remarkable distinction between the licensing justices acting in their capacity as a licensing authority and persons acting as a court. A person charged with offences against the licensing laws can be summoned to the general annual licensing meeting to answer the charge. The justices at the general annual licensing meeting may bind the person to answer the charge, and others to give evidence upon the charge. But in certain events an offender is required to be tried by a court of quarter sessions. The difference between the procedure of a court and of the licensing meeting is not merely one of nomenclature. Where justices are acting as a court of any sort they must proceed according to the regular rules which are applicable to all courts of justice; but in respect of an application for a licence or its refusal they may, and constantly do, receive representations not on oath. Their meetings must be public, it is true; but Lord Kenyon, who in 1790—Rex. v. Downs, 3 T. R. 560—held a licence bad because it was granted at a private meeting, did not rely upon the general principle that all courts of justice must be open, but upon the ground that the statute directed it, and added that the construction of the then statute law was advantageous to the public, because "it is of importance to the public that licences of this sort should be granted openly, and not by stealth, in order that they may have an opportunity of objecting to the granting of the licences to particular persons on the ground of unfitness." And Mr. Justice Ashhurst says: "Though, perhaps, it was not necessary that such magistrates should be limited to the time mentioned in the Act for granting licences, yet, as the public are so much interested in the subject, the Legislatnre thought it proper to include all places in the general provisions of the Act, so that in no place whatever can the justices grant a licence but at a public meeting." The Acts referred to by the learned judges were repealed by the Act of 1828. But a careful distinction appears to me to always have been preserved between the same bodies acting as a court and deciding questions of licensing at a licensing meeting of the justices. If the Licensing Acts are to be looked to, it cannot be doubted that the order made in this case, condemning a person in costs because he had opposed a licence at a licensing meeting and given notice of his intention to do so, cannot be supported.

But the question, in truth, turns upon whether the meeting which I have described as a meeting of the licensing justices was a court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. It appears to me that the Act of 1879 certainly never contemplated bringing within its provisions a meeting of justices under the licensing laws. A court of summary jurisdiction must, of course, be a court, and the words "summary jurisdiction" appear to me to refer to a procedure primarily, at all events, criminal, wherein the court does not proceed on the finding of a grand jury or information by the Attorney-General, but has the power to deal with an offence without those provisions which the original constitution of this country enforced as a security for the subject against criminal procedure. I think no difficulty could have arisen but for the language of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1884, which enacts that the previous definition of a court of summary jurisdiction was to include "such justice, justices, or magistrate as therein mentioned, whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his or their commission, or by the common law." At first sight it would seem that these words would include everybody who is a justice of the peace "doing any act whatever which by law he was entitled to do" in the definition of a court of summary jurisdiction. But it is to be remembered that the definition of a court of summary jurisdiction was "any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrate, by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by or who is or are authorized to act under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of such Acts." The amended definition of the Act of 1884 must surely be read by the light of that which it is intended expressly by the later Act to explain, and no one could seriously contend that it would have been doubtful before the Act of 1884 whether a licensing meeting was included in the definition as it then stood. The amendment is obviously pointed to the doubt whether, where by some Acts a particular proceeding is authorized, a summary court is made the ultimate tribunal. Whether the definition of 1879 was not too narrow when it limited the definition to magistrates who are authorized to act under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or any of such Acts, undoubtedly jurisdiction was given to determine certain judicial cases, but the Acts could not have been properly described, in name or in substance, Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

But if I am right in the distinction I have drawn between a magistrate meeting for licensing purposes, and courts, although consisting of the same persons, it would be the height of absurdity to suppose that the Legislature intended to include in the definition, and to make applicable to that definition, persons who were in fact justices of the peace, but who in the particular matter here referred to—namely, "licensing"—were not occupying the position of judges at all, but were exercising the discretionary jurisdiction as to how many public-houses they would permit in a district, or what persons should carry them on. The distinction I am insisting on is only consistent with the language of the Summary Jurisdiction Act itself. Speaking of the appeal, the appeal is to be "against a conviction or order," words perfectly familiar to every person acquainted with the procedure of the courts in question, wholly inapplicable, as it appears to me, to the decision of justices at a licensing meeting. If the appeal still exists under the Act of 1828, as I think it does, the appeal must be conducted under the provisions of that statute.

I am aware that this view is in conflict with the decision, but I am not able to concur in the decision arrived at, in Reg. v. Glamorganshire Justices. It seems to me that neither popularly nor technically would a licensing meeting be a court of summary jurisdiction. To the lawyer as well as to the layman it would be an astonishing thing if at a licensing meeting the magistrates should proceed to hear and try a case, for example, in which a person was to be committed for trial, though if they are a court of summary jurisdiction they could enter on such an investigation. It would be said the whole proceedings of such a meeting are inapplicable to such a condition of things. Quite true. But the inapplicability of such a condition of things is to my mind ground for the conclusion at which I have arrived, that a licensing meeting never could have been intended to be included in the phrase "court of summary jurisdiction." It is what it purports to be, a licensing meeting; and inasmuch as the whole jurisdiction to make the order now under debate depends upon the supposed authority given to it as a court of summary jurisdiction, and as I am of opinion that it does not fill that character, the order is clearly bad. I am therefore of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and that the respondents do pay to the appellant his costs both here and below.

Lord WATSON.—I am of the same opinion with the Lord Chancellor, and I agree in the judgment which he has proposed.

I have had an opportunity of considering carefully the judgment which has been prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Herschell, and I think it sufficient to say that I entirely concur both in the conclusions of the noble and learned lord and in the reasons which he has assigned for them.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The appellant in this case served upon the licensee of a public-house called the Duke of Cambridge a notice of objection to the renewal of his licence, stating as the ground of objection that the licence was not needed to supply the legitimate wants of the neighbourhood.

At the licensing sessions held at Dover on the 26th of August, 1895, the appellant appeared and opposed the granting by way of renewal of the licence. The licensing justices refused to grant the licence. Thereupon the tenant of the public-house, and his lessors, served notices upon the licensing justices and their clerk, and upon the appellant, of their intention to appeal to the court of quarter sessions against the decision of the licensing justices.

At the court of quarter sessions neither the appellant nor the licensing justices appeared to support the decision of the justices. The court of quarter sessions granted a licence in respect of the Duke of Cambridge public-house, and ordered the present appellant to pay the costs of the appeal, amounting to £73 1s. 8d. The question to be determined is whether they had jurisdiction to make this order for the payment of costs, and this again raises the question whether the appeal was made under and was regulated by the provisions of section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

There is no doubt that prior to that year appeals from the refusal to grant a licence by way of renewal were regulated by the Alehouse Act, 1828. By section 27 of that Act any person thinking himself aggrieved by "any act of any justice, done in or concerning the execution of the Act, may appeal against such act" to the next quarter sessions, provided he gives "to such justice" notice in writing of his intention to appeal within five days after the act shall have been done. It is clear that under the Act of 1828 the court of quarter sessions had no power to make an order for the payment of costs against a person who had opposed the grant of a licence at the licensing meeting.

It is contended, however, that the proceedings on an appeal to quarter sessions against the refusal to grant a licence by way of renewal are now regulated by section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. If this be so, the jurisdiction of the court to award costs is beyond question. It is conceded that the licensing justices are not, by virtue of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, standing alone, made a court of summary jurisdiction. The definition of a court of summary jurisdiction in section 50 of that Act is "Any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrate, by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is or are authorized to act under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or any of such Acts." But the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1884, by section 7, after reciting section 50 of the prior Act, and that doubts had arisen whether the section extended to justices acting under some Act other than the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, enacted as follows: "It is hereby declared that the above-recited definition of court of summary jurisdiction in section 50 . . . includes such justice, justices, or magistrate as therein mentioned, whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his or their commission, or by the common law." This section was repealed by, but is practically re-enacted in, the Interpretation Act, 1889.

It is said that the effect of the provision contained in the Act of 1884 was to make the licensing justices a court of summary jurisdiction. I quite agree that if the words are to be read without any restriction being imposed upon them by reason of the subject-matter of the legislation of which they form part, they apply to every justice when acting as such, and therefore to the licensing justices. I will, for the present, assume that this is their effect, though I shall have something to say on the point hereafter.

It is said, next, that the licensing justices being a court of summary jurisdiction, an appeal from them to quarter sessions is regulated by and is subject to the provisions of section 31 of the Act of 1879. This was held to be the law by the Court of Appeal in the case of Reg. v. Glamorganshire Justices, and again in the present case. The question arose in the former case in this way: The appellant had given notice of his intention to appeal to the clerk and to some only of the licensing justices, which would not be sufficient under the Act of 1828, whereas a notice to the clerk alone was sufficient if the Act of 1879 applied. The Court of Appeal held, affirming the Queen's Bench Division, that the notice was sufficient.

It is remarkable that neither in the judgments in Reg. v. Glamorganshire Justices, nor in those delivered in the present case, is any reference made to the introductory language of section 31 of the Act of 1879, which limits the operation of that section to persons entitled to appeal from the "conviction or order" of a court of summary jurisdiction. It seems to have been assumed by the learned judges that if the licensing justices were a court of summary jurisdiction, it necessarily followed that all appeals from these decisions came within the terms of and were regulated by the provisions of section 31. I do not think this is so.

An applicant to whom a licence is refused has undoubtedly by the Act of 1828 a right to appeal, for that statute confers on him a right to appeal from "any act" of the licensing justices. But can it be said that he is thereby authorized to appeal from a "conviction or order"? The appeal authorized is certainly not one from a "conviction"; is it an appeal from an "order"? Even if I had to construe the language of the introductory part of section 31 alone, without the light thrown upon it by the subsequent provisions, my answer must be in the negative.

Section 31 forms part of an Act to amend the law relating to the summary jurisdiction of magistrates. What is meant by the summary jurisdiction of magistrates is, of course, perfectly well understood by every lawyer, and in relation to that jurisdiction the words "conviction" and "order" have a well-defined meaning. The conviction follows on an information; the order on a complaint. When the licensing justices grant an application for a licence they sign a certificate by means of which the licence is obtained. But where they refuse the application they make no order at all. They simply do not grant the licence applied for. An order is never drawn up, and to speak of the act of the justices in not granting a licence as an order would be, I think, a misuse of the term. When the other provisions of section 31 are examined the matter becomes even clearer. The first sub-section prescribes that the appeal must be made to the next quarter sessions holden not less than fifteen days "after the day on which the decision was given upon which the conviction or order was founded," thus showing that the words "conviction or order" are not even used as meaning the decision that a conviction shall take place or an order be made, but refer to the conviction and order themselves, in their technical sense. The refusal to grant a licence may be regarded as a decision of the licensing justices, but what is the "order" founded thereon? Sub-section 6, to my mind, puts the matter beyond doubt. No allusion was made in any of the judgments either to this sub-section or to that from which I have just quoted. Sub-section 6 requires that whenever a decision is not confirmed by the Court of Appeal, the clerk of the peace "shall endorse on the conviction or order appealed against a memorandum of the decision of the Court of Appeal." It is to be observed that the sub-section imposes the duty in all cases—the word is "whenever." How is it possible for this duty to be performed in cases like that under consideration, where no order is ever in existence?

That the word "order" is used in its technical sense and not in a loose fashion to cover every decision of magistrates, is shown by another provision to be found in the Act. Section 33 enacts that any person aggrieved who desires to question "a conviction, order, determination, or other proceeding" of a court of summary jurisdiction, on the ground that it is erroneous in point of law, may require a case to be stated. The words "determination or other proceeding" are here added, indicating that every determination of justices was not regarded as comprised in the word "order."

I have not yet referred to sub-section 2 of section 31, which was much discussed in the argument at the bar. That sub-section prescribes that the appellant shall give notice of appeal to "the other party." There is no difficulty in applying this provision in cases where magistrates exercise summary jurisdiction as commonly understood. Where proceedings are taken by way of information or complaint which end or may end in a conviction or order, there are always two parties—the person initiating the proceedings and the person against whom the proceedings are taken. It has been held that, where the appeal is against the refusal to grant a licence, a person who has objected to the grant of the licence before the licensing justices is "the other party" within the meaning of section 31. No doubt, if it be assumed that the section includes such a case, the words "the other party" could not very well apply to anyone else. But, to me, the provision for notice to the other party is an additional reason for thinking section 31 inapplicable to appeals against the refusal of justices to grant a licence. Persons objecting to the grant of a licence are not, I think, parties to the proceedings on the application in any proper sense of the term. The question is not one inter partes at all. The justices have an absolute discretion to determine, in the interest of the public, whether a licence ought to be granted, and every member of the public may object to the grant on public grounds, apart from any individual right or interest of his own. The applicant seeks a privilege. A member of the public who objects merely informs the mind of the court to enable it rightly to exercise its discretion whether to grant that privilege or not. A decision that a licence should not be granted is a decision that it would not be for the public benefit to grant it. It is not a decision that the objector has a right to have it refused. It is not, properly speaking, a determination in his favour. It is, I think, a fallacy to treat the refusal as necessarily induced by a particular objector. Every member of the local community might object. Would they all then become "the other party"? There is, in truth, no lis, no controversy inter partes, and no decision in favour of one of them and against the other, unless, indeed, the entire public are regarded as the other party; for if a licence be refused on the ground that it was not needed to supply the legitimate wants of the neighbourhood, the decision is really in favour of the public at large. The provision contained in sub-section 2 seems then to me an additional reason for holding that an appeal from the "act" of the justices in refusing a licence is not an appeal from a "conviction or order" of a court of summary jurisdiction.

I see no inconvenience in such a conclusion; quite the reverse. It is said that the object of section 31 was to introduce uniformity of procedure in appeals to quarter sessions. A laudable object, and calculated to be useful when applied to a class of cases similar in their character. But there does not appear to me to be any reason for straining the language of section 31 so as to make it embrace a very different class of cases provided for by special legislation. That legislation has never been expressly repealed, and I do not think it has been repealed by necessary implication, for an enactment which regulates appeals against a "conviction or order" of a court of summary jurisdiction does not, in my opinion, conflict with an enactment which prescribes the method and conditions of an appeal against "any act" of the licensing justices.

The Court of Appeal arrived at the conclusion they did in the Glamorganshire case and in the present case because they felt bound to attribute to the words of the definition clause their natural meaning. I have been guided by the same principle in interpreting the language of section 31 of the Act of 1879, which seems to me to have been somewhat lost sight of.

Although the views I have expressed involve the decision that Reg. v. Glamorganshire Justices was wrongly decided, they do not necessarily conflict with the judgment in the case of Reg. v. Pontypool Justices, 40 W. R. 436, [1892] 1 Q. B. 621, in which it was held that the licensing justices were bound under section 33 of the Act of 1879 to state a case for the opinion of the court. That section, as I have already pointed out, entitles an aggrieved party who desires to question any "determination" of a court of summary jurisdiction as erroneous in point of law, to have a case stated. And a decision not to grant a licence is undoubtedly a "determination" of such court if the licensing justices are a court of summary jurisdiction. Though it is not necessary to decide the point, I feel bound to say that, as at present advised, I am not satisfied that the conclusion arrived at on this point in the courts below is a sound one. Looking at the scope of the Act of 1879, at the fact that section 7 of the Act of 1884 purports to be declaratory and not enacting, and that it is difficult to suppose that it was intended to enact that every justice when doing any act under any authority which he possesses is a court of summary jurisdiction, my present impression is that the enactments defining a court of summary jurisdiction may well be construed as meaning no more than this—that every justice is a court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Act of 1879, or any other law relating to summary jurisdiction, in all matters pertaining to the exercise of summary jurisdiction by magistrates, however he may have derived his authority to exercise that jurisdiction.

I think the judgment should be reversed, and the appeal allowed with costs here and below.

Lord SHAND.—I also am of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and I have nothing to add to the grounds of judgment which have been already stated by my noble and learned friends, in which grounds of judgment I entirely concur.

Lord DAVEY.—In this case the Court of Appeal, in deciding adversely to the present appellant, have followed a previous decision of their own in Reg. v. Glamorganshire Justices. The question in the earlier case was whether a notice of appeal against a refusal to renew a licence which had been served in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, but did not comply with the requirements of the Licensing Acts, was sufficient. It was, therefore, in substance the same question as is involved in the present case. The Court of Appeal held that the question was concluded by the terms of the definition of "court of summary jurisdiction" contained in section 13, sub-section 11, of the Interpretation Act, 1889. The Master of the Rolls held that the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts as to procedure are intended to apply to all acts of justices where they are acting as justices in any matter in which an appeal may lie. Fry, L.J., agreed, but added these words: "I desire to observe that what we are holding is not that the Acts of 1884 and 1889 in substance make justices acting as such in all cases courts, but only that they put them in the same position as courts of summary jurisdiction for the purpose of certain provisions as to procedure."

It must be admitted that the words of section 13, sub-section 11, of the Act of 1889 are very wide, and are capable of the meaning attributed to them by the Court of Appeal. In order to ascertain whether they bear that meaning or a more restricted meaning, one must look to the scope and purpose of the Act, the subject-matter of the enactment itself, and the context in which they are used. By section 50 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, a court of summary jurisdiction was defined as "any justice or justices of the peace or other magistrate by whatever named called, to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is or are authorized to act under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or any of such Acts." There were, however, a great many Acts by which justices were authorized to deal with certain specified matters in a summary way, and in most of which a mode of procedure was prescribed. Doubts appear to have been entertained whether the section applied to such cases, and it was considered desirable to assimilate the procedure in all cases of summary jurisdiction. Accordingly, by the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1884 a large number of earlier enactments enumerated in the schedule laying down a special procedure were repealed, and by section 7, after reciting section 50 of the Act of 1879, and reciting that doubts had arisen as to whether the said section extended to such justice, justices, or magistrate when acting under some Act other than the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and it was expedient to remove such doubts, it was declared that the above recited definition of "court of summary jurisdiction" in section 50 of the Act of 1879 includes "such justice, justices, or magistrate as therein mentioned whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his or their commission, or by the common law." It is to be observed that the schedule of enactments repealed contains the provisions as to procedure of the sections of the Licensing Act, 1872, dealing with the recovery of penalties for the infringement of the provisions of that Act, but does not include the sections in the Alehouse Act, 1828, and the Act of 1872 relating to procedure on the grant or renewal of licenses or appeals from the justices in such cases. It is obvious that the word "acting" may mean acting generally and in any capacity, or acting in the particular manner or capacity in question—namely, in exercise of summary jurisdiction. I am of opinion, on consideration of the context and the connection in which the word "acting" is used, that it should be read in the more restricted sense, and that it means in this section "exercising summary jurisdiction," and consequently that the section does not, according to its true construction, apply to justices except when sitting as a court and exercising summary jurisdiction. In other words, the only effect of the section is to apply the procedure of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to the justices exercising summary jurisdiction, whether that jurisdiction was derived from the Acts themselves or from some other source. It did not, therefore, in my opinion, alter or affect the procedure laid down by the Act of 1828 for appeals from the act of justices concerning the granting or renewal of licenses.

I now come to the Act of 1889. Its title is "An Act for consolidating enactments relating to the construction of Acts of Parliament, and for further shortening the language used in Acts of Parliament." A most laudable object assuredly, but an Act for that purpose is the last place in which you would look for a substantive and important change in the law—imposing new liabilities on Her Majesty's subjects. Section 50 of the Act of 1879 and section 7 of the Act of 1884 are repealed, and for them is substituted the sub-section in question, which appears to be compounded out of the two repealed sections. I regard this section as being what it purports to be—a consolidation of the then existing law, and as not intended to extend or alter that law. I think that the words used in it must be interpreted in the same sense as that in which they are used in the repealed sections, and consequently that, according to the true construction of the section, it applies only to justices when exercising summary jurisdiction, whether under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any other authority. Agreeing with Fry, L.J., that it does not make justices in all cases a court of summary jurisdiction, I think, differing from that learned judge, that it does not either have the effect of putting them in the same position for purposes of procedure.

I do not dissent from what was said by Wright, J., in giving judgment in the present case: "It is incredible that any lawyer, or, I will add, the Legislature, should have meant to apply in that wholesale and rough-and-ready way the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to matters to which they had never been adapted, and were not at all applicable." For the reasons I have given I do not think the Legislature has done so.

I also agree that the refusal of the justices to renew the licence was not an "order or conviction" within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts; but I so entirely agree with what has been said by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Herschell) on that subject that I need not repeat the reasons for my opinion.

I therefore concur in the order which has been proposed.

ECROYD v. COULTHARD. (a.)

Inclosure Act—Award—Bed of river ad medium filum —Several fishery.

An award under an Inclosure Act dealing with moors, commons, and waste grounds will not by implication convey the bed of a river adjoining the land awarded usque ad medium filum.

A fortiori, such an award will not convey the bed of the river where it has been treated as a separate tenement, and not subject to commonable rights, and is exclusively in the possession of lessees of the lord at the date both of the Act and the award.

Action.

The plaintiff claimed to be the owner of a several and exclusive fishery in the half of the River Eden, in the manor of Cumwhitton, in the parish of Cumwhitton, in the county of Cumberland, adjoining an estate known as Edenbanks, belonging to the defendant, Mrs. Leach, and also claimed a right of way along the bed of the river on Mrs. Leach's property.

The action was brought to restrain the defendants from entering upon and trespassing upon the plaintiff's several fishery, and from preventing the plaintiff from using the alleged right of way.

The defendants Coulthard and Hodgkinson were members of an angling association, and claimed as licensees of Mrs. Leach, who claimed to be entitled to the stream opposite Edenbanks, ad medium filum, and they counter-claimed for an injunction restraining the plaintiff from trespassing on her estate or fishing in the stream.

In 1796 Frederick, Earl of Carlisle, lord of the manors of Cumwhitton and Cumrew, was entitled to the bed and soil of the Eden throughout the manor of Cumwhitton, which extended to the middle of the stream, and the several fishery in the same, subject only to certain rights of the predecessors of a copyholder named Ion to fish for lampreys in a portion thereof somewhat south of Edenbanks. The earl's right of fishery was territorial and not manorial or seignorial.

The present Earl of Carlisle conveyed the fishery to the plaintiff on the 14th of May, 1890, but the conveyance did not include the bed of the river opposite Edenbanks, which was expressly excluded by the particulars of sale. On the 26th of March, 1894, the plaintiff bought up Ion's rights.

Mrs. Leach's title was founded on an award under an Enclosure Act of 1796 (36 Geo. 3 c. xxxix.).

On the 16th of May 1799, the Edenbanks Estate was sold to Robert Leach (under whom Mrs. Leach claimed) under an appropriation for payment of expenses, and this sale was recited and confirmed by the award of the 13th of April, 1801. The bed of the Eden was not mentioned either in the Act or in the award, and the Eden was only mentioned as a boundary; but an island in the river was awarded to the lord.

The Edenbanks estate was described in the award as containing 105a. 2r. 35p., bounded on the west by the River Eden. The survey, which was incorporated with the award, showed the boundary by lines extending to the edge of the river, but not going over the bed. An addition of eight or ten acres would have to be made to the quantity if the bed of the river was included.

Cripps, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Stuart Moore, for the plaintiff.—The Inclosure Commissioners only hold jurisdiction as to moors, commons, and waste grounds. The fishery and bed of the river were not part of the waste, but a parcel of the manor. There is no suggestion of any common of piscary, and clearly a fishery is not a moor. At the date of the Inclosure Act the fishery was let, so it was a separate tenement and not subject to commonable rights. The copyhold grant of the right to fish for lampreys shows that the stream was not waste.

They cited Duke of Devonshire v. Pattinson, 20 Q. B. D. 263, 36 W. R. Dig. 217; Labrador Company v. The Queen, [1893] A. C. 104, 41 W. R. Dig. 26; Ewart v. Graham, 7 W. R. 621, 7 H. L. Cas. 331.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Micklem, for the defendants.—The river was part of the waste along which it ran, ad medium filum: Tilbury v. Silva, 45 Ch. D. 98, 39 W. R. Dig. 60; Royal Fishery of the Banne, Davies, 149; Lamb v. Newbiggin, 1 Car. & K. 549; Attorney-General v. Hanmer, 6 W. R. 804, 27 L. J. Ch. 837. The bed of the river was within the Act, or the island could not have been allotted to the lord; it was part of his compensation. The grant of the waste passed half the bed of the river, as no contrary intention is proved: Micklethwait v. Newlay Bridge Co., 33 Ch. D. 133, 35 W. R. Dig. 71. Robert Leach is directed by the award to fence his allotment on every side except the side of the river. The reservation clause did not preserve the lord's right of fishery: Townley v. Gibson, 2 T. R. 701; Sowerby v. Smith, 23 W. R. 79, L. R. 9 C. P. 524. The lessee's rights would not have been affected, but the rent might be apportioned.

Eady, Q.C., in reply.—The bed of the river belonged to Lord Carlisle as owner of the several fishery: Attorney-General v. Emerson, [1891] A. C. 649, 40 W. R. Dig. 90; Hindson v. Ashby, 45 W. R. 252, [1896] 2 Ch. 1. Primâ facie, the bed would have passed to the plaintiff without special words: Blackett v. Clayton (1891, B., 2,670, unreported); but the particulars of sale are admissible to rebut this presumption: Pryor v. Petre, 42 W. R. 435, [1894] 2 Ch. 11, although they would not be admissible to alter the effect of anything contained in the conveyance: Leggott v. Barrett, 28 W. R. 962, 15 Ch. D. 306.

He also cited Poole v. Huskinson, 11 M. & W. 827.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—NORTH, J., held that a good title had been traced in the Earls of Carlisle to the bed and soil of the Eden throughout the manor of Cumwhitton and the several fishery therein, subject only to the interests of the Ion family, the right of fishery being a territorial and not a manorial or seignorial right, and that the earl had granted to the plaintiff all his several fishery and fishery rights, but had retained the soil and bed of the river. [His lordship proceeded:] The defence is that the Edenbanks estate (including the bed of the Eden ad medium filum) was conveyed to Mrs. Leach's predecessors in title by the award, and that ever since the award they and she have been in sole and undisturbed possession of such bed and of the right of angling and fishing therein. There is no evidence of any preservation of the river before 1860, when the Carlisle Angling Association became tenants. They employed water bailiffs and watchers down to 1870, when the Eden Fishery Board was established and took upon themselves the preservation of the river. The Leaches never employed keepers or watchers. The association often interfered with and threatened to prosecute persons fishing without tickets, but in most cases the persons threatened took tickets, and they never did prosecute. Some of the Leaches or their licensees fished off Edenbanks without tickets and without interference, and they have discharged or warned off persons fishing there. Sometimes such persons went away, sometimes they continued fishing. Since the case of Duke of Devonshire v. O'Connor, 38 W. R. 420, 24 Q. B. D. 468—a case I do not think applicable, but which they considered as materially strengthening their position—the Leaches have been more vigorous in asserting their rights. Many of the cases of so-called discharge were occasions on which the complaint was of a trespass, not on the fishery, but on the soil of the Edenbanks estate, but some were for actual fishing. It is admitted, however, that none of the Leach family ever took legal proceedings against anyone for trespass. The result of the evidence is that neither party can say that their contention is supported by the acts or conduct of the other, and it is impossible for me to hold that the grounds upon which Duke of Devonshire v. Pattinson was decided apply to this case. On the other hand, the defence that from the date of the award the Leach family has been in sole and undisturbed possession of the bed of the Eden adjoining the Edenbanks estate and of the exclusive right of angling and fishing there is utterly without foundation.

I have now to deal with the defendants' contention that, although the land allotted to Robert Leach on the face of the award and plan does not include the bed of the river, there is a presumption of law that the bed of the adjacent half of the river passed to him by the award. The law on this subject is clearly laid down by Cotton, L.J., in Micklethwait v. Newlay Bridge Co., 33 Ch. D. 133, 145, 35 W. R. Dig. 71. The defendants say that this precisely meets their case, but I do not think it does for two reasons. I have searched in vain for any decision in which the presumption in question has been applied in the case of an award, and I feel some difficulty in seeing how the statutory award which is imperatively required by the Act to express, specify, and contain the quantity in statute measure, of acres, roods, and perches contained in every respective allotment, can be held to operate as allotting not only the particular area correctly surveyed, measured, and described, but also an additional ten acres or so not included or mentioned in it. Lindley, L.J., seems to have assumed in a case I am going to cite that there may be such a presumption in the case of an award, though much must of course depend upon the language of the Act. Assuming this difficulty to be got over, I think it clear that the presumption can only apply where the land in respect of which it is invoked would clearly have passed if expressly mentioned in the conveyance. A conveyance of a field abutting on a road can only operate to convey half of that road when that half belongs to the party conveying. If it belongs to a third party, it would not pass even if expressly mentioned, and a fortiori it could not pass by presumption. In the present case the bed of the Eden was not, in my opinion, within the powers or jurisdiction of the commissioners, and could not have been allotted by them. The Act is merely for dividing the moors, commons, and waste grounds in the manors and parishes of Cumwhitton and Cumrew. The Eden itself is never referred to in the Act or in the award, except where it is referred to as bounding a lot. The bed of the Eden is not referred to either in the Act or in the award.

The question what is waste of the manor is a question of fact, to be solved by the consideration how the locus in quo, and other property of similar character in the vicinity, has been used and enjoyed.

I do not doubt that in some cases the bed of a river may be waste of a manor, as, for instance, in Tilbury v. Silva, where it was clearly proved that the copyhold tenants of the manor had a customary right of fishing in half a river, and the homage so presented at every yearly manor court. In the present case there is not a tittle of evidence of the sort, or that any tenants of the manor had any right of fishing or commonable rights of any kind over such bed. No entry from any court roll is produced showing that any common rights of the copyholders existed in the Eden, or that its bed was part of the wastes of the manor. The case of Ion's tenement in the immediate vicinity shows that, so far from being waste of the the manor, the bed of the river was part of the lord's demesne, of which a tenant had a special and exclusive grant by copy. Jones v. Williams, 2 M. & W. 326, shows that this evidence is admissible on the main question. And more, the fishery opposite Edenbanks was actually let at the date of the Act to one set of persons, and at the date of the award to another. It was a separate tenement of the lord, the rent of which belonged to the lord, the tenement being in the exclusive possession of his tenants. It was said that, according to Townley v. Gibson, 2 T. R. 701, the tenant would not be affected by the allotment, but the right to the rent would pass to the allottee of the reversion, and an apportionment would be necessary. This would be so if the subject demised was part of the waste to be allotted; but the lease is important, as showing that the fishery is a separate tenement, not subject to commonable rights at all, nor within the purview of the Inclosure Act. It is not conceivable that in the present case any apportionment of the rent of the lease was in contemplation. In fact there is nothing whatever in the Act, the award, or the evidence to indicate that the bed of the Eden was within the Act, or was intended to be affected by it, or that the Inclosure commissioners contemplated dealing with it in any way. This is my first reason for saying that the presumption of law upon which the defendants rely has no application to the present case.

[His lordship then referred to Hindson v. Ashby, 45 W. R. 252, [1896] 2 Ch. 1, and to the judgments of Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.] If the decision in that case was right, it follows that the defendants' contention in the present case is ununfounded. That the Earl of Carlisle was entitled to the bed of the river and the fishery above it at the date both of the Act and award seems to me established by the evidence. Moreover, the defendants cannot dispute this, for their whole claim is based upon the award, and they are nowhere if the earl was not then entitled to the river and fishery. To adopt the words of Lindley, L.J., "the bed of the river clearly did not pass to the defendants' predecessors by the allotment" made in 1801. In words it certainly did not, and any presumption which might have assisted the allottee is displaced by the evidence in favour of the owner of the fishery. Even if the bed of the river was waste of the manor, the result is the same, for it is not allotted to Mrs. Leach's predecessor, and there is no presumption to help her to it, and whatever was not allotted by the award must remain in the lord. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff has established his title to the fishery opposite Edenbanks, but this will not interfere with the enjoyment by Mrs. Leach of the usual rights of riparian owners other than the right of fishing. I have not thought it necessary to comment upon a section of the Inclosure Act upon which a great deal of argument was addressed to me referring to seignorial and manorial rights. I do not think that it affects the questions I have to deal with. The right to the bed of the river in this case seems to me to have been from the first a territorial right, the bed within the manor being part of the demesne lands of the lord. If, on the other hand, the lord's right to the fishery was in reality a seignorial or manorial right, it appears to me that it would be saved or reserved by that section which is almost identical with the section considered by the Court of Appeal in Duke of Devonshire v. O'Connor. On one point Mrs. Leach is entitled to succeed—as to the alleged right of way along the bank of the river. When the earl's access to the river across the common land was about to be interrupted by the allotment thereof, it is difficult to say why he did not claim to have a right of way or private way for fishermen, keepers, &c., set out in his favour along the bank. Such a claim would not have been rejected, but probably the professional fishermen had their boats and nets, and the anglers being few in number no interference was anticipated. But there is now no remedy by the award, the earl received a large allotment in lieu of and as and for full compensation of his right and interest as lord of the barony of Gilsland and the two manors in and to the soil of the residue of the said moors, commons, and waste grounds, and Edenbanks, thus freed and released from all rights of the earl, was allotted to R. Leach as his freehold to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

Declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to a several fishery in the half-stream of the Eden within the manor of Cumwhitton so far as it adjoins the Edenbanks estate. Injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants, and agents from entering and trespassing upon such fishery and interfering with the plaintiff and his tenants and licensees in the enjoyment thereof. Dismiss the action so far as it seeks other relief. On counter-claim injunction restraining plaintiff, his servants, and agents from entering and trespassing upon the Edenbanks estate. Dismiss counter-claim so far as it seeks to restrain the plaintiff, his servants, and agents from fishing in the half-stream of the Eden in the manor of Cumwhitton where its adjoins the Edenbanks estate. Parties to have costs of issues upon which they succeeded; costs to be set off. Judgment, was dated the day argument was concluded, as in Turner v. London and South-Western Railway Co., L. R. 17 Eq. 561, 22 W. R. Dig. 209, the defendant, Mrs. Leach, having died since that day.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY v. RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL OF RUNCORN. (a.)

Local government—Sewers—Drains constructed by railway company—Vesting in local authority—Railway Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), ss. 1, 68—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 13 (2).

The special Act of a railway company expressly incorporated the provisions of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, and, pursuant to such last-mentioned Act, the railway company constructed certain pipes and drains for the purpose of carrying away water from lands lying near the railway. Down such pipes and drains, but without the knowledge of the railway company, some sewage from houses erected on adjoining lands found its way.

Held, that the special Act must be read as if by it all the provisions of the Railway Clauses Act were in terms re-enacted; that the pipes and drains in question were therefore made under a private Act of Parliament, and therefore fell within the second exception contained in section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and had not vested in the local authority.

By the writ in this action the plaintiffs claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from connecting certain new sewers of the defendants in the township of Helsby and parish of Frodsham, in the county of Chester, with certain land drains and ditches of the plaintiffs, and from causing or permitting sewage or water to flow from the said new sewers of the defendants into the said ditches and land drains of the plaintiffs.

There were no pleadings in the action.

The question at issue was whether the land drains and ditches mentioned in the writ (which were constructed in their own lands by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title) were vested in the plaintiffs or (as the defendants alleged) under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, had become vested in the defendants as the rural sanitary authority of the district.

At the trial a considerable number of witnesses were examined on behalf of the plaintiffs and defendants respectively.

The result of their evidence and the facts of the case are fully stated in his lordship's judgment.

STIRLING, J.—The plaintiffs are the successors of a railway company constituted by an Act of Parliament passed in 1846 (with which the Railway Clauses Act of 1845 is incorporated) for the purpose of making a railway from the Chester and Birkenhead Railway to the Manchester and Birmingham Railway. This railway was made about the year 1850. Subsequently by an Act of Parliament passed in 1861 it was, together with all the rights and obligations of the original company, transferred to the plaintiffs. The railway runs from Chester to Warrington, in the direction from south-west to north-east, and passes near the village of Helsby, where there is a station. In the neighbourhood of Helsby the land on the south-east of the line slopes from a considerable height to the railway, which is constructed on an embankment. On the opposite side of the line the land is flat and marshy, and is locally known as "the marshes." A little to the south of Helsby station the plaintiffs are the owners of a strip of land on the south-east of the line abutting on a field (which was formerly two fields) now in the occupation of the Helsby Cricket Club, which I shall designate as the Helsby Athletic Field. This field is separated from the plaintiffs' property by a ditch, beyond which, and nearer the line, are a post, fence, and hedge. On the north-west side of the line the plaintiff's property extends to a flash or pool of water, formed by the excavation of the soil used in constructing the railway embankment. Between the railway and the flash is a second line of railway running from Hooton to Warrington, and between these two lines is a triangular space partly occupied by sidings and partly unused at present, but intended for the construction of accommodation works as the traffic develops. Previously to 1896 the athletic field consisted, as I have said, of two fields separated by a ditch which has now been filled up. At the north and south sides of the field are still existing pipes. These communicate by means of 9-inch pipes with a system of pipes and drains on the plaintiffs' land, and situate partly on the south-east and partly on the north-west side of the line. All of them, after passing under the first-mentioned railway ultimately join an 18-inch pipe which passes under the second line of railway and discharges into the flash or pool already mentioned.

It is as to the ownership of this system of pipes or drains that the dispute has arisen. There is no question that they have all been constructed by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title. Those which lie on the south-east side of the first line and which pass under it were so constructed in 1850, at the time when the railway was originally made. Those which lie on the north-west side of the railway have had their course and position altered from time to time to suit the requirements and convenience of the plaintiffs, and are now some eight or ten feet under the level of the ground. On the south-east side of the line the average gradient is 1 in 25. On the north-west it is only 1 in 107, and for a considerable portion of their course the pipes or drains on the latter (that is, on the north-west) side are practically level. The ditches on the north and south sides of the athletic field were and are, and that which formerly ran down the middle of it was (apart from the user of which I shall presently speak), ordinary country ditches such as are found all over England, and, according to the evidence of the defendants' witness Mr. Brandreth, before the making of the existing line of railway, were continued down to the marshes.

At the trial the plaintiffs' case was rested on an alleged user of the ditches in the athletic field for the purpose of carrying off the sewage from eight houses on the south-east side of the line. This sewage, it is alleged, passed from the ditches to the system of pipes or drains already mentioned, and consequently it is contended that these have become sewers within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, and are vested in the defendants.

Before dealing with any question of law I shall consider how the facts stand as regards the user of the two ditches and the pipes for the purpose of conveying sewage. Such user is said to have taken place in connection with the eight houses which I have mentioned. These are numbered 1 to 8 on the plans in evidence, and may be dealt with in three groups, the first consisting of those numbered 1 and 2, the second of Nos. 3, 4, and 8, and the third of Nos. 5, 6, and 7. [His lordship then dealt in detail with the evidence as to the drainage of each of these groups, and stated the result of such evidence as follows:] It thus appears that the drainage of Nos. 1 and 2 was from the year 1872, and that of Nos. 5, 6, and 7 was from the year 1873, in connection with the ditch on the north side of the athletic field, and that the drainage of Nos. 3, 4, and 8 had from the year 1877 a connection with the ditch which formerly ran down the middle of the same field, and this state of things continued up till 1896. [His lordship then dealt with the evidence as to the passing of sewage down the ditches, and proceeded:] The conclusion appears to be that during the periods mentioned a certain quantity of sewage, not, I think, very great, did find its way from all the houses along the two ditches into the pipes or drains on the plaintiffs' lands, but at the same time there was nothing to affect the plaintiffs with knowledge that before 1896 such sewage did so pass into that system of pipes or drains. In 1896 the ditch down the middle of the athletic field was closed with the assent of the defendants, who also in that year proceeded to convey the sewage into the ditch at the south of the field, whence it passed into the pipes and drains in the plaintiffs' lands. This was objected to by the plaintiffs, and the defendants abandoned the use of the southern ditch and carried the sewage into that on the north side of the field. The question in this action is whether they are entitled, as a matter of law, to do so.

It is admitted by the defendants that, if they are so entitled, then they are bound so to deal with the pipes and drains, and the sewage passing through them, that no nuisance shall be caused to the plaintiffs or to any other person. In this action no question of nuisance is raised. Before examining the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, on which the defendants rely, I think it is desirable to consider what were the rights and obligations of the plaintiffs and their predecessors in title in respect of these drains and pipes under the special Act for constructing the railway and the general Acts incorporated therewith.

The special Act contains in itself nothing which directly relates to these drains, but there is incorporated with it, as I have already stated, the Railway Clauses Act, of which two sections are material. The first is section 16, which provides that: [His lordship read the section.]

Therefore the drains there spoken of are to be made for the purpose either of constructing the railway or the accommodation works connected therewith. Section 68 deals with accommodation works. [His lordship read the section, and also sections 69, 70, and 73.] It seems clear that all drains constructed under section 16 or section 68 were to remain under the control and management of the railway company.

Some discussion took place at the trial as to the purpose for which the system of pipes and drains has been constructed by the plaintiffs or their predecessors. There is no direct evidence on the point and it is obvious that a system of drainage such as now exists is necessary as well for the protection of the railway embankment as for the accommodation of the adjoining lands. The embankment of the plaintiffs must necessarily dam up the water (which in times of storm is of considerable amount) coming down the slopes to the south-east of the line, and the stability of the embankment might be endangered by reason of the great pressure if means were not taken to prevent the accumulation of water. At the same time the embankment would probably throw back the water on the adjoining lands, and certainly would prevent the water from being conveyed away from those lands (in the language of section 68) "as clearly as before the making of the railway."

It becomes, therefore, the duty of the railway company, under section 68, to construct drains and other passages sufficient to convey away the water. Seeing that, according to the defendants' own evidence, the ditches before the construction of the railway ran straight on to the marshes without any interruption, I cannot doubt that the pipes and drains were constructed for the purpose of fulfilling this statutory duty.

In the case of The Queen v. Fisher it was held that the drains and other passages for the conveyance of water which the railway company is bound to provide are to be such as are required at the time when the land is taken, and not such as might be necessary at a subsequent date when the land might be applied to uses of a totally different kind. This decision was followed in the case of The Queen v. Brown, and has been recently approved by the Court of Appeal in Rhondda and Swansea Railway Co. v. Talbot.

When the railway was made the only houses in existence were Nos. 3 and 4. Consequently the owners of the other houses have not any rights under the section. Further, as regards Nos. 3 and 4, there is nothing to show that the flow of liquid sewage from them was at that time substantial, or reached the site of the railway, or, indeed, any of the ditches which I have mentioned. Such overflow as then existed, if it crossed the road, passed into the field opposite the houses, and may well have been absorbed or evaporated there, and, in any case, would not reach the plaintiffs' drains or ditches in the shape of sewage. The overflow in the road did not attract the notice of the authorities till 1871, at which time, according to the evidence of Mr. Beswich, Nos. 3 and 4, were in the occupation of a tenant who kept a larger stock of cattle on the farm than before.

Looking at all the circumstances, I come to the conclusion of fact that these drains and pipes were not constructed for the purpose of carrying away sewage from any house, but were constructed (in the language of the Act of 1845) for the purpose of conveying the water "as clearly from the lands lying near or affected by the railway as before the making of the railway."

I now come to the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875. The material sections are, first, section 4, which contains the following definitions of "drain" and "sewer." [His lordship read these definitions, also sections 13, 2nd exception, 15, 21, and 327.] Now, it is quite clear that the policy of this Act is that as regards sewers to which it relates they are to be vested in the local authority, and to be under their control, and under section 21 the public within the district, that is to say, such of the public as are owners or occupiers of premises within the district have certain rights given to them of making use of these sewers. The control and management, therefore, of such sewers as these, is quite different from the control and management which is provided for by the Act of 1845.

It was admitted in argument on behalf of the defendants that if the system of pipes and drains in the plaintiffs' land is a sewer within the meaning of the Act the duty of maintaining and repairing it falls upon the defendants. The contention on behalf of the defendants may be stated as follows: The pipes and drains are at the present time, and were previously to 1896, used de facto for the drainage of more than one building only. Consequently they are sewers within the definition of section 4, and consequently, it is said, are vested in the defendants under section 13.

To this the plaintiffs make several answers. It is said, first, that none of the owners of the houses in question had acquired against the plaintiffs any legal title to send sewage into these pipes and drains, that, according to the doctrine of Mulliner v. The Midland Railway Co., approved in the House of Lords in The Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, it was competent for the plaintiffs at any time to put an end to the user which had taken place, and that the vesting under section 13 does not put an end to this right. On this the case of The Queen v. The Godmanchester Board of Health was particularly referred to, and more especially the observations of Cockburn, L.C.J., at p. 899 of the report in 5 B. & S., where a strong opinion was expressed that the Public Health Act, 1848 (the provisions of which were very similar to those of the Act of 1875 in this respect), was not intended to interfere with rights of a private nature.

It was said, secondly, that the rights vested in the plaintiffs by their special Act for a specific purpose cannot be held to be overridden by a subsequent statute conferring upon a public body general powers for a different purpose, and on this were cited the case of The London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Limehouse District Board of Works, and the more recent cases of The City and South London Railway Co. v. London County Council, and The London County Council v. The School Board for London.

Thirdly, it was contended that the pipes and drains in question, if sewers within the Act, are "sewers made and used for the purpose of draining land under a local or private Act of Parliament" and consequently fall within the second exception of section 13.

I have come to a conclusion on this last point in favour of the plaintiffs, and this being so it is unnecessary to express a concluded opinion on either of the other points. I may however say, with respect to the first, that as at present advised I am not satisfied that the plaintiffs' argument is consistent with the general scheme of the Public Health Act, 1875. It is well established by cases decided subsequently to that of The Queen v. The Godmanchester Local Board, that the Public Health Act does apply to sewers constructed by the owner of houses on his own land for the use of those houses, and consequently the Act does to some extent interfere with private rights. As regards the second, although the rule as to construction of statutes which is relied on is well established, still it is one which yields to indication of contrary intention

Now, section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and also the definition in section 4 show, apparently, that the Legislature contemplated that the provisions of section 13 might possibly affect sewers which had been brought into existence under prior legislation, for there are excepted from the operation of the wide terms of the enacting part a class of sewers made under the authority of certain Acts of Parliament, and I am not at present satisfied that sewers of a different statutory origin than that mentioned in the Act were meant to be excepted.

I will proceed, then, to consider the exception contained in section 13 of "sewers made for the purpose of draining, preserving, or improving land under any private or local Act of Parliament."

I have already stated that in my opinion the drains and pipes in question were constructed for the purpose of carrying the water from the lands lying near or affected by the railway as clearly as before the making of the railway, or, in other words, for the purpose of conveying away the water which, as matters stood when the railway was constructed, did, or might, find its way into the ditches which intersected the land adjoining the line. The object of these ditches was to drain that land. I think, therefore, the pipes and drains were made for the purpose of draining the land through which these ditches ran. They have ever since been used for that purpose, and the adjoining owners have the right, it appears to me, to insist as against the railway company that they shall continue to be so used.

It was said, however, that they were made, not under a local or private Act of Parliament, but under a general statute—namely, the Railway Clauses Act, 1845.

That turns on the very first clause contained in that Act, by which it is enacted that "this Act shall apply to every railway which shall by any Act which shall hereafter be passed be authorized to be constructed, and this Act shall be incorporated with such Act, and all the clauses and provisions of this Act, save so far as they shall be expressly varied or excepted by any such Act, shall apply to the undertaking authorized thereby, so far as the same shall be applicable to such undertaking, and shall, as well as the clauses and provisions of every other Act, which shall be incorporated with such Act, form part of such Act, and shall be construed together therewith as forming one Act."

It is said that this enactment which I have read is part of the general law of the land, and therefore these drains, having been made under a power contained in that general Act, were not made under any local or private Act of Parliament.

How the matter would have stood if there had been no express incorporation of the public Act in the special Act it seems to me unnecessary to say, but it is obvious that the very first section contemplates an incorporation of the Act of 1845 in every subsequent railway Act, and it provides that the Act which is so incorporated shall be construed together with it as forming one Act. Now, the Legislature complied with that direction and incorporated in terms the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, with the special Act under which the railway was constructed. That special Act must therefore, it seems to me, be read as if the provisions of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, had been repeated verbatim in it, and I think that these pipes and drains were under these circumstances made under this special Act.

But it was further said that the plaintiffs' special Act being one for the construction of a railway was not such an Act of Parliament as is contemplated in section 13, sub-section 2, or in section 327, sub-section 1.

Now, the language of the Act is "sewers made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving, or improving land under any local or private Act of Parliament." This contention seems to me to be based on a transposition of the language, and to deal with the Act as if it ran in this form, "Sewers made or used under any local or private Act of Parliament for draining, preserving, or improving land." I see no sufficient reason for making any such transposition, and I think there may have been good reasons on the part of the Legislature for excepting sewers made for the purpose of draining land under any local or private Act of Parliament, even though the object of the Act of Parliament was not the draining, preserving, and improving the land, but was some other object.

I think therefore that the contention of the defendants is not well founded, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment in their favour.

Bankruptcy — After-acquired property — Assignment — Equitable chose in action—Bona fides—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 44, 54—Colonial law.

The principle that where a bankrupt deals bonâ fide and for value with his property acquired subsequently to his bankruptcy, but before his discharge, the transaction is valid against the creditors under the bankruptcy, applies to a case where the property dealt with is an equitable interest in a trust fund; and the assignee for value may demand payment of the trust fund from the trustees.

It makes no difference that the bankrupt had not informed his trustee in bankruptcy of his having acquired the equitable interest, and that the trustee was ignorant of the fact until after the assignment, and that the assignee for value was aware of the ignorance of the trustee, as the conduct of the bankrupt towards his trustee in bankruptcy is immaterial to the question of bona fides.

Cohen v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 551, 25 Q. B. D. 262, explained.

Ex parte Ford, 24 W. R. 590, 1 Ch. D. 521, and Ex parte Clarke, [1894] 2 Q. B. 393, distinguished.

This was an action by the plaintiffs as the assignees for value of the interest in certain trust funds of one John Emery, who resided and carried on business in the colony of Victoria, in Australia.

The first two defendants were the trustees of the fund, and the third defendant, Cohen, was the assignee in insolvency in the colony, of the estate of Emery.

In April, 1892, Emery filed his petition in the Court of Insolvency in Victoria, and an order was made placing his estate under sequestration in the hands of the defendant Cohen, who was one of the official assignees of the court.

In March, 1893, Frederick Emery, the father of John Emery, the insolvent, died in England, and by his will appointed the defendants Fripp and Brandon the executors of his will, and gave them all his real and personal estate upon trust for sale and conversion, and out of the proceeds to pay, amongst other legacies, a legacy of £500, and one-eighth of the residue, to his son John Emery.

Emery heard of these facts in or about May, 1893, or at any rate previous to his discharge. He obtained his discharge in September, 1893. Prior to this the plaintiffs, who were wholesale paper merchants in London, had from time to time supplied goods to one Welch, who acted as their agent in the colony, and Welch thus became indebted to them in a large sum—£5,000 or thereabouts.

In May, 1894, Welch, desiring to give up his business sold it to Emery upon terms that amounted to Emery becoming owner upon payment of £400, payable by periodical instalments, the first of which was to commence in July, 1894. At the same time Emery purchased of Welch the stock-in-trade of the business for £520, also payable by instalments. These transactions were carried out by three agreements in the early part of the month.

On the 15th of March, 1895, by deed-poll reciting that the sums set out in the schedule thereto were due from Emery to Welch, and that the latter was indebted to the plaintiffs in an amount in excess of these sums, Welch, in consideration of the plaintiffs foregoing their claim for the money aforesaid, assigned to the plaintiffs all the said scheduled debts or sums of money, and all his interest in the said agreements between Emery and himself. The schedule set forth all the instalments payable for the sale of the business and stock-in-trade of Emery, amounting altogether to £925. Notice of this assignment was given to Emery.

By an indenture of the 25th of June, 1895, Emery, in consideration of the sum of £900, which was not stated in the deed to be then paid, assigned to the plaintiffs all his share and interest in the estate of his father under the said will. The legacy and share of residue turned out to be of the aggregate value of about £900.

Soon after hearing of his interests under his father's will, Emery had applied to the trustees for payment, and received from them before his discharge £50 on account. Subsequently the trustees hearing of his insolvency declined to pay the rest of the moneys in question either to him or to his assignees, the plaintiffs. Cohen, the assignee in insolvency, was not informed by Emery, and did not hear of the will, or of the interests of Emery under it, until after the assignment to the plaintiffs. When it came to his knowledge he claimed the moneys in the hands of the trustees, for the creditors under the insolvency who had not been paid to a considerable amount. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action for a declaration that they were entitled to all sums of money payable to Emery under the said will. The trustees paid the money into court.

It was admitted at the trial that the plaintiffs were aware that Emery had not informed his assignee in insolvency of his interests under the will, and that the latter was ignorant of the fact till after the assignment.

The case originally came on on the 5th of August upon an admission by the parties that the law of the colony upon the matter was contained in the Insolvency Act, 1890, and in the decisions upon that Act, but his lordship refused to decide the case upon that basis, and it was adjourned for expert evidence of the Colonial law.

Evidence was now given by experts that the Colonial law was governed by the Insolvency Act, 1890; that there was no material difference between the phraseology of that Act and of the English Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as far as concerns the matters in question, particularly as to the sections of the Victorian Act corresponding with sections 44 and 54 of the English Act, that the decisions of the English courts were, if not strictly binding upon yet, were regarded with the highest respect by, the Colonial courts, and that in the case of Trimble v. Hill, 28 W. R. 479, 5 App. Cas. 342, the Judicial Commitee of the Privy Council had in effect decided that the decisions of the English Court of Appeal upon like statutes with Colonial statutes should be followed by the Colonial courts; and that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cohen v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 551, 25 Q. B. D. 262, as explained by subsequent cases, represented the law in the colony of Victoria upon the matter.

Atherley Jones, Q.C., and Compton Smith, for the assignees in insolvency.—Cohen v. Mitchell stands alone, and is only an authority for the particular circumstances of that case. It is confined to transactions in the way of trade, which is not the case here. The cases of Ex parte Ford; Ex parte Beardmore; Wadling v. Oliphant, 24 W. R. 246, 1 Q. B. D. 145; Meggy v. Imperial Discount Co., 26 W. R. 342, 3 Q. B. D. 711, are in our favour. The insolvent was bound, under the Insolvency Act, 1890, to inform his assignee in insolvency of the interest he had acquired, and the plaintiffs knowing that he had not done so, were parties to improper concealment, and were not acting bonâ fide. As to good faith, see Tatum v. Haslar, 38 W. R. 109, 23 Q. B. D. 345; and Lord Blackburn in Jones v. Gordon, 26 W. R. 172, 2 App. Cas. 628.

R. F. Norton, for the trustees, took no part in the argument.

BYRNE, J., after stating the facts and the result of the expert evidence as above stated, continued: I have, therefore, to consider whether the facts of this case bring it within the decision in Cohen v. Mitchell, having regard to other decisions upon the subject. That decision was, shortly, that transactions entered into by a bankrupt who has not obtained his discharge in respect of property acquired after the bankruptcy, with any person dealing with him bonâ fide and for value, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee in bankruptcy. This proposition, which was agreed upon by all the judges in that case, was not meant to be more than a new expression of old law. See the observations of the Master of the Rolls in Cohen v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 552, 25 Q. B. D. 267. I do not consider that the court meant thereby to throw any doubt upon the earlier decision in Ex parte Ford, In re Caughey; and that is the view, as I understand, taken by the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Beardmore, In re Clarke. The proposition in Cohen v. Mitchell has been shown by later cases to be intended to apply to leaseholds, but not to real estate. Now can I distinguish that case from the case before me on the ground that the property in dispute here is money in the hands of trustees which has never been paid over to the insolvent, but has been paid into court to abide a decision as to the rights of the parties? This is undoubtedly an important point. The proposition in Cohen v. Mitchell was laid down in general terms, and Chitty, J., in the later case of The New Land Development Association and Gray, [1892] 2 Ch., at p. 143, speaks of choses in action, and other personal estate belonging to the bankrupt, and goods and chattels, as being within that proposition. I do not, therefore, feel justified in drawing so refined a distinction as to say that the fact that the money is outstanding, and has not got into the hands of the person by whom the assignment was made, constitutes a valid difference. The cases of Ex parte Ford and Ex parte Beardmore were cases not between a particular assignee and the trustee in bankruptcy, but between two trustees in bankruptcy, the debtor having been bankrupt a second time, and are therefore distinguishable from Cohen v. Mitchell. That this distinction was regarded by the judges in Ex parte Beardmore, as material appears from their judgments. See observations of Davey, L.J., in Ex parte Beardmore, [1894] 2 Q. B., at pp. 409, 410. Ex parte Beardmore recognizes the rule laid down in Cohen v. Mitchell.

I come then to the question whether the transaction in the case before me can be considered as a dealing bonâ fide and for value. Assuming that the earlier transactions were valid and not tainted with fraud, then there was a sufficient sum due to make a good consideration. Practically, then, all I have to consider is whether the transaction was bonâ fide within the meaning of the rule in Cohen v. Mitchell. "It will be seen, I think," says Lord Esher in that case, 38 W. R. 552, 25 Q. B. D. 267, "from the wording of that proposition that the stress of bona fides is laid entirely and solely on the person dealing with the bankrupt, and if he has dealt in good faith, the question of whether the bankrupt as between himself and the creditors is also dealing in good faith is immaterial." I do not therefore, except so far as it affects the conduct of the plaintiffs, propose to consider whether the insolvent was dealing fairly or otherwise, or whether he left undone what he ought to have done. It has been put to me, I think not unfairly, that "dealing bonâ fide" is equivalent to "dealing honestly"; and what I have really to consider is whether the plaintiffs were behaving honestly when they took the assignment from Emery. I think that they were. There is no obligation upon parties dealing with an undischarged bankrupt, although they knew that he had been a bankrupt, whether discharged or undischarged, to go to the trustee and make inquiries of him. There is nothing dishonest in a man dealing with a bankrupt, dealing fairly with him, as he would with any other customer. Now, looking at the origin of the transaction, I do not infer that the transaction between Welch and Emery was tainted with fraud. I do not impute to Welch that he wished to put upon Emery the indebtedness of a business which would have the effect of crushing him. I think that they both believed the business would be a successful one. As regards the conduct of the plaintiffs during the negotiations which led to the assignment, up to at least January, 1895, nothing, so far as I can see, can be said against their bonâ fides or honesty, unless it was dishonest on their part not to have gone to the assignee on insolvency, or given him notice that the insolvent was proposing to deal with the legacy in question. I do not think that they were called upon to do so, or that there was anything dishonest in their not doing so. And going even to a later date I think that the utmost that could be said against the plaintiffs from which I could draw any sort of inference would be that they had ultimately a strong suspicion that there were outstanding creditors of Emery under an old bankruptcy, who, if they thought it worth while to do so, might re-open the bankruptcy, put in claims, and put the assignee in motion. It is said that as Emery did not go to the assignee about the matter, he was in that sense concealing his legacy from the assignee. That is true, but I have nothing to do with any question between Emery and his creditors now. I think that the reasonable inference is that the plaintiffs were dealing honestly—that is to say, bonâ fide, within the meaning of the decision in Cohen v. Mitchell. The result is that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed.

REG. v. BURTON AND ANOTHER (JUSTICES). Ex parte YOUNG. (a.)

Justices—Pecuniary interest—Bias—Membership of the Incorporated Law Society—Proceedings against an unqualified person for acting as a solicitor.

On a prosecution by the Incorporated Law Society under section 12 of the Solicitors Act, 1874, against a person for pretending to be a solicitor, one of the justices before whom the case was heard was both a practising solicitor and an ordinary member of the prosecuting society, but not one of the council of that society. The solicitor for the accused was aware the magistrate in question was a solicitor, but he did not raise any objection. He was not, however, aware that the magistrate was a member of the society. The evidence showed that the whole responsibility for prosecutions rested solely with the council of the Law Society.

Held, on a rule for a certiorari to quash, that the justice was not disqualified from adjudicating by reason of the fact that he was a mere ordinary member of the Incorporated Law Society; that he was not affected by bias or pecuniary interest; and that he was not the prosecutor.

Rule nisi for a certiorari.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained on behalf of one Alfred Young, calling upon John Burton and Frederick Cleve, justices in and for the borough of Tunbridge Wells, and the Incorporated Law Society of the United Kingdom, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue in respect of a conviction on the 12th of April, 1897, whereby the said Alfred Young was convicted for wilfully and falsely pretending to be a solicitor, and why such conviction should not be quashed, on the ground that the said John Burton was interested in the matter of the conviction, he being a practising solicitor and a member of the Incorporated Law Society.

The facts of the case, as contained in affidavits, were that Young wrote a letter to a lady saying that he was instructed by her late butler to apply to her for a month's wages in lieu of notice, and further stating that if payment were not made within seven days he would take proceedings in the county court to recover the same.

The matter was brought to the notice of the council of the Incorporated Law Society, who decided to take proceedings against Young under section 12 of the Solicitors Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 68).

On the 12th of April, 1897, at the petty sessions at Tunbridge Wells, Young was summoned and appeared before the aforesaid two justices. Before the case was called on the defendant's solicitor directed the attention of the clerk to the justices to the fact that the chairman, the said John Burton, was himself a practising solicitor. The clerk replied that the defendant's solicitor could raise the objection if he liked, but no question was raised or objection taken by the said solicitor to the jurisdiction of the said John Burton.

The defendant was convicted of the offence, and a fine was inflicted upon him.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The magistrate, John Burton, besides being a practising solicitor, was also a member of the Incorporated Law Society, but the defendant's solicitor was not aware of this fact at the time when the summons came on for hearing.

It appeared from an affidavit of the secretary to the Incorporated Law Society that the society is managed by a council elected annually by the members, but that the members individually take no part in controlling or managing the affairs of the society. Burton, though a member of the society, was not a member of the council, and he therefore had no power to interfere with or control its proceedings, nor did he in any way have any voice in the institution or the conduct of the prosecution of the defendant. It was further stated that no part of the penalty was, or is, ever received by the society in such a case, and that the said John Burton could not in any way be benefited pecuniarily or otherwise by the success of the prosecution of the defendant, nor could he in any way become liable for any costs or expenses in reference to the proceedings in the event of their failure.

Hollams (Frank Arnold with him) appeared to show cause against the rule.—The magistrate Burton was not disqualified from adjudicating in the matter. He did not possess any pecuniary interest in the matter from the fact that he was a member of the Incorporated Law Society (Reg. v. Justices of Deal, 30 W. R. 154, 45 L. T. Rep. 439), nor was he affected with interest or bias from the fact that he was a practising solicitor. Moreover, any objection under that head must be taken to have been waived, as no objection was taken on that ground at the trial by the solicitor who appeared for Young. Further, it could not be said that Burton was in any sense a prosecutor of the accused: Leeson v. General Medical Council, 38 W. R. 303, 43 Ch. D. 366.

Hextall, in support of the rule.—It is not necessary that there should be a real and actual bias and interest; all that is necessary to disqualify a justice is that there should be a reasonable apprehension of such. The mere fact that he was a practising solicitor and a member of the body in whose interest proceedings were taken, would be sufficient to disqualify him: Reg. v. Huggins and Another, 43 W. R. 329, [1895] 1 Q. B. 563. Further, the fact that if the prosecution were dismissed the Incorporated Law Society, of which the said Burton was a member, might be ordered to pay the costs of the proceedings is quite sufficient to establish a pecuniary interest on his part, and therefore a disqualification: Reg. v. Hammond, 12 W. R. 208, 9 L. T. Rep. 423; Reg. v. Gaisford, [1892] 1 Q. B. 381, 40 W. R. Dig. 107. Further, there is a reasonable apprehension of bias where one of the magistrates is by himself or by one of his agents a prosecutor. A person cannot be both judge and prosecutor. That rule is established, and is so severe that even an ordinary member of the prosecuting body, though not one of the managers of it, cannot be a judge: Company of Mercers and Ironmongers of Chester v. Bowker, 1 Str. 639; Reg. v. Fraser, 9 Times L. R. 613.

The learned counsel also referred to the following cases: Allinson v. General Medical Council, 42 W. R. 289, [1894] 1 Q. B. 750; Reg. v. Allan, 12 W. R. 423, 4 B. & S. 915; Reg. v. Henley, 40 W. R. 383, [1892] 1 Q. B. 504.

LAWRANCE, J.—In this case Mr. Hollams showed cause against a rule obtained on behalf of a person named Young, calling upon the justices of Tunbridge Wells to show cause why a conviction of Young should not be set aside. The facts of the case appear to be these: Young was convicted of the offence of pretending to be a solicitor. Undoubtedly he wrote a letter to somebody, threatening that if a sum of money which was said to be due from that person to someone else were not paid proceedings would be taken. This is the letter: "I am instructed by Mr. Summers, your late butler, to apply to you for a month's wages in lieu of notice, and if not forthcoming within seven days I shall take proceedings in the county court to recover the same." Upon that proceedings were taken against him in the name of the chief constable, but in fact taken by the committee of the Incorporated Law Society. Upon these proceedings being taken, Mr. Burton, who seems to be a practising solicitor, was sitting upon the bench. Mr. Burton, I think, was the chairman of the magistrates who were present upon that occasion, and this rule was obtained upon the ground that Mr. Burton was in some way interested so as to make it improper that he should be a member of the court deciding the case.

Now, I quite agree with what was said, by Wills, J. (I would rather use his language than mine), in The Queen v. Huggins, that it is impossible to overrate the importance of keeping the administration of justice by magistrates free from any suspicion of unfairness. It is desirable that those who are thought to have an interest of any kind in a case should not take part in it. The question here is whether this case comes within the principle in the cases in which it has been held that the presence of a person so interested would reduce the proceedings to a nullity. One of three things must be present in order to render such a state of things improper. First, there must be bias or the probability—the strong probability, I ought to say, because it has been held that a possibility of bias is not sufficient—but a probability of bias on the part of the person who is about to adjudicate in the particular case. There is no suggestion here, as I understand—indeed it would be rather difficult after reading that letter to make one—upon the affidavits that Mr. Burton did not act bonâ fide, and act as anybody else would. I do not say that is enough, but there is no suggestion of any bias. But it is said the fact of his being a practising solicitor, and the accused being a person who pretended to be a solicitor, would show a bias which prevented Mr. Burton sitting. Another thing which would make it improper for a person to occupy a position on the bench trying a case would be that he is interested pecuniarily or otherwise. It is said here with regard to Mr. Burton that he was interested, because not only was he a practising solicitor, but he was also a member of the Incorporated Law Society. Then the third head of impropriety, if I may so call it, is that if a person is taking any leading part in a prosecution himself he cannot hear the cause—that is to say, a man cannot be prosecutor and judge in the same cause. I was party to a decision in a fishery case, where a person at a meeting got up and proposed that proceedings should be taken against a person who was afterwards convicted, and having set the law in motion he appears at one end of it, and appears at the other end of it by adjudicating upon the case. It was held there that the conviction could not be sustained.

I will deal with Mr. Hextall's arguments in the order in which he advanced them. The first was that Mr. Burton was a practising solicitor, and he cites The Queen v. Huggins to show that he ought not to have sat. The Queen v. Huggins becomes important, as I will show in a moment. It was a case where a qualified pilot was sitting upon the bench to inquire into a charge against an unqualified pilot, and the ground upon which it was put was not that a person who was interested in that way was not to sit, but upon the ground that there were only six qualified pilots in that particular district, and Wills, J., specially guards himself by saying that, being a member of a small class made all the difference in the case, and then he puts this case. He says, supposing the six pilots had been all unlicensed pilots, nobody can doubt that that would have been an improper tribunal, and, there only being six licensed pilots, he says that to the presence of one of them there the same objection must exist as if they had been all unlicensed pilots. That is the ground that it is put upon. Wills, J., says: "It appears that Martin belongs to a small class of privileged persons for whose protection these proceedings were being taken."

What renders it unnecessary to deal further with this first point is that, when I called the attention of Mr. Hextall to the question of the waiver, he admitted that there was a waiver with regard to Mr. Burton being a practising solicitor, but not with regard to his being a practising solicitor and a mem- of the Incorporated Law Society. Therefore upon that ground it becomes unnecessary to decide the first point.

Then it is said that he had a pecuniary interest, because an order for costs might have been made against the society of which he was a member. The way in which it is put is an extremely ingenious one. It has been pointed out that he only subscribes a certain amount to the funds of the society, and has no interest in the Incorporated Law Society more than that. Then Mr. Hextall says: "Yes, but the time might come when the society would be dissolved; and, if it were dissolved, then the funds in their hands would be divided pro rata among all the members; and, if the costs were given against them, at some future date there might be some infinitesimal interest which Mr. Burton would have, or there might be some interest coming to Mr. Burton." Now, the answer to that is the case of The Queen v. The Mayor and Justices of Deal. That was a case where the person "had been convicted and fined for cruelty to a horse, upon the prosecution of an officer of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Some of the justices who heard the summons and took part in the conviction were subscribers to a branch of the said society, which received subscriptions in the country and forwarded them to the society's office in London. All prosecutions by the society were directed by the secretary or committee in London, and no subscribers had any authority over or responsibility for such prosecutions, and the society never accepted any part of the penalties inflicted under the Cruelty to Animals Prevention Act, 1849, ss. 2, 18, 21. Held, upon a rule for a certiorari, that there was nothing in these facts to create a real bias in the minds of the justices which could amount to a disqualifying interest." In this case we hear that being a member of the Incorporated Law Society gives no power either to institute prosecutions, or to take any part in, or to use any influence in regard to them. That is all done by the committee, and therefore it is said that Mr. Burton had no power in the institution of these proceedings. The same point was taken there. It was said in that case there might be a pecuniary interest if costs were given against the society, or if the penalty were paid into the funds of the society; and that, therefore, that would be a pecuniary interest in the persons who belonged to it. One of the learned judges seems to make a distinction because this was only a branch of the society, but I myself cannot see the distinction. I suppose it was a part of the London society to all intents and purposes. What Cave, J., says with regard to that is this: "Any pecuniary interest, however slight or remote, is sufficient to disqualify, but here there seems to be none. Although the society's funds may be liable for the costs or be benefited by a penalty, the subscribers would not be thereby affected." That seems to me to be precisely the position here. No benefit is likely to accrue to Mr. Burton, excepting the very unlikely and remote possibility when the Law Society shall be dissolved. In the case referred to, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was in existence, and there was no question as to their sharing the funds of the society, but there was what would come much nearer to that — there was a chance of being called upon to pay the costs or of receiving the penalties. It was said there that they were not in the habit of receiving the penalties, and Field and Cave, JJ., although I cannot cast my eye upon the particular expressions they use, found that the liability to pay the costs would not be such an interest as to disqualify the magistrate. I think that the same reasoning applies here. There is no probability whatever of the Incorporated Law Society coming to an end. The infliction of costs would make no difference whatever to an ordinary member of the society, and the question of penalty does not arise; and, if it did, the penalty would go into the funds of the society, and make no difference to the individual member.

Then it is said, thirdly, that the society was prosecuting, and that Mr. Burton was a member of the society. That is dealt with, I think, in the case of Allinson v. The General Council of Medical Education and Registration. That case was a strong case in this sense—that the inquiry in that case was instituted at the instance "of a society called the Medical Defence Union, whose objects were 'to support and protect the character and interests of medical practitioners.'" One member of the council who took part in the inquiry had been a member and a vice-president of this society, and as vice-president was an ex officio member of the committee. He had, however, never attended any of the meetings of the committee, and until after he had been elected a member of the council he did not know that proceedings were being taken against the plaintiff. He was elected a member of the council on the 3rd of May, and on the same day he sent in his resignation of his membership of the Defence Union. By the articles of association of that society, any member might withdraw by giving two months' notice of his intention so to do; and, upon the expiration of such notice he shall cease to be a member. The inquiry was held on the 28th of May. Held, that such member of the council was not disqualified from taking part in the inquiry. What was done was this: He was a member of the council, if I understand the facts of the case, at the time that the inquiry was entered into. He did not continue a member of the council, but he was one of the persons prosecuting in so far as he was a member of the council, who only had a right to prosecute, and the fact of his ceasing to be a member of the council seems to me to make no difference. The question was whether he was engaged in the prosecution, and it was held by the court that was no disqualification.

I think here there was no bias. I think there was no interest, pecuniary or otherwise; and I do not think that Mr. Burton was engaged in any sense in the prosecution—that is to say, was so actively engaged in the prosecution as to disqualify him from sitting as a magistrate.

It is said in the affidavit of the solicitor for the defendant that if he had known that Mr. Burton was a member of the Incorporated Law Society he would not have tried the case before him. He knew he was a practising solicitor, and one would rather draw the inference that the reason he gave for not taking an objection to him on that ground would have been sufficient ground for him not taking the objection to his being a member of the Incorporated Law Society if it was a bonâ fide objection. However that may be, I do not think a case has been made out against this gentleman. We should be careful that the fountain of justice should be untainted in any way, and if I thought that the line was over-stepped at all here I should not hesitate to say so; but I think that this case does not come within the principle of the cases which have been decided upon the question of interest or bias. Therefore, in my judgment, this rule should be discharged.

COLLINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is contended that Mr. Burton was disqualified from sitting, on the ground of interest. That general ground is sub-divided into two. It is said, first of all, that he was a practising solicitor; and secondly, that he was a member of the Incorporated Law Society. Now, the second of those two objections is also sub-divided into these two points: that, being a member of the Incorporated Law Society, he was at once judge and prosecutor; and further, that he had a pecuniary interest in the result. To deal with those objections in order; first of all the objection that he was a solicitor was waived. That fact was known to the solicitor who represented the person accused, and being known, the objection was not taken, and after the hearing the justices were asked to state a case. So that it is perfectly clear that this case must be dealt with on the footing that all objections special to the fact that he was a practising solicitor are eliminated from the case. There remains then the objection that he was a member of the Incorporated Law Society, that objection being, as I pointed out, divisible into the two heads I have named. As to the first of those two, was he really prosecutor as well as judge? Judge he was undoubtedly. Was he prosecutor? That depends upon his relation to the Incorporated Law Society. He was a country subscriber to the Incorporated Law Society. We have an affidavit from the secretary to the Incorporated Law Society, who tells us that the whole and sole responsibility for prosecutions rests with the council of the Law Society, of which this gentleman was not a member. He had no more to do with the prosecution than any individual in the court. It was undertaken without his knowledge or consent. He had no voice either in forwarding it or stopping it. Therefore he was in no sense really prosecutor. But that is not enough, because, although we may be absolutely assured that he had no bias as prosecutor, we must go still further than that in order to put him in the position of a person who is entitled to adjudicate upon this matter. To use the language of the Master of the Rolls in what now must be regarded as the leading case upon this particular subject—namely, Allinson v. The General Council of Medical Education and Registration—he says, "The person alleged to be biassed must bear such a relation to the matter that he cannot be reasonably suspected of being biassed." He puts that qualification upon the language used by Mellor, J., which has been so often quoted in The Queen v. Allan—namely, "It is highly desirable that justice should be administered by persons who cannot be suspected of improper motives." The Master of the Rolls qualifies that by the words I have read, and that he must bear such a relation to the matter that he cannot be reasonably suspected of being biassed. In that case he came to the conclusion, and the other Lords Justices agreed with him, that Mr. Allinson's relation to the society was such that he could not be reasonably suspected of being biassed. I think that all that is said in support of that conclusion in Allinson's case can be said more freely in the present case. Dr. Allinson was an ex officio member of the committee who instituted the proceedings, although he had never attended it. Although he had resigned, there was some question whether his resignation was effectual at the time he made it. The case was decided by myself in the first instance, and my judgment was confirmed by the Court of Appeal. It seems to me here that Mr. Burton's relation to the council gives less ground for any shadow of suspicion than there was even in Allinson's case.

That disposes of the two first points, and there remains the point of the possibility of pecuniary interest. As to the possibility of pecuniary interest, we must draw our inferences from the facts before us, and, recurring again to the affidavit of the secretary to the Law Society, I find it stated: "No part of the penalty was or is ever received by the society in such cases, and I say that the said John Burton could not in any way be benefited, pecuniarily or otherwise, by the success of the prosecution of the said Alfred Young, nor could he in any way have become liable for the costs in the event of the proceedings failing." That is a statement upon oath by the person knowing the constitution of the Law Society. Although I fully agree that actual pecuniary interest, however slight, will defeat the right of justices to sit in judgment, I think that interest must be actual—it must not be purely speculative and imaginary, based upon conditions barely conceivable, and certainly not conceivable as likely to exist within the life-time of the person who is said to be interested in the funds of the society—Mr. Burton in this case. It is suggested that if this corporation, to which he is a subscribing member, were dissolved, there might be a distribution of assets, and that on that distribution the share of Mr. Burton might be more or less according to whether a penalty was received or costs made payable out of the funds of the society. I think that argument is sufficiently dealt with in the passage which has been referred to by my brother in the judgments of Field and Cave, JJ., in The Queen v. Justices of Deal, where they distinguish the position of a shareholder whose fortunes are tied to the company, from that of a subscriber whose liability can be no more or less than his subscription. Dealing with the two points—both the right to receive the penalty if one is awarded, or the obligation to pay costs if costs are awarded against him—both the learned judges deal with those two elements—Field, J., with one, Cave, J., with both. Field, J., says this: "With regard to a pecuniary interest, however remote, however slight, the authorities are clear that, when it exists, the person possessing it is necessarily disqualified. Here it is said that such an interest must be inferred from the fact that the justices have powers, by section 21 of the Act, to direct a moiety of the penalty to be given to the society of which they are contributors." It is so stated in the case before us now, but the learned judge goes on: "Even if it were otherwise, and some of the penalty upon conviction were to go to the funds of the society, it is impossible to hold that subscribers to a branch having no control over, or responsibility for, the funds of the parent society, could have any pecuniary interest in such penalty." Now that case finds that, although the subscriptions were payable in the country to these affiliated societies, they were forwarded to the central office in London, and apparently there was no division of funds between the central society and its branches. Cave, J., deals with both points. He says this: "Any pecuniary interest, however slight or remote, is sufficient to disqualify; but here there seems to me to be none. Although the society's funds may be liable for the costs or be benefited by a penalty, the subscribers would not be thereby affected." I think, taking the facts deposed to on affidavit, and taking those pronouncements on the part of those two judges. I am perfectly justified in saying here that I can find no evidence of any pecuniary interest in Mr. Burton.

I have now dealt with all the points, and I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged.

BRICKWOOD & CO. (Appellants).
REYNOLDS (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) (Respondent). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Profits of trade—Deductions—Money expended for repairs of premises—Money expended for purpose of trade—Brewers—Tied houses—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D., case 1, r. 3; cases 1 and 2, r. 1.

The appellants, a brewery company, were owners of a number of tied public-houses, which they had acquired for the purpose of increasing their trade. The tied houses were in the occupation of the appellants' tenants in part for the purpose of the trade of publicans and in part as the private dwelling apartments of themselves and their families. The appellants, in making up their return of profits for assessment to the income tax, sought to deduct the sum which they had spent in repairing the tied houses.

Held, that they were not entitled to make such a deduction.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Ridley, J.) on a special case stated by Commissioners of Income Tax.

At a meeting of the commissioners for general purposes held at Portsmouth on the 1st of December, 1896, for the purpose of hearing appeals under the Income Tax Acts for the year ending the 5th of April, 1897, Messrs. Brickwood & Co., a limited company carrying on business as brewers, appealed against an assessment of £20,973 made on them under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, Schedule D., in respect of the profits of their trade. They claimed to have the assessment reduced by the sum of £1,492, being the balance of a sum of £2,496 expended by them in the repair of certain licensed houses of which they were the owners and which they had let to tenants, after deducting from such sum £1,004, being one-sixth of the annual value of such houses under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, Schedule A.

The appellants had from time to time, in order to increase their trade, bought licensed houses, which they let to tenants under written agreements, one of the terms thereof being that such tenants should buy from the appellants all the ale, beer, and other malt liquors and spirits which should be consumed or sold in such houses.

The profits of the appellants were earned by manufacturing ale, beer, and other articles and selling them in part to private individuals, in part to the owners of what are generally known as "free" licensed houses, and in part to the tenants of their "tied" licensed houses—that is to say, the houses owned and let to tenants by them under the circumstances above stated. The whole of the profits so made were included in the assessment. Such profits had been materially increased by the increased sale of their goods due to the possession by them of their tied houses and also by their having been able to obtain and having in fact obtained for the same class of goods a higher price from the tenants of their tied houses than they obtained or were able to obtain from their other customers.

In no case had the tenants of their tied houses as a fact spent any money on the repairs to the tied houses let to them. Such repairs as from time to time became necessary to such houses were executed by the appellants, and after deducting that portion of the cost which had been in the nature of capital outlay, or which had tended to the permanent improvement of the premises, the balance properly attributable to revenue was the sum of £2,496 above mentioned.

The tied houses in question were in the possession of the tenants in part for the purpose of the trade of licensed victuallers and beer retailers, and in part as the private dwelling apartments of themselves and their families. The repairs in question had been executed indifferently to both parts of such houses.

In addition to their tied houses the appellants owned other licensed houses which they had during the year occupied by their managers or servants, and in respect of these and of the brewery and other premises admittedly occupied by the appellants for the purpose of their trade they had been allowed for repairs before the assessment was made the full sum to which they were entitled under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, first case, r. 3. They had also received in respect of the whole of the licensed houses owned by them the deduction from the annual value under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, Schedule A., to which they were entitled under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 35. Such deduction had, in the case of their licensed houses not let to tenants, and of their brewery and other premises aforesaid, been made before ascertaining the allowance to be made to the appellants for repairs under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, first case, r. 3.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants: (a) That the purchasing and letting of licensed houses was an essential part of their business of brewers, and alternatively that it was a separate business; (b) that but for such purchasing and letting their profits as assessed under Schedule D. would not and could not have been earned; (c) that the repairs in question were a necessary outlay without which such profits could not have been earned, and formed a legitimate deduction in arriving at the balance of profits and gains in respect of which they were chargeable under Schedule D.; and (d) that the tied houses in question were "occupied" for the purpose of their trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, within the meaning of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, first case, r. 3, and that in this respect there was no distinction between such houses and those licensed houses which, being owned by the appellants, were not let to tenants but were conducted on their behalf by their managers or servants.

The surveyor of taxes contended: (a) That the tied houses in question were not "occupied" by the appellants within the meaning of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, first case, r. 3; and (b) that the appellants must be deemed to have executed the repairs in question not qua traders but qua landlords, and that as such they had received the one-sixth deduction from the annual value under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, Schedule A., to which they were entitled under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 35.

The commissioners were of opinion that upon the facts above stated the tied houses were not occupied by the appellants within the meaning of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, first case, r. 3, and that the appellants were not entitled to the deduction claimed.

The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the commissioners, and gave judgment for the Crown.

The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Danckwerts, for the Crown.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. The appellants are brewers, and, like most brewers, they have tied houses, and they make their profits by selling their beer, first, to the public; secondly, to untied houses; and, thirdly, to their tied houses. The effect of a house being tied is that they are enabled to sell more beer than they would otherwise do, and they also get a better price for beer sold to a tied house than for beer sold in the other two ways. It is found as a fact in the case that the appellants have been buying tied houses for the purpose of increasing their trade. The question arises, how are they to return an account of their gains and profits under Schedule D. of the Income Tax Acts. It is said that inasmuch as they have let these tied houses to tenants, who have not contracted to repair, the appellants are entitled in estimating their gains and profits to deduct therefrom the cost of repairing the tied houses. I quite agree with what my brother Hawkins said at the end of his judgment in Watney v. Musgrave, that the trade of a brewery and the trade of a public-house are two distinct things, and that the expense incurred in respect of the latter cannot be deducted from the profit of the former. In this case the brewers suggest that, inasmuch as they keep up the independent trade of the publican, the cost of repairing his house is to be deducted from the profits of their trade. I am clearly of opinion that that argument is ill-founded and cannot prevail.

It appears to me that the Attorney-General is right in contending that there is an express prohibition to be found in the Income Tax Acts against the deduction which is now sought to be made. Without going through Schedule D., I will come at once to rule 1. under the first case in section 100 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, which relates to Schedule D. It says: "The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, upon a fair and just average of three years." Then rule 3 says: "No sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied"—I think the clear meaning of that is, occupied by the person assessed—"for the purpose of such trade"—that is, for the purposes of the trade of the person assessed—"beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes according to an average of three years." The section, though drafted in the form of a prohibition, contains a permission; such a deduction may be allowed for repairs of premises occupied by the party assessed for the purposes of his trade. The present case does not come within the permission, and therefore it is within the prohibition. We may also refer to the first of the rules applying to the first and second cases, which says: "In estimating the balance of the profits or gains to be charged according to either of the first or second cases, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains, for any disbursements or expenses whatever not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade." It is impossible, in my judgment, to say that the whole of the money spent on the repairs of these tied houses was laid out exclusively for the purposes of the appellants' trade. I am, therefore, of opinion that the deduction cannot be allowed.

DAWSON v. THE AFRICAN CONSOLIDATED LAND AND TRADING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Directors—Qualification—Casual vacancy—Calls on shares—Invalidity.

A clause in the articles of association of the A. Co. provided that any acts done at any meeting of the directors should, notwithstanding that it should be afterwards discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of such directors, or that they were disqualified, be as valid as if every such person had been duly appointed and was qualified to be a director.

N., who had been duly appointed a director of the A. Co., transferred all his shares, and for a few days was without a director's qualification. After re-acquiring his qualification he, without being formally re-elected, acted as a director, and, in conjunction with his co-directors, made a call on the shares.

Held (reversing Ridley, J.), that the acts done by N. in his capacity of a director were validated by the clause in the articles of association (as above set out).

Further, the clause operates not only as between the company and its members, but also as between the company and third parties.

Howbeach Coal Co. v. Teague, 8 W. R. 264, 5 H. & N. 151, explained.

Appeal of the defendants (other than A. Bifeldt) from an order of Ridley, J. (sitting as vacation judge).

Ridley, J., granted an injunction restraining the defendant company and the three other defendants, Thomas Thompson, A. B. Nielsen, and E. G. Sanders, until judgment in the action or further order, from forfeiting, or declaring forfeited, all or any portion of the shares held by the plaintiff and the other shareholders in the company, and from selling, or allotting, or otherwise disposing of such shares, or any of them, and from taking or continuing proceedings to recover the amount of an alleged call of 3s. on each share which had been made, or alleged to have been made, by the defendants, Thompson, Nielsen, and Sanders, and from parting with any proceeds of the call money in their hands, or to be received under the call.

The directors' resolution making the call was alleged to be invalid because Nielsen, who had been a director and purported to be one of the directors making the call had ceased to hold any shares from the 17th to the 23rd of June, 1897, and had never been formally re-elected a director after again acquiring his qualification. Further objection was made because Thompson was stated to be an undischarged bankrupt at the date of his appointment, and therefore vacated his seat on the board immediately on his appointment.

By article 90 of the articles of association the number of directors was to be not less than three, nor more than seven; and by article 93 "No person other than the first directors shall be qualified to be a director who is not the holder of shares of the company of the nominal value of £200."

Articles 96: "The office of a director shall be vacated . . . if he become bankrupt, or suspend payment, or compound with his creditors, . . . or or if he cease to hold the required amount of shares to qualify him for office."

Article 105: "Until otherwise determined, two directors shall be a quorum."

Article 114: "All acts done at any meeting of the directors, or of a committee of directors, or by any person acting as a director, shall, notwithstanding that it shall be afterwards discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of such directors or persons acting as aforesaid, or that they, or any of them, were disqualified, be as valid as if every such person had been duly appointed and was qualified to be a director."

The defendants appealed.

Alexander, Q.C., and W. Higgins, for the appellants.—The true construction of article 114 is that it validates the acts of persons who act as directors, though there may be some flaw in their appointment, and the intention is that all such trivial defects shall be rectified by the articles. They referred to Briton Medical General and Life Association v. Jones, 61 L. T. Rep. 384, 38 W. R. Dig. 35; Howbeach Coal Co. v. Teague, 8 W. R. 264, 5 H. & N. 151; and Palmer's Company Precedents, 6th ed., vol. 1, art. 111. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to In re London and Southern Counties Freehold Land Co., 34 W. R. 163, 31 Ch. D. 223.]

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the respondents.—It is quite clear there was a vacancy on the board, and no resolution was passed to fill it up, so that there were only two directors acting, and calls made by them would be ineffective. The defect was known to the directors on the 17th of June. [LINDLEY, M.R.—In York Tramways Co. v. Willows, 30 W. R. 624, 8 Q. B. D. 685, the Court of Appeal thought Howbeach Coal Co. v. Teague was wrong.]

No reply was called for.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This appeal is against an order of Ridley, J., granting an injunction restraining the defendants from forfeiting the shares and from selling or re-alloting such shares, and from taking proceedings to recover money raised by calls; and the ground upon which the motion was made before him was simply that there were a great number of alleged irregularities in the appointment of the directors making the call. Before us, other grounds have been urged to which I will allude presently. Now, these various suggestions of irregularity, when they come to be examined, are nothing more or less than small irregularities. There is no radical defect in any one of these points. Take one of them; take the best, the case of Neilsen. It appears that there were originally three directors appointed by the proper parties, by the subscribers to the memorandum of association. Those three were Bradford, Sanders, and Griffiths. Now nobody quarrels with their appointment. Bradford died on the 13th of April, 1897, and a Mr. Thompson was appointed director in his place under an article which clearly authorized that appointment, subject to the point that he was an undischarged bankrupt. What I mean is this, That it was a casual vacancy which the other two directors had power to fill, and they filled it up by appointing him. There was a meeting afterwards of the shareholders, and Mr. Thompson then retired and was re-elected. It was said that the shareholders did not know that he was an undischarged bankrupt; and our attention is called to a clause that a director vacates his appointment if he becomes bankrupt, but that clause does not apply to the facts with which we have to deal, and it appears to me to be perfectly competent for these shareholders if they chose to appoint Mr. Thompson. Mr. Neilsen was appointed in succession to Mr. Griffiths, who died in December, 1896. That was all right, and Mr. Neilsen was a competent man, and remained a competent man and a properly-qualified director till the 17th of June, 1897, when it appears that he transferred all his shares, and for five or six days from the 17th of June to the 23rd of June he had no shares. So under one of the articles of association he vacated his office. On the 23rd or 24th of June he acquired other shares and became qualified. There was a meeting of the directors on the 24th of June at which he was present and acted as a director. Then again there was a casual vacancy which the other two directors had power to fill up; and although it is true that they did not go through the form of passing a resolution appointing him a director, they accepted him as a director, and they allowed him to act as one; and when this call, which is impeached, was made—namely, on the 13th of June, 1897, it was made by Mr. Thompson, Mr. Sanders, and Mr. Neilsen; and Mr. Neilsen then was a properly-qualified director, so that this irregularity which is supposed to upset everything that was done is reduced to this, that two of the directors who might have passed the resolution appointing Mr. Neilsen did not go through the form of passing a resolution to appoint him, but acted with him as a duly-appointed director. If that is not an irregularity in his appointment such as is attempted to be cured by article 114, I cannot conceive what is. These objections are, to my mind, trivial and unbusinesslike, and have not a shade of substance in them, but they are technical defects which have been laid hold of for the purpose of upsetting what has been done.

Now I pass to article 114, which is that all acts done at the meeting of the directors, or at the committee of the directors, or by any person acting as a director, notwithstanding that it shall be afterwards discovered that there was some defect in the appointment of persons acting as aforesaid, or that they or any of them were disqualified, shall be as valid as if every such person had been duly appointed and was a qualified director. Now, it is reducing that clause to a nullity to say that it does not apply to such trumpery defects and trivial irregularities as those with which we have to deal here; but then we are told that we must, under the stress of the case of Howbeach Coal Co. v. Teague, hold that this article does not apply here. I do not understand how the case of Howbeach Coal Co. v. Teague can be cited as an authority to the effect that such an article as article 114 only applies to outsiders dealing bonâ fide with the company without notice. Of course it applies to and covers all such transactions, but there is nothing that I can discover in the judgments in that case which warrants the contention that this clause does not apply to calls and things of that kind as between the company on the one side and the shareholders on the other side. Howbeach Coal Co. v. Teague is intelligible up to a certain point, and as to the rest of it, it is so reported that I confess I do not thoroughly understand it. But the defect which the court put their finger down upon there was this, that it was said that the persons there who made the call had been improperly appointed by three out of seven of the subscribers to the memorandum of association, which was all wrong. It was all wrong, and the validating clause there, which was clause 60, which was similar in its terms to article 114 here, did not cure that radical defect in their appointment. The court having held that, upset the call and declared the call was invalid. So far it is plain enough, and that was the ratio decidendi, and that I follow perfectly well. Then comes a part of the case which I do not follow with equal ease. Granting that the appointment of these gentlemen was altogether wrong, as it obviously was, and granting that the validating clause there did not apply, I do not see myself that it necessarily follows that what they did, although they had been improperly appointed, would not be validated; and I do not see that any of the judges, in giving judgment in that case, addressed himself to that point. There may be very good grounds for it —it may be that the clause did not apply even to that, because there was no subsequent discovery about it. The whole thing was aboveboard and the defect was taken to be known to everybody. I do not know how that may be, but it is no authority to my mind for the proposition for which it was put forward; and which will alone assist the respondents in this case—namely, that article 114 does not apply to such matters as forfeiture of shares—that is to say, to matters between the company on the one side and the shareholders on the other. I cannot conceive why we should cut down such general language as that, and say that it applies only to outsiders, I think that is wrong. It appears to me, therefore, that these trumpery objections, whatever they might be worth, but for this clause—and I do not think they would be worth much if it were not for this clause—are absolutely nothing at all with it. Now, there is another point taken before us which is perhaps a much more serious one or would be a much more serious one if there were any evidence to support it. We are asked to restrain this proceeding of forfeiting shares and making calls and so on, because the calls had been made for an improper purpose, and not for the purpose of bonâ fide carrying on the business of the company, but for the purpose of recouping the people who have paid off the promoters under agreements which are sought to be rescinded. When you look at the writ, the writ impeaches the agreement. This is a case which might have become important. What we are told is this, that the agreement has been carried out and everything done under it, and it is a little difficult for one shareholder to sue on behalf of himself and others to rescind an agreement between the company on the one side and the promoters on the other, which the company might have chosen to carry out in form. That form of action has to be justified, and there is no justification that I can see, even for suggesting it. But apart from that there is no evidence to support such a case as this. It is a difficult case to prove, and it must be proved, if at all, at the trial. This is a mere suggestion of fraud and misconduct—a mere suggestion as to which we have nothing reliable to act upon. This part of the case was not dealt with by the learned judge in the court below at all, and we are left to deal with it as best we can. We have heard Mr. Bramwell Davis describe what took place in the court below, and it is far from sufficient to enable us to grant an injunction. The appeal must be allowed, and the order discharged with costs here and below.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. One word as to the 114th article in the articles of association. That clause in the articles is not framed so as to render valid a resolution passed by any persons who assumed to act as directors of a company. As to the case which was put by Mr. Stewart Smith during the argument that it necessarily follows that where any three or four persons went into the board-room and said, "Here we are directors," and they passed a resolution that the clause would, according to the contention on the other side, support their acts and make them valid; the mere reading of the clause disposes of that. The clause is addressed, as is shewn by these words, "notwithstanding some defect in the appointment of the directors or persons acting as aforesaid" to cases of that kind. The point arose on the facts with reference to Neilsen, and Neilsen was six days without the qualification—namely, from the 17th to the 23rd of June. There is no evidence whatever to show that the other two directors were aware that he had parted with all his shares so as no longer to hold his qualification. It is rightly said, upon reading the articles, that he ceased to be a director because he ceased to hold the qualification of shares, but on the 23rd of June he held the qualification, and he went on acting as director with the other directors, and to take the material date, the 24th of June, when the resolution for the call was passed, they treated him as a director. They had not appointed him formally, the power to do so being vested in them on the occasion, but they appointed him and treated him as a director. There cannot be the slightest question that if the defect had been pointed out they would have appointed him then and there to fill up the vacancy. Now, the exact point here is the defect in the appointment. There is no defect in the appointment if you treat him as appointed originally. The defect was that he had become disqualified. It was agreed that there was no distinction between the defect in the appointment and the words relating to disqualification; but the words are "disqualification" and not "non-qualification at the time of appointment," which plainly refers to subsequent loss of the qualification which is required in order to enable him to act as a director. That is exactly within the words of the article. It is just one of those defects, irregularities, or whatever name of that kind one ought to call them by, which is protected by the clause. It is then said the article is not to operate as between the company on the one hand and the members of the company on the other, it is only to be applied to outsiders.

The answer to that is that on the clause itself no such distinction is made. Whether in any case a distinction might be taken is quite another matter. It cannot be taken upon the facts of this case, and I am quite satisfied that the article does apply as between the company on the one hand and the member who is being sued for a call in the present case on the other. It is hardly necessary to add any words about the Howbeach case. There it was quite plain that the directors who were purporting to act, and whose appointment was derived from the acts of the signatories, were not well appointed, and it may well be in that case that, having regard to the 60th clause, the court considered that that was not a defect within the meaning of the 60th clause. The reasons are not given by the learned judges why they said that the 60th clause in that case did not apply. It is quite open to say that in that particular case the appointment was so radically bad that it did not fall within the protection. For these reasons, and in conformity with what has fallen from the Master of the Rolls, I think that all these points with reference to irregularity and the like fall to the ground and are abortive, and I think it is quite unnecessary to go through any somewhat similar matters which have been mentioned. This seems to me to be the only one that requires anything like a formal judgment. Then there is the other point which was put forward at the bar before us on this appeal, that the call was made for a fraudulent or improper purpose, that the directors made the call in the interests of some one of them, and that the call on that ground could not be supported. Having regard to the position of the company as well as other matters it would require a strong case on the motion to justify us in saying that in such circumstances the call was fraudulently made. The simple answer that we have to give is that the evidence has not proved in any material degree the kind of case that was shadowed out by the counsel for the respondents. I reserve to myself the full power of considering whether three shareholders can sue effectively on any such materials as have been presented to us for the rescission of the company's contract. But really the point does not arise, because there is no case brought forward to show a preponderating control over the company's affairs by those who now have the direction of them. Nothing of the sort has been presented to us which would justify two or three of the shareholders instituting this action against the company and asking that the company's contract should be rescinded.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. I only wish to say that it is not necessary to decide anything about the true meaning of the words "afterwards discovered," because, as the Master of the Rolls has already pointed out, in this case there is no evidence whatever that the directors did know of this defect at the time of the passing of the resolution in question.

Appeal allowed.

DURRANT v. BRANKSOME URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Drainage—Surface water—Pu[illegible] Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 15, [illegible] 17, 308.

A local authority has power to make such sewers [illegible] may be necessary for draining their district, and [illegible] carry such sewers into, through, or under any la[illegible] whatsoever within their district, provided that the wa[illegible] conveyed by them is free from all excrementitious or o[illegible] foul or noxious matter.

Surface water charged with sand or silt is not wit[illegible] the above proviso, and may be discharged by a lo[illegible] authority into a natural stream or watercourse.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

(a.) Reported by W. SHALLCROSS GODDARD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal of the plaintiffs from a decision of North, J.

The plaintiffs, as trustees, are the owners of the Durrant estate, a large building estate situate partly in Bournemouth and partly in the district of the defendant council. The river Bourne flows through the plaintiffs' property, the present channel of the river being in a great measure artificial. The defendants had recently made up certain roads in their district, and had drained the surface water into the Bourne, where it passed through the Durrant estate. Part of the drainage works as completed in June, 1895, and part in October, 1895.

By reason of the drainage the plaintiffs complained that the increased flow of water caused flooding and an extra deposit of sand and silt, and claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from causing or permitting any water with sand, silt, or other solid matter to flow or be carried through any channels, &c., or other works constructed by the defendants into the Bourne.

The defendants, while pleading that they were entitled to discharge their surface-water into the Bourne, denied the damage, and submitted that if any damage did arise it would be a case for compensation under section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The defendants further relied upon their statutory powers under the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Private Streets Works, Act, 1892 (which had been adopted by them).

Section 15 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides that "Every local authority shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act." By section 16, "Any local authority may carry any sewer through, across, or under any turnpike road, or any street or place laid out as or intended for a street, or under any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriageway of any street, and, after giving reasonable notice in writing to the owner or occupier (if on the report of the surveyor it appears necessary), into, through, or under any lands whatsoever within their district." By section 17, "Nothing in this Act shall authorize any local authority to make or use any sewer, drain, or outfall for the purpose of conveying sewage or filthy water into any natural stream or watercourse, or into any canal, pond, or lake, until such sewage or filthy water is freed from all excrementitious or other foul or noxious matter such as would affect or deteriorate the purity and quality of the water in such stream or watercourse, or in such canal, pond, or lake." And by section 308, "Where any person sustains any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act, in relation to any matter as to which he is not himself in default, full compensation shall be made to such person by the local authority exercising such powers." By section 9 of the Private Streets Works Act, 1892, "The urban authority may include in any works to be done under this Act with respect to any street or part of a street any works which they think necessary for bringing the street or part of a street, as regards sewerage, drainage, level, or other matters, into conformity with any other streets (whether repairable or not by the inhabitants at large), including the provision of separate sewers for the reception of sewage and of surface water respectively."

North, J., held that the defendants were justified in doing what they had done by virtue of the sections of the Acts above set out, and dismissed the action, with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Hadley, for the appellants.—The result of the judgment of North, J., is that he has forgotten that the stream is artificial and not natural at these places. Even if the defendants have a statutory right to discharge water on our land, they have no statutory right to discharge sand and silt with the water. Section 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is not an enabling section, but prohibitive, and does not authorize this deposit of sand and silt: Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board, 28 W. R. 111, 12 Ch. D. 102; Ainley v. Kirkheaton Local Board, 60 L. J. Ch. 734, 40 W. R. Dig. 133; Attorney-General v. Cockermouth Local Board, 22 W. R. 619, L. R. 18 Eq. 172. There is no statutory duty on the defendants to construct sewers at all, and the principle of Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill, 29 W. R. 617, 6 App. Cas. 193, applies. Moreover, there has been no report of a surveyor, as directed by section 16 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Rowden, for the defendants, were not called upon, on their admission, in answer to the court, that if they injured the plaintiffs they were entitled to compensation under section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It appears to me that the learned judge was quite right in the construction he has put upon these sections of the Public Health Act, 1875. It is, however, very important to bear in mind that by section 308 the plaintiffs, if they are damnified by what has been done, can obtain compensation. Section 308 throws a great deal of light on any language that may be ambiguous in the clause I will refer to presently: "Where any person sustains any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act in relation to any matter as to which he is not himself in default, full compensation shall be made," and so on. Then we have to consider sections 15, 16, and 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875. It is admitted that all these roads which the defendants are draining into this Bourne are in the district of the defendants. With reference to the point made about the Poole-road, I think it comes to nothing at all. But when you look at the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 11, clause 4, it appears to me that the road is just as much a road within the district, as to which the defendants are under duties and have powers, as if it were not a main road at all. I say no more about it, because it is obvious, when you read the section, that there is nothing in the point at all. Now, what have they done? The plaintiffs have evidently canalized the bog which did exist up this Bourne which runs through Bournemouth, and in 1877 they drained that bog and cut this ditch (for it is not much more, about four feet wide) into the old Bourne, which did not come up so high. It is an artificial stream which was made by them in the year 1877. Why it is not properly described as a canal I do not know.

Now, section 15 imposes on the defendants the duty of making such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act, and, by the definition clause, "sewer" does not mean a sewer for the conveyance of filth alone —human excrement and so on, but for drainage purposes. The word "sewer' is contrasted with "drain." The word "drain" means something applicable to one house, and a sewer to more. They are draining certain roads in their district, and they are making what, under the Act of Parliament, is called a sewer. The duty of doing that is thrown on them. Now, section 16 is important. That gives them powers which enable them to perform that duty. Section 16 enables them to—[His lordship read the section, and continued:] Now, Mr. Hadley has raised a point which I will notice here and deal with. He says that there has been no report made by the surveyor. If that point had been raised, there might have been something in it. It might have caused a temporary delay, and if the defendants had insisted that they had a right to do what they are doing without the report of the surveyor they probably would be wrong, but obviously this action was not brought on the ground thas there has been no report of the surveyor, but for the far more important purpose of contesting this alleged right of the defendants. However, I pass that over. In point of fact there is no notice and no report of the surveyor. Nothing turns on that at all. Then the word "lands" here is, by the definition clause, extended so as to mean any tenement or hereditament, and obviously includes land covered with water. There is a further portion of section 16 which does not refer to this case, and which refers to what the defendants may do out of their district. Then comes section 17 which, as I understand it, is not an enabling section although the inference to be drawn from that section, taken in connection with the enabling section, is very strong. Section 17 is a prohibitive clause—[His lordship read it, and continued:] I read that shortly in this way: Notwithstanding the enabling clause to which I have referred you shall not pour filth into any natural or artificial stream or watercourse. Now, what is the inference? The inference is that you may pour any other water into any natural or artificial stream or watercourse. That is the inevitable inference from the 16th and 17th sections; and, to my mind, that is the view taken by the learned judge. It is said that he has not referred specifically to section 16, but it is not to be supposed for a moment that he was deciding this case on section 17 without reference to the sections preceding it, and without which it means nothing at all. Taking all these sections together, I think that the defendants are in the right and the plaintiffs are in the wrong, and, therefore, this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this case is a clear one. I have no doubt that the effect of what has been done by the defendants will be to bring a large quantity of silt or sand into the Bourne, a substantially larger quantity, at any rate, than came there before. According to the evidence, a considerable quantity must indirectly have gone into the Bourne before anything was drained into it by the defendants. What the defendants have done, and are about to do, is that what was carried through before will now be carried more effectively and directly. Whether you call it a watercourse or a canal, all I can say is, if it is not a watercourse, beyond all question it is a canal. Then the question arises: Does the Public Health Act of 1875 authorize the defendants in doing what they have done? In my opinion it clearly does; and whether it does or not depends on the construction to be placed on three sections in that Act—sections 15, 16, and 17. Now, section 15 is very large. It says every local authority "shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act." That is very clear, very distinct, and very large. "Sewer" is interpreted in the Act, and the interpretation is that it means every sewer and drain which is not expressly interpreted by the Act to be a drain. Then comes section 16, which is again most important. That is the section which confers powers for making these sewers. It says, "Any local authority may carry any sewer through, across, or under any turnpike road"—I need not read any more—and other places, and then come these words, "into, through, or under any lands whatsoever within their district." So that, according to that, first they are told they may cause sewers to be made, and then power is given them to carry them "into, through, or under any lands whatsoever within their district." Then section 17 is said to be an enabling section, but if it is an enabling section it is to a certain extent a prohibitive one. If there was any doubt upon the effect of what section 16 is, it would be made clear by section 17, which says: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] What is the irresistible inference to be drawn from that section, coupled as it is with section 16? It is, that if that which is conveyed does not contain those things which are prohibited, or, in other words, if it contains water free from those things, it expressly authorizes them to do it. In this particular case can it be said that there is anything noxious, or excrementitious, or foul that is carried in this water? All that is carried, according to the evidence, is sand and silt, the natural belongings, as it were, to water in a soil like this—nothing that is noxious, or nothing which would affect, or deteriorate, the purity of the water. It might make it muddy for the time, but in due course it would fall to the bottom, and leave the water as it would have been if that matter had not been brought there. But it has been suggested that the powers conferred by this Act, if carried into effect in the way they have been carried out by the defendants, would be harsh and unjust to a landowner in a similar position to the plaintiffs. There might be a good deal to be said about that if it were not for the 308th section of the Act, which appears to me to cover entirely any difficulty of that kind. That section says that full compensation is to be made to anybody who is not in default for any damage sustained by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act. That entirely meets, to my mind, that objection. With regard to the Poole-road, and the point that was taken with regard to the Poole-road, it is unnecessary to say anything further than this—that I think it is entirely met by section 11, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1888. I think, therefore, the decision of the learned judge was perfectly right, and this appeal should be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—The question raised on the appeal is whether the defendants, in exercising their statutory duties and powers, are justified in sending down sand and silt through their sewer into this Bourne? The Bourne is partly artificial, and as to the rest of it natural, although, I take it, so much of it as is natural has been subsequently improved in the course of time. The question turns upon sections 15, 16, 17, and 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875. I shall deal with them very shortly, because I have formed a clear opinion that the defendants are justified in what they are doing. The 15th section imposes on the local authority the duty of causing such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purpose of the Act to be made. The 16th section confers powers with reference to the carrying of the sewer that may be so made. The sewer as mentioned here, according to the definition, is not a sewer merely for carrying off foul and excrementitious matter and the like, but also for carrying off surface water. I agree with what has been already stated, that the word "lands" is used there generally not only by reason of the definition, and not only by reason of the ordinary common law that "land" includes land covered with water, but even if those two grounds should fail, and I think neither of them does fail, by reason of the 17th section itself, which may be read partly as a proviso and partly as an enabling clause. I will explain what I mean. Section 17 says: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] The first part of that is prohibitory, and it is by way of proviso of something that has gone before. The second part is explanatory. I do not say that, by itself, confers that power. I think the better reading is that the power is conferred by the 16th section, and in this portion of the section which says that the sewage is not to be poured in until it is freed from foul or noxious matter; the Legislature assumes it had already said something that would justify the pouring of pure water, or water not fouled or noxious, into the stream or canal.

On the question whether sand and silt come within these excepted words—namely, whether it is excrementitious or other foul or noxious matter, I cannot conceive that there is any question whatever. I think it does not. But whether this be a natural stream, as it may be in part, or whether it be water running in a canal, I think in either case, having regard to both parts of the case, the authority is conferred by the 16th section of the Act. The value of the 308th section is very great because, as a rule, Parliament does not interfere with private rights without compensation. It was properly admitted by Mr. Vernon Smith, and I express my opinion quite apart from the admission, that the 308th section does entitle the plaintiffs to obtain in the manner pointed out by the section, and not by action, compensation for any damage they may suffer by the sand and silt being increased through the operations of the defendants' works. I need not say anything about the Poole-road. I entirely concur with what has been said on that point. With reference to Mr. Hadley's point that the report of the surveyor had not been obtained, I am rather sorry that that point should have been even mentioned upon the appeal, because the action has not been brought in any way to determine such a question as that. It would, as Lindley, L.J., said, have only gone to a short delay, and it is not right, I think, to raise points of that kind upon an appeal. At any rate, in my opinion we ought to decide, as we do decide, this case without reference to the question thus raised.

Appeal dismissed.

HILL v. HICKEN. (a.)

Partition action — Occupying co-owner —Mortgage of share—Occupation rent—Set-off as against mortgagee.

Where one of several co-owners was in occupation of premises and mortgaged his share, and, on a partition action being subsequently brought, an inquiry was directed as to what was due from him in respect of such occupation,

Held, that the sum found to be due could only be set off against what the occupying co-owner was personally entitled to receive, and could not be set off to the detriment of his mortgagee.

This was a further consideration of a partition action.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

James Hicken, one of the defendants to the action, was owner in fee of three-twelfths of the hereditaments, the subject of the action, and as to other three-thirteenths tenant for life with remainder in fee to his two children, one of whom was Philip James Hicken.

On the 30th of October, 1890, James Hicken and Philip James Hicken executed a legal mortgage of their interests to secure £1,400.

On the 4th of December, 1890, the writ was issued in the action.

According to the statement of claim in the action, James Hicken was and had for some time been in occupation of the hereditaments in question, and it was asked that he should be charged with an occupation rent.

Judgment was given in the action on the 30th of January, 1892, and the ordinary accounts and inquiries were directed, including an inquiry what sum was due from the defendant James Hicken in respect of his occupation of the hereditaments since the 29th of September, 1890, having regard to any previous tenancy of the hereditaments.

On the 11th of July, 1893, the chief clerk made his certificate finding that the sum of £325, being rent at the rate of £150 per annum, was due from James Hicken as occupation rent.

The action now came on for further consideration, and the question arose whether this sum could be set off as against James Hicken's share in the premises to the detriment of his mortgagee.

Procter, for the plaintiffs.

Howard, for the mortgagee.—The legal mortgagee is in the same position as if he were a petitioner, and ought not to be charged with the rent. Heckles v. Heckles, W. N., 1892, p. 188, is the only authority on the point, and that was the case of an equitable mortgagee. [STIRLING, J., referred to Seton, p. 1541, form 19.]

A. H. Jessel (A. Underhill with him), for the defendants.—The present case is covered by Heckles v. Heckles.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 3.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts, and continued: The question is, Can this sum be set off as against James Hicken's share to the prejudice of Herbert Charles Owen, his mortgagee? The defendant, James Hicken, not having been tenant or bailiff of his co-owners, nothing could have been recovered from him at law; nor did the statute of Anne (4 Anne, c. 3, s. 27) apply: see Henderson v. Eason, 17 Q. B. 701. It has, however, long been the practice of the Court of Chancery to direct such inquiries as have been directed in the present case: see, as to occupation rent, Turner v. Morgan, 8 Ves. 145; and, as to expenditure on improvements, Swan v. Swan, 8 Price 518. The principle on which allowance for improvements is made is stated by Cotton, L.J., in Leigh v. Dickeson, 33 W. R. 538, 15 Q. B. D. 60. [His lordship read the judgment at p. 67 from "Therefore no remedy exists," and continued:] Where the property is sold the allowance is paid out of the proceeds of the whole property: In re Jones, [1893] 2 Ch. 461, at p. 476, 41 W. R. Dig. 143; In re Cook's Mortgage, 44 W. R. 646, [1896] 1 Ch. 923. The principle laid down by Cotton, L.J., does not apply to the occupation rent, and the question does not appear to have been discussed in any case. It is, no doubt, proper that where one of several co-owners is charged with an occupation rent he should not be allowed to take any part of the fund without paying what is charged against him; but, on the other hand, it does not seem right that the rent should be charged against a fund which does not belong to him. Suppose that an actual tenancy existed between one of the co-owners and the others, and an arrear of rent was due from him, I see no ground for saying that his co-owners would be entitled to have a charge on his share for those arrears. They may be entitled to insist that nothing should be paid to him personally until he has made good the arrears due from him; or, in other words, to have the arrears set off against what he personally would be entitled to receive. But this seems to me to be their whole right. Here there was no tenancy, but the court has ascertained what the occupying co-owner ought to pay in respect of his occupation; but it is difficult to see why the co-owner should be in a better position than if he had been their tenant. If, again, the co-owner had conveyed to a purchaser the share of which he was co-owner, I do not see how the rent could be charged as against what was coming to the purchasers. A legal mortgagee is for this purpose a purchaser pro tanto; and, if the mortgagee is to be charged with the rent, I do not see why a purchaser should not be charged with it also, assuming that the vendor is allowed to remain in possession. Upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that this rent ought not to be set off as against the mortgagee. The only cases which were cited to me in argument were Graham v. Cole, in Seton, p. 1541, where a declaration was made that "the share of the defendant, E. W. (wife), was liable to make good the sum of £ , being the £ by the chief clerk's certificate, dated, &c., certified to be due from the defendant, J. W. (husband), in respect of rent and occupation of the hereditaments, &c., from the death of B. down to the 4th of February, 1872, the £ appearing by the affidavit of, &c., to be due from the said defendant for occupation rent of the said hereditaments." As to that case we know nothing of the facts, and I think that it must have been decided under special circumstances. The other decision is one of my own, Heckles v. Heckles, which is only reported in the Weekly Notes for the 15th of December, 1892. That dealt with an equitable mortgage, and there may be differences between the case of an equitable mortgage and a legal mortgage; but, upon further consideration, I am not sure that that case is not wrong.

In re ASHTON.
INGRAM v. PAPILLON. (a.)

Appointment—Rule against double portions—Appointment by mother—Person in loco parentis.

A lady, under a special power for the purpose in her father's will, appointed by will £10,000 equally among her three children. Subsequently, by deed-poll, she appointed sums equal to one-third to one daughter.

Held, that the burden of proof lay on those who asserted that the mother intended to put herself in loco parentis to her daughter, and that, there being no proof that she did so intend, the rule against double portions did not apply, and the daughter was entitled to share in the unappointed residue equally with the other children.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees of the will of Samuel Ashton to determine the manner in which a legacy of £10,000, bequeathed to his daughter Elizabeth for life with a power of appointment, was payable, and raised the question whether the rule against double portions applies to the case of appointments made by a mother in favour of one of her children.

The testator, by his will dated the 11th of November, 1846, bequeathed £10,000 to his trustees upon trust for investment and payment of the income to his daughter Elizabeth for her separate use for life, and after her death in trust for all or any one or more of the children, grandchildren, or other issue of his said daughter in such shares and proportions as his said daughter, whether covert or sole, should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment to such children as and when they attained twenty-one years, or, if daughters, on marriage, in equal shares.

Provision was made for the case of there being no child, and the will contained a hotchpot clause.

The testator died in 1849. His daughter Elizabeth (then Mrs. Mackenzie) made her will on the 15th of August, 1879, and directed that the trustees of her father's will should stand possessed of the £10,000 legacy upon trust to divide the same equally between her three children, the defendant, Elizabeth Papillon, the plaintiff, A. M. Ashton, and Edith Loumyer.

On the 11th of June, 1881, Mrs. Mackenzie executed a deed-poll by which she irrevocably appointed that the trustees of her father's will should stand possessed of the said sum of £10,000 upon trust to raise thereout £2,000 and pay the same to the defendant, Elizabeth Papillon, as soon as conveniently might be after the death of the appointor.

By another deed-poll of the 7th of January, 1885, she made a similar appointment of £1,333 6s. 8d. also in favour of Mrs. Papillon.

Mrs. Mackenzie died on the 5th of December, 1896. She made two codicils to her will dated respectively the 31st of July, 1884, and the 4th of October, 1895, but neither of these codicils in any way affected the appointment of the £10,000 legacy made by the will.

G. Henderson, for the trustees.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and R. B. Phillpotts (W. F. Phillpotts with them), for Mrs. Papillon.—We are entitled to the £3,000 and one-third of the residue as well. The doctrine of election cannot be applied in the case of a limited power except where the testator has some property of his own to dispose of: Farwell on Powers, p. 384; Bristow v. Warde, 2 Ves. jun. 336; In re Fowler's Trust, 27 Beav. 362, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 54. Here there is no fund out of which compensation can be made, and where there is no compensation there is no election: In re Lord Chesham, 34 W. R. 321, 31 Ch. D. 466. The effect of an irrevocable appointment by deed over a fund the subject of a power is to take out of it that which is appointed: Wilson v. Piggott, 2 Ves. jun. 351. The doctrine of satisfaction and double portions does not apply here.

Buckley, Q.C., and Gore Brown, contra.—We submit that Mrs. Papillon has had the third to which she is entitled under the will. A person in loco parentis is presumed to intend to benefit all his children equally: Pym v. Lockyer, 5 My. & Cr. 29. [STIRLING, J.—Does that presumption arise in the case of a power, the object of which is to enable a parent to give more to one of his children than to another?] We submit that it does: In re Tussaud, 26 W. R. 874, 9 Ch. D. 363; Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., vol. 1, p. 216; Powys v. Mansfield, 3 My. & Cr. 359. [STIRLING, J.—Montague v. Montague, 15 Beav. 565, is apparently a case where the rule against double portions was held to apply to an appointment under a special power in the case of children.] [Hastings, Q.C., referred to Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 641.] We submit that this is a case of election: England v. Lavers, 15 W. R. 51, L. R. 3 Eq. 63; Chichester v. Coventry, 15 W. R. 849, L. R. 2 H. L. 71.

R. B. Phillpotts, in reply.—Montague v. Montague went on the special circumstances of that case: Walmsley v. Vaughan, 5 W. R. 549, 1 De G. & J. 114; In re Lacon, 39 W. R. 514, [1891] 2 Ch. 482. England v. Lavers and Chichester v. Coventry do not apply here. Ravenscroft v. Jones, 12 W. R. 362, 4 De G. J. & S. 224, qualifies the doctrine set up in Powys v. Mansfield.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28.—STIRLING, J.—The question is whether Mrs. Papillon is entitled to share in the unappointed portion of the £10,000 equally with her brother and sister, or only after giving credit for the sums of £2,000 and £1,333 6s. 8d. which she has received.

It was conceded in argument, and in my opinion rightly, that the facts raise no case of election on the part of Mrs. Papillon: see Bristow v. Warde, Montague v. Montague, Fowler's Trust. It was, however, strongly urged that the rule against double portions precluded her from sharing in the unappointed fund, without giving credit for the sums already received, and the question to be decided is whether the benefits conferred on her constitute portions to which the rule applies. These benefits were conferred on her by her mother under a power contained in the will of her grandfather, which enabled the donee to distribute the funds subject to the power amongst her children or other issue in such shares as she thought fit, the children who attained twenty-one or (as regards daughters) married, taking equally in default of appointment.

The rule against double portions is generally stated to apply to provisions made by a parent or person in loco parentis; but in all the cases, so far as they have been brought to my attention, the parent referred to is the father. In the well-known case of Powys v. Mansfield, 3 My. & Cr. 359, Lord Cottenham says: [His lordship read pp. 366-7 and 368, and continued:] Primâ facie the duty of making a provision for a child falls on the father, but may fall on or be assumed by some other person. I do not say that in no case and under no circumstances can the duty fall on or be assumed by the mother of the child; but it appears to me that the burden of proving such to be the case lies on those who assert the fact so to be.

In the present case the mother was distributing a fund derived under the will of her own father; and there is no evidence that either she or her father undertook the discharge of any such duty.

In my judgment, under these circumstances, the rule does not apply. But it is right that I should make some remarks as to the argument which was addressed to me as to the intention of the power being to enable unequal shares of the fund to be given to the objects of it. No doubt this is in part the purpose of the power; but it also enables the donee to confer an indefeasible interest which can be dealt with by way of sale or settlement or otherwise. The power of the donee to distribute the fund in unequal shares may for some purposes be a circumstance to be taken into consideration, but does not seem to me to be sufficient to exclude, or even to rebut, the application of the rule. In Montague v. Montague the rule against double portions was held applicable to appointments made in exercise of a special power. But an examination of this case shows that the appointor was the father of the appointees, and that the appointed funds consisted of sums made chargeable by way of portions for younger children on estates settled by himself on his marriage. The appointed funds were therefore "portions" in the strictest sense.

The result is that Mrs. Papillon is entitled to share in the appointed fund pari passu with her brother and sister, and without bringing into account the sums already received by her.

In re FRIEND.
FRIEND v. YOUNG. (a.)

Partnership—Liability of estate of deceased partner for goods ordered before, but delivered after, his death—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), s. 9 —Statute of Limitations—Merchant and factor—Fiduciary relation—Acknowledgment by debtor—Appropriation by creditor.

E. & Co. employed F. & Co. as commission agents. The course of business was for E. & Co. to send goods to F. & Co. to be forwarded to the purchasers. F. & Co. received the purchase-money and accounted for the same to E. & Co. after deducting their commission.

After the death of one of the partners in F. & Co., E. & Co. recovered judgment for sums due to them in respect of several business transactions with the firm of F. & Co. against the surviving partner, who became bankrupt, and nothing was obtained from his estate under the judgment. E. & Co. now claimed to prove for the balance against the estate of the deceased partner.

As to certain items which were for goods delivered to the firm of F. & Co. after, but under an order given before, the death of the partner,

Held, that the contract was really one of agency, and that the death of the partner terminated the partnership before the agency began, and terminated the contract too; and that, accordingly, no obligation was incurred by his estate.

As to certain other items with regard to which the defence of the Statute of Limitations was set up,

Held, that there was no fiduciary relationship between the parties so as to prevent the statute being set up; but that a payment had been made by F. & Co. which constituted an acknowledgment of the debt, and accordingly took the case out of the statute, though the fact that E. & Co. had appropriated the payment to the account of which these items formed part would not in itself have been sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

This was an action for the administration of the estate of Frederick Friend, who died on the 7th of January, 1895. At the time of his death he carried on two businesses, one being that of a merchant and commission agent in partnership with his son, William Beauchamp Friend, under the style of Frederick Friend & Co., at 11, King William-street, in the City of London. At the time of the death, this partnership appears to have been one at will; and William Beauchamp Friend continued it under the same style as surviving partner.

For many years prior to the death of Frederick Friend, his firm of Frederick Friend & Co. were employed as commission agents by Eastwood & Co., cement manufacturers. The business transactions consisted in part of consignments made by Eastwood & Co. to Frederick Friend & Co., and in part of sales effected by Eastwood & Co. to third parties through the agency of Frederick Friend & Co. The course of business in respect of the latter transactions was that Eastwood & Co. sent to Friend & Co. the goods which formed the subject of the sales; and that F. Friend & Co. then forwarded them to the purchasers and received the purchase-money, for which they accounted to Eastwood & Co., deducting their commission.

On the 5th February, 1896, Eastwood & Co. recovered judgment against the firm of Friend & Co. (then consisting of William B. Friend only) for £579 10s. 4d., a balance then due to them in respect of several business transactions with Friend & Co. William B. Friend had become bankrupt, and nothing was recovered from him under the judgment. Eastwood & Co. now claimed to prove in respect of the balance against Frederick Friend's estate. As to an item of £82 10s. sought to be charged under date the 8th of November, 1895, it was admitted that the estate was not liable. As to four other items of £66 13s. 4d. each the facts were as follow:

In 1894 Friend & Co. procured for Eastwood & Co. an order for certain goods to be sent to Alexandria. The testator died before these goods were delivered, but the order was executed by Eastwood & Co., who had not been informed of his death, and according to the usual course of business between the firms the son, the surviving partner, received the purchase-money. He never accounted for this purchase-money to Eastwood & Co.

The facts as to the remaining items are fully stated in the reserved judgment which deals with them, and it is enough to say here that the Statute of Limitations was pleaded as a bar to any claims in respect of those items, while, on the other hand, it was contended that Friend & Co., as agents of Eastwood & Co., were in a fiduciary position towards the latter, and that, in any case, payments had been made which took the case out of the statute.

Grosvenor-Woods, Q.C., and T. Mathew, for the claimants.—We have a right to prove against the estate of the deceased partner, though we have recovered judgment against the surviving partner: In re Hodgson, 34 W. R. 127, 31 Ch. D. 177; Kendall v. Hamilton, 27 W. R. 121, 3 C. P. D. 403; Wegg-Prosser v. Evans, 43 W. R. 66, [1895] 1 Q. B. 108. Next it is said that some items are statute-barred. [STIRLING, J.—If Friend & Co. were your agents they were in a fiduciary position towards you: Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R. 387, 5 Ch. 233.] Yes. In the present instance the surviving partner who has suffered judgment to go against him in default is executor of the testator, and cannot well raise the statute as a defence. Friend & Co. as our agents were trustees for us of the balance of the purchase-money. Agents are trustees for many purposes: Darby and Bosanquet on the Statutes of Limitation, 2nd ed., p. 249; Lindley on Partnership, 6th ed., p. 510. In any case Eastwood & Co. have a right to appropriate the payment made in 1894.

Hastings, Q.C., and Le Riche, for the plaintiff.—This case is covered by Houlton's case, 1 Mer. 616. The contract of agency was determined by the death of F. Friend. The trust implied from the relation of principal and agent is not enough to defeat the Statute of Limitations, unless the claimants can prove something to take the case out of the statute. Burdick v. Garrick is no authority here. Knox v. Gye, L. R. 5 H. L. 656, and Watson v. Woodman, 24 W. R. 47, 20 Eq. 721, were both cases of agency, but the defence of the statute prevailed. There has been no acknowledgment here to take the case out of the statute: Nash v. Hodgson, 6 De G. M. & G. 474; Waugh v. Cope, 6 M. & W. 824. The case is within section 9 of the Partnership Act, 1890, as to the transactions which took place after the death of F. Friend: Read v. Brown, 37 W. R. 131, 22 Q. B. D. 128; Northey Stone v. Gilling, 42 W. R. 99, [1894] 1 Q. B. 99; In re Head, 42 W. R. 55, [1893] 3 Ch. 426. The Statute of Limitations has no application; it is a case of principal and agent in a fiduciary relation. Attorney-General v. Edmunds, L. R. 6 Eq. 381; Moxon v. Bright, L. R. 4 Ch. R. C. L. Dig. 182.

STIRLING, J.—The question is whether the estate of the deceased partner is liable in respect of the sums received by the surviving partner. Before the Partnership Act, 1890, the case would have been unarguable. It was decided in Houlton's case, 1 Mer. 616, that where bills had been deposited with a banking firm, and at the death of one partner were in proper custody and were afterwards improperly sold no liability attached to the deceased partner. Of course there was no liability at law in respect of transactions subsequent to the testator's death, and the question was whether there was any remedy at equity. Sir William Grant says at p. 622: "If there be no remedy at law against the executors of Mr. Devaynes, I am at a loss to understand the equity on which this court is to interpose to make good the loss against Mr. Devaynes' estate. It has not been incurred by anything that he did or neglected to do. The bills were safely kept as long as he had anything to do with them. From the act of placing them in the custody of a partnership, it followed that, upon the death of one of the partners, they would fall into the possession of the surviving partners. Mr. Houlton himself, therefore, has virtually placed them there. Mr. Devaynes' executors could not take them away. Mr. Devaynes could not direct his executors to take them away; and though Mr. Devaynes has neither been personally instrumental in the loss, nor personally benefited by it, nor could have prevented it, yet it is contended that it is upon his estate the loss ought to be thrown, and that by a court of equity. I apprehend, however, that it would be the reverse of equity to throw the loss on his estate in such a case as the present. It might be as well contended that if they had thrown the bills into the fire or lost them by negligence Mr. Devaynes would be responsible for such act of negligence. He had no more to do with the sale of the bills than he would have had to do with a loss occasioned by such means as these." That case has never been dissented from; it is cited by Lindley, L.J., in his book on the Law of Partnership, and the law is thus stated in that work, 6th ed., at p. 621: "With respect to the direct liability of the assets of the deceased to creditors, it may be taken as a general proposition, that the estate of a deceased partner is not liable to third parties for what may be done after his decease by the surviving partners; and on that ground it has been held that they cannot be restrained at the suit of the executors of the deceased from continuing to carry on the business of the late firm in the old name." 3 Swans. 490 note citing Webster v. Webster, 1791, may here be cited as an authority.

But it is said, and truly, that the present case must be decided by the law as established by the Partnership Act, 1890. The section of that Act relied upon is section 9. [His lordship read the section:] I think there are some other clauses which ought to be read with that section when the matter is fully investigated. I refer to section 12, sub-section (2), section 14, sub-section (2), sections 36, sub-section (3), and 38. In the present case the argument turned on section 9. It is said that at the time of testator's death the partnership had incurred an obligation in respect of which the estate of the deceased partner is liable under the section. It is not said that any portion of the debt was incurred during the partnership. I should have been unwilling to read "obligations" in such a way as to throw on the estate of the deceased partner any obligations which would not have been admissible prior to the Act. It is true that the Act amends the law, and it may well be that the law in this case has been amended to the extent of conferring on the partnership creditors a legal remedy, where before the Act they had only an equitable remedy. But I must first inquire whether the obligation was incurred while the testator was a partner, and, if so, the nature of the obligation. I asked Mr. Grosvenor Woods what obligation was incurred whilst the testator was a partner. He said that there was a contract by Eastwood & Co. to send to Friend & Co. certain goods, and Friend & Co. undertook to send the goods and receive the purchase-money and account for it. Be it so; it was a contract, and when you strip off the details it comes to this, it was a contract that Eastwood & Co., as principals, would employ Friend & Co., as agents, to receive the goods and deal with them in a certain way, and to receive the proceeds of sale. Therefore this was a covenant of agency. Before the agency began the partnership was determined by the death of Frederick Friend. It seems to me when that happened the contract was at an end. I apprehend that if Eastwood & Co. had become aware of the fact they might have refused to send goods to the surviving partner. It was held in the case of Tasker v. Shepherd, 9 W. R. 476, 6 H. & N. 575, when two partners had entered into a covenant with a third person—to employ him as agent for four and a-half years, and before the period had expired one partner died, the surviving partner was under no obligation to continue him as agent, and that, in the absence of an express stipulation, the claim would only extend to four and a-half years, subject to the condition that all parties so long lived. Under these circumstances it seems to me that no obligation was incurred by the estate of the deceased partner, because the contract of agency had come to an end.

I think on these grounds that the five items which relate to the goods delivered to the surviving partner cannot be allowed in the account. As to the question raised on the Statute of Limitations I will take time to consider my judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 26.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts as above, and continued: It was in the first place contended that the statute could be no bar by reason of the fiduciary relation which existed between the parties. From the operation of the statute, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3, were excepted, "such accounts as concern the trade of merchandize between merchant and merchant, their factors or servants."

It was laid down by the Court of Common Pleas in Cottam v. Partridge, 4 Man. & G. 271, that actions of account between a merchant on the one hand and a factor on the other fall within the exception: see per Tindal, C.J., at pp. 284-5: [His lordship read the judgment: "The exception in the statute . . . dealings creating a trust," and continued:] The exception was repealed by section 9 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which provides: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] Inasmuch as actions of account between merchant and factor fall within the exception in the statute of James, they must equally fall within the provisions of this enactment of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act; and consequently this enactment constitutes a defence to an action at law by a merchant against his factor.

It is next to be observed that this statute applies not only to actions but to suits for account, by which I understand to be meant suits in courts of equity. Independently of this, the effect of this enactment as regards suits in equity was much considered by the House of Lords in Knox v. Gye, L. R. 5 H. L. 656, where it was held that the lapse of the period of six years was a bar to an action for an account brought by the legal personal representative of a deceased partner against a surviving partner. The general principle is thus stated by Lord Westbury (see p. 674): [His lordship read from "The general principle was laid down" to "analogy to the Statute of Limitations," and later on from "Your lordships will no doubt" to "remedy."]

In this case there is no question that the courts of law and of equity have concurrent jurisdiction with reference to such a claim as this; indeed, as has already been stated, an action at law has been brought and judgment recovered for the very sum in question against the surviving partner in the firm of F. Friend & Co. A court of equity, therefore, ought to give effect to any bar created by statute which would be available at law.

Much reliance was placed on the case of Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R. 387, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 233, at pp. 240-1. That case, however, was commented upon by Hall, V.C., in Watson v. Woodman, 24 W. R. 47, L. R. 20 Eq. 721, where he expressed his opinion that the case was decided on the special circumstances. The recent case of Soar v. Ashwell was also relied on; but in that case the plaintiff's claim was of such a nature as could only be asserted in a court of equity. And this is pointed out by the Master of the Rolls in the commencement of his judgment.

In my judgment, therefore, the existence of a fiduciary relation does not prevent the defence of the statute being set up in the present case.

Before dealing with the other points raised it is desirable to state some further facts.

It appears that on the 27th of August, 1894, Eastwood and Co. sent a letter enclosing a statement of account between the two firms showing a balance due to Eastwood & Co. of £494 6s. 4d. This was arrived at by debiting Frederick Friend & Co. first with a series of items, which, on the face of the account, had become due within six years from the date when the account was sent. Then came this entry:

Consignment Account.
Your balance as shown by you	£504	14	2
+ Cash deducted (see explanation) - - - - -	84	5	9
	£588	19	11

This, with the previous items, made up a total debit of £1,236 6s. 8d. On the other side were credited various sums, including "Commission account, as per statement annexed." At the foot of the annexed statement were these words, "N.B.—Do you agree our figures?" And on one of the audited items is appended the remark, "You will understand by our letter that we do not agree all these figures." The items under the heading "Consignment Account" constitute the balance claimed in respect of consignments, less £300. All the items making up the consignment account were in August, 1894, statute-barred with the exception of two under date 5th of March, 1889, of £31 5s. and £29 6s. 3d., making together £60 11s. 3d.

On the 12th of September, 1894, Eastwood & Co. wrote to F. Friend & Co.: "Dear Sirs,—Will you kindly make a point of sending a cheque for £400 to-morrow, Thursday, and very greatly oblige.—Yours faithfully, Eastwood & Co."

On the 13th of September, 1894, F. Friend & Co. replied as follows: "Dear Sirs,—Enclosed we beg to hand you a cheque for £300 on account, and we will thoroughly examine statement next week and close up the affair altogether if possible."

The £300 so paid was in the books of Eastwood & Co. placed to the credit of the consignment account and in the account brought in for the purpose of proof in this action it is credited against the amount debited for the assignments. Beyond this nothing was done down to the time of the death of the testator.

The question is, what effect is to be attributed to the payment so made? Upon the law applicable three cases must be referred to.

The first is Mills v. Fowkes, 5 Bing. N. C. 455. The question arose as to the effect of a payment of £15 made under circumstances stated at pp. 460-1 of the report. [His lordship read from "The law has been correctly laid down" to "from the operation of the statute."]

I may here observe that the Mercantile Law Amendment Act expressly provides that "no claim which arose more than six years before the commencement of such action or suit shall be enforceable by action or suit by reason only of some other matter or claim comprised in the same account having arisen within six years next before the commencement of the action."

In Nash v. Hodgson, 3 W. R. 590, 6 De G. M. & G. 474, the question was as to the effect of a judgment made to a creditor who held promissory notes of the debtor, two of which were statute-barred. Lord Cranworth, C., goes through the earlier cases, including Mills v. Fowkes, and sums them up thus: [His lordship read at p. 482, "They show that simple payment . . . may be doubtful," and continued:] With reference to these observations it is to be observed that in both Mills v. Fowkes and Nash v. Hodgson there existed debts not barred by statute, excepting the payment. Knight Bruce, L.J., appears to have thought that the appropriation by the debtor took the case out of the statute. With this Turner, L.J., does not agree, but says: [His lordship read pp. 489-90, "It seems to me however . . . the payment had to be made perfectly generally," and continued:] With this view of the law the case of Walker v. Butler, 6 E. & B. 506, agrees: [His lordship read the judgments at pp. 510-11, and continued:] According to these authorities I am bound to hold that the appropriation by Eastwood & Co. of the £300 to the consignment account did not operate to take the case out of the statutes; but I must have regard to all the circumstances of the case in order to ascertain the intention of Messrs. F. Friend & Co. in making the payment.

Now, from this point of view the letter of the 13th of September, 1894, is most important.

In the first place, the payment is expressly stated to be not in satisfaction but on account; it is, therefore, a payment in respect of a larger debt.

Secondly, it appears that the payment was made with reference to the statement prepared by Eastwood & Co., and the balance thereby shown to be due from F. Friend & Co.

Thirdly, this statement cannot be regarded as a settled account. It contained some items at least which Eastwood & Co. did not admit, and it invited as to others discussion on the part of F. Friend & Co., and that firm were ready to avail themselves of the invitation, "in order to close up the affair if possible."

Looking at all these circumstances, I think that the payment amounts to an acknowledgment on the part of F. Friend & Co. that there was pending between them and Eastwood & Co. an account relating to the several items mentioned in the statement, including the consignment account on which balance of more than £300 would prove to be payable; and I think that from that there ought to be inferred a promised to pay that balance when ascertained. The view which I take as to the effect of the payment is similar to that taken by Kay, J., with reference to an acknowledgment in Banner v. Berridge, 29 W. R. 844, 18 Ch. D. 254. [His lordship read: "I suppose there is no doubt about the law . . . the balance shall be paid," and continued:] Then do the cases of Mills v. Fowkes and Nash v. Hodgson bind me to hold that the defence of the statute must prevail. In my opinion these two cases are distinguishable for two reasons: first, that the payment was made expressly with reference to a statement of account which included as part of it the statute-barred items; and, secondly, that apart from these statute-barred items there did not exist a balance of £300 payable to Eastwood & Co., either on the face of the statement or in fact.

In my judgment, therefore, the applicants are entitled to prove in respect of the items in the consignment account.

One question stills remains. After the death of Frederick Friend a sum of £100 was paid to Eastwood & Co. by William Beauchamp Friend. For this sum credit is given in arriving at the balance sought to be proved; but the applicants now seek to appropriate it to those items in respect of which the estate of Frederick Friend has been held not to be liable.

The general rule is that where a debtor does not make an appropiation of a payment the creditor may do so; and that he has the option of making such appropriation "until the last moment," as it is sometimes put; certainly until he communicates an appropriation to the debtor (Simson v. Ingham, 2 B. & C. 65) or brings an action (Mills v. Fowkes), or until the case comes before a jury (per Taunton, J., Philpott v. Jones, 2 Ad. & E. 41, see p. 44).

It seems to me, however, that the applicants have in fact exercised this right by carrying in their proof in the form which they did, and that it is too late for them now to appropriate as they seek to do.

Q. B. Div.
(Collins and Ridley, JJ.) July 31, 1897.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (Appellants) v. WOOD (Respondent). (a.)

Local government—Highways—Locomotives—Locomotive passing along highway—Being "used" on highway—Licence—Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 32.

Section 32 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, gave county authorities power to make bye-laws for granting annual licences to locomotives used within their county, and under this section a county council made a bye-law that "No locomotive shall be used on any highway within the county until an annual licence for the use of the same shall have been obtained by the owner thereof."

Held, that a locomotive which is only passing along a highway for the purpose of proceeding to another district is being "used" on such highway within the meaning of this bye-law, and that the owner thereof required a licence for such user.

Case stated by Mr. Kennedy, metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Woolwich police-court.

An information was laid on behalf of the appellants against the respondent charging that he, on the 3rd of November, 1896, at High-street, in the parish of Eltham, in the county of London, and within the Metropolitan Police District, did unlawfully use a locomotive on a highway in contravention of a bye-law made by the appellants prohibiting a locomotive being used on any highway within the said county until an annual licence for the use of the same should have been obtained from the appellants by the owner thereof whereby he (the respondent) became liable to the penalty provided by section 32 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, and the Local Government Act, 1888.

Section 32 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), provides: "A county authority may from time to time make, alter, and repeal bye-laws for granting annual licences to locomotives used within their county, and the fee (not exceeding ten pounds) to be paid in respect of each licence; and the owner of any locomotive for which a licence is required under any bye-law so made who uses or permits the same to be used in contravention of any such bye-law, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding forty shillings for every day on which the same is so used. All fees received under this section shall be carried to and applied as part of the county rate. This section shall not apply to any locomotive used solely for agricultural purposes."

Section 38 enacts: "'Locomotive' means a locomotive propelled by steam or by other than animal power."

The London County Council, under section 32, made bye-laws for the "Licensing and use of locomotives in the county of London (exclusive of the city of London," and No. 1 of such bye-laws provided: "No locomotive shall be used on any highway within the county of London until an annual licence for the use of the same shall have been obtained from the council by the owner thereof, nor at any time after the expiration of any such licence unless a further licence shall be obtained in respect of such locomotive."

The bye-laws also provided that the licence fee for a locomotive should be £10 a year, and for a steam-roller £5 a year, and there was also a provision for what was called a "travelling licence" on reduced terms.

The respondent was an engineer carrying on business at Crickenhill, in the county of Kent, and was the owner of the steam-roller in respect of which the information was taken out. He had not obtained a licence to use the steam-roller within the county of London. On the 3rd of November, 1896, the steam-roller was, by the directions of the respondent, being driven along the highway, High-street, Eltham, in the county of London; but it was not being so driven for any purpose of rolling the highway, but was passing along the highway in the course of a journey from Crickenhill to Ealing, in the county of Middlesex, where it was to be temporarily employed in road making. In the course of such journey it would travel over some sixteen miles along highways in the county of London.

It was contended for the respondent that as the steam-roller was only passing along the highway for the purpose of proceeding to another district, such steam-roller was not being "used" within the meaning of the bye-law.

It was contended for the appellants that the steam-roller was being used to go to Ealing and earn money there; that it was being used as a locomotive because it was being propelled by steam from one place to another, and that the intention of section 32 was to make all persons who should use and wear the highways by means of any locomotive contribute by paying a licence fee to the county rate.

The magistrate decided that the mere passage of the steam-roller over the highways within the appellants' district while crossing from one locality to another was not such a "user" on the highway as was contemplated by the bye-law, and he accordingly dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the facts above stated the steam-roller was "used" within the meaning of the bye-law.

Daldy, for the appellants.—The steam-roller was being "used" on the highway while it was passing from the county of Kent to the county of Middlesex just as much as if it were being used on the highway for the purpose of rolling the same. Passage of a locomotive along a highway is a "user" of the highway within the contemplation of the bye-law, and of the 32nd section of the Act. The licence fee was to be paid in aid of the county rate, and the clear intention of the Act was to compel those who damaged the road by the use of locomotives to contribute towards the cost. The damage to the road would be the same whether the steam-roller was merely passing along the highway or was doing work on the highway. [He referred to Bell v. Stockton Tramway Co., 51 J. P. 804.]

The respondent did not appear.

COLLINS, J.—Although we have not had the advantage of hearing any argument in favour of the view taken by the learned magistrate, the point appears to me to be reasonably clear, and I feel compelled to differ from the view taken by him. The case arises in this way. The Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, provides that the county authority may make, alter, and repeal bye-laws for granting annual licences for locomotives used within their county, and that the owner of any locomotive for which a licence is required under any bye-law so made who uses or permits the same to be used in contravention thereof shall be liable to a penalty. In this case the owner of a steam-roller was with the steam-roller proceeding along a road within the jurisdiction of the London County Council for the purpose of fulfilling some contract of employment in the adjoining county of Middlesex. The steam-roller was not actually at work in mending roads, but it was on its way travelling and passing over a highway in order to fulfil its contract at its destination. The point was taken that the owner ought to have had a licence, and that not having had a licence, he was subject to a penalty within section 32, if there were a bye-law applicable to the case. There are bye-laws applicable to this case, and it seems to me that these bye-laws contemplated the passage of a locomotive over the road, and this steam-roller is a locomotive. They clearly contemplated such passage as a user which would oblige the owner to have a licence. It is true that they provide for mitigating the full rigour of the bye-law by allowing a person who will assert that he does not intend to use the locomotive on more than six days within the county, and that he has a licence in force for another county, to have what is called a travelling licence on reduced terms. It is obvious that unless he can bring himself within these provisions he will be, within the view of the bye-law, liable to the whole amount of the licence. It seems to me to be the intention of the bye-laws that a person who uses the locomotive for the purpose of travelling from one place to another in order to do work when he gets there, should be taken to use the highway, and that being the intention of the bye-law, it seems also to be the intention of the Act under which the bye-law is made. An engine only supplies the means of locomotion, and the provision we are now dealing with is a Highway Act, which is obviously an Act for the protection of highways. These locomotives use the highway whether they are merely passing over the highway, or whether they are drawing a load upon it, and generally speaking the locomotive is the more serious factor in the case. Even when you have a traction-engine dragging a load on the road the traction-engine is much more likely to injure the highway than the load that follows. Much more so is that the case in the case of a steam-roller, and the steam-roller's action on the road appears to be just as injurious whether it is engaged in mending the road or passing over it. In either case it is the same weight passing over it, and it does the mischief the Legislature intended to be dealt with. If I borrow a horse for the purpose of drawing a load at a place ten miles distant, and if I ride the horse to that place, could it be said that I was not using the horse when passing over that ten miles? It seems to me as a matter of common sense that I should be using the horse on that journey, and in the same sense the roadway also.

Under these circumstances I think the learned magistrate was wrong in his decision of this case.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams and Wright, JJ.) — May 24, 1897.

In re GINGER.

Ex parte THE LONDON AND UNIVERSAL BANK (LIMITED). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Bill of sale—Reputed ownership—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44 (iii.)—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 7, 15.

Goods in the possession of a bankrupt in his trade or business at the commencement of the bankruptcy under such circumstances that he is the reputed owner thereof, though covered by a bill of sale, pass to the trustee in the bankruptcy, and not to the grantee of the bill of sale.

Appeal from a judgment of his Honour Sir A. G. Marten, Q.C., in the county court at Luton (reported at 41 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, p. 13), deciding that the goods comprised in two bills of sale, or either of them, on the bankrupt's farm, in his trade or business, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, were in his possession, order, and disposition by the consent and permission of the true owner under such circumstances that he was the reputed owner thereof, and consequently passed to the trustee in the bankruptcy, and not to the grantee of the bills of sale.

The bankrupt, who was a dairy farmer, of Slapton, in Buckinghamshire, granted the first of the two bills of sale to the appellants, the London and Universal Bank (Limited), upon the 28th of February, 1896. This bill of sale was given to secure a loan of £500 and interest at 60 per cent., repayable "£75 for interest on the 28th of May then next, and the principal sum of £500, together with the interest then due, on the 28th of August, 1896." The schedule annexed to this bill of sale comprised, amongst other things, the debtor's household furniture, and also the cattle, poultry, and fixtures used in his business as a dairy farmer. The second bill of sale was dated the 20th of March, 1896, and was given to secure a loan of £200 and interest at 60 per cent., repayable, both principal and interest, "on the 20th of June then next." The schedule to this bill of sale comprised certain cattle on the farm, 300 acres of grass, the crops of 70 acres of arable land, and the tenant-right, goodwill, and valuation of the farm. Both bills of sale contained the usual proviso that the grantee should not be entitled to seize or take possession of the chattels comprised in the schedules for any other cause than those specified in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882. None of the causes entitling the grantee to take possession had arisen before the 8th of April, 1896, when the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy by non-compliance with the terms of a bankruptcy notice served upon him upon the 1st of April. A petition was presented against him on the 9th of April, and a receiving order was made upon the 20th of April.

Upon the 22nd of April the official receiver took possession of the debtor's farm and goods, including all the chattels comprised in the two bills of sale.

The goods were sold, and the proceeds, £2,154 4s., paid into court.

The holders of the bills of sale moved before the county court at Luton, on the 13th of August, 1896, to obtain the money representing the value of the goods comprised in their bills of sale. His Honour Sir A. G. Marten, Q.C., in a considered judgment, delivered upon the 22nd of October, 1896, allowed their claim as to the household furniture and all other chattels comprised in the bills of sale except such as were "in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business," which he held to have been in the bankrupt's possession at the date of the bankruptcy by the consent and permission of the true owner under such circumstances that the bankrupt was the reputed owner thereof; therefore, by section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, they passed to the trustee.

The bills of sale holders appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the appellants.—In this case there is no consent by the true owner to the goods remaining in the possession of the bankrupt. Jelf, Q.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The contention of the appellants in this case seems to be that the effect of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, is such that if a lender takes a security for a loan and complies with the provisions of that Act, thereby allowing the grantor of the bill of sale to retain possession of the security until such default is made as entitles the grantee to seize it, then such possession by the grantor is not by the consent and permission of the true owner, but is accorded to the grantor by the statute.

The proper answer to that contention is that, notwithstanding the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, the possession by the bankrupt of goods assigned to the grantee under such circumstances that the bankrupt continues to be the reputed owner thereof is possession by the consent and permission of the true owner, not statutory possession conferred by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Nobody suggests that we are to read the reputed ownership section as being in any way controlled by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. Here we have two statutes, both of them in force, and it cannot be argued that one controls the other. This, therefore, is not a question of construction at all, the construction of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is absolutely unaffected by the construction of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and vice versâ.

If the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, had never been passed, and you had a case like the present, no one could doubt but that if the circumstances of possession led to reputation of ownership the goods must pass to the trustee. Of course, if the circumstances were not such as to lead to reputation of ownership, the question would not arise. I am only going to deal with the case where the possession is such as to give rise to reputation of ownership, and I would point out that if you got such circumstances following a bill of sale as in the present case, and the bill of sale were held to be bad in form, no one could contend that reputation of ownership did not arise. It is, however, said that the Bills of Sale Act negatives possession with consent—i.e., such possession as raises reputation of ownership. I do not see why, for the Bills of Sale Act applies to all classes, and the reputed ownership clause only applies to traders, and even as to trade goods there may be a custom which negatives reputation of ownership, so that there are numberless cases where the reputed ownership clause is inapplicable.

It seems to me that although the Bills of Sale Act compels the lender to allow the borrower possession until default, it in no sense compels the lender to consent to possession under such circumstances that the borrower is the reputed owner of the goods—i.e., it in no way compels the lender to consent to the false reputation of ownership. The fact is, that, if the circumstances are not such as to raise reputation of ownership, the enforced consent does no harm; but if the circumstances are such as to raise reputation of ownership, then the grantee must go further than the Bills of Sale Act and take such steps as may be needed to protect himself.

As to In re Stanley, I wish to say that it seems to me to have been decided on two grounds, one of which was that the possession was consistent with the terms of the mortgage deed and excluded the reputation of ownership. This view is, however, inconsistent with Spackman v. Miller and that series of cases.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BROWN. (a.)

Inland revenue—Succession duty—Father and son in partnership—Death of father—Acquisition by son of father's share in business — Succession — Sale and purchase—Construction of partnership deed—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 2.

A father admitted his son into partnership for a term of five years. The son brought no capital into the business, but the value of the business was estimated at £62,445, of which two-thirds was to be deemed the father's share and one-third the son's; and one condition of the partnership deed was that, in the event of the father dying during the partnership, the son was to take the whole of the business and pay to the father's executors or administrators £10,000. By a deed of even date the son agreed to pay to the father and his executors a rent-charge of £139 per annum in respect of the freehold property of the partnership.

On the death of the father during the partnership the Crown claimed succession duty in respect of the father's share of the business which passed to the son, less the sum of £10,000 payable by the son to the estate of the deceased.

Held, that the son's acquisition of his father's share of the business was a succession, on which succession duty was payable.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Kennedy, JJ.) on the hearing of an information by the Attorney-General claiming succession duty, 45 W. R. 446.

On the 31st of March, 1881, the defendant, George Thomas Brown, entered into a contract of partnership for a term of five years with his father, George Brown, who was then carrying on the business of a cotton spinner and manufacturer. For some years previously the defendant had been the manager of the business. On becoming a partner the defendant did not bring any capital into the business, but the value of the business was estimated at £62,445, and it was agreed that the sum of £41,630 should be considered as having been brought into the partnership by the father, and the remaining £20,815 by the son. The father was to take two-thirds of the profits, and the son one-third.

The deed of partnership contained the following clause: "If the said George Brown shall die during the partnership, the said George Thomas Brown shall be absolutely entitled, for his own use and benefit, to the whole or entirety of the capital of the partnership . . . and the said George Thomas Brown shall within six calendar months next after such death duly execute and deliver unto the executors or administrators of the said George Brown a bond for the payment to them of the principal sum of £10,000. . . . But if the said George Thomas Brown shall die during the partnership, the said George Brown shall be absolutely entitled, for his own use and benefit, to the whole or entirety of the capital of the partnership, and the said George Brown shall within six calendar months next after such death duly execute and deliver unto the executors or administrators of the said George Thomas Brown a bond for the payment to them of the principal sum of £15,000."

By a deed of even date the son agreed to pay to the father and his executors a rent-charge of £139 per annum in respect of the freehold property of the partnership.

The contract of partnership was carried into effect, and the father and son carried on business together until October, 1884, when the father died.

The Crown claimed succession duty in respect of the father's share of the capital of the partnership which passed to the defendant, less the sum of £10,000 payable by the defendant to the estate of the deceased.

The question was whether the defendant's acquisition of his father's share of the capital of the partnership was a succession, or whether the provisions of the partnership deed constituted a sale and purchase.

The Divisional Court gave judgment against the Crown.

The Crown appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

RIGBY, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: In this case the Crown claims from the defendant, George Thomas Brown, succession duty in respect of any benefit derived by him from his acquisition, on the death of his father and partner, George Brown, of the share of the latter (being two-thirds of the whole) in a partnership business of George Brown & Co., carried on by the father and son down to the death of the father in 1884; the real question being whether the arrangement (to use a neutral phrase) under which the son acquired the share of his father was or was not in the nature of a sale by the father to the son within the meaning of Fryer v. Morland, 25 W. R. 21, 3 Ch. D. 675, and so excluded from the operation of the Succession Duty Act.

The facts of the case are not in dispute. George Brown, the father, to the end of the year 1880 carried on the business of cotton spinner and manufacturer, his son, George Thomas Brown, assisting him in the management of the business, but having no share therein. George Brown, the father, being minded to take his son into partnership with him, caused a valuation to be made of his assets employed in the business as on the 1st of January, 1881, and a general statement of account showing his position in the business on the same day. In this statement of account the items on the credit side were the values of the assets at the prices put upon them, a large banker's balance of £10,000 (obviously, we think, made up to an even sum considered sufficient to start the new firm), and the accounts due to the business. The total of these assets on the credit side was £63,824 8s. 11d. On the debit side was placed the amount of the accounts owing in the business, being £1,378 16s. 1d., and there resulted a net balance to the credit of the business of £62,445 12s. 10d. The statement of account was taken as the starting-point of the new firm, and the credit balance attributed as to £41,630 8s. 6d. (two-thirds of the whole) to the father as his capital, the remaining one-third, or £20,815 4s. 4d. being attributed to the son, though the whole amount was in truth brought in by the father. We have thought it desirable, with reference to the arguments pressed upon us, to state plainly the way in which the exact balance was arrived at, but for greater simplicity that balance will hereafter be dealt with as if it were a round sum of £60,000. The articles of partnership, which contained or evidenced the terms of the only contract between the father and the son, were dated the 31st of March, 1881. They carried the partnership back to the 1st of January, 1881, and made the term of the partnership five years, if both partners should so long live, subject to a clause enabling either partner to expel the other in case (among other events) of lunacy, bankruptcy, or breach of the articles. The benefits conferred upon the son by the articles included the following: He got at once one-third of the capital, say £20,000, and one-third of the profits. If the partnership continued for the five years, or determined by any other reason than the death of a partner, his share of capital was to be one-half, say £30,000. If his father died during the term, he was to have the whole capital, say £60,000, subject to his giving his father's executors, within six months after his death, a bond conditional for payment of £10,000 and 4 per cent. interest thereon from the father's death by ten instalments of £1,000 a year, the first payable, with interest as provided, at the end of twelve calendar months from the date of the bond, thus giving eighteen months for the first payment at the son's election. In the event of the son's death during the term, his father was to have back the business (formerly his own), but was to pay the son's executors £15,000, secured by his bond in a similar manner. The consideration given by the son (and it cannot be suggested that it is not in law a good consideration), was his agreeing to be a partner, and thereby taking upon himself liability for the debts of the firm, and his rendering services as a partner, with the addition in the sole case of his succeeding to the whole business of the money consideration involved in his giving the bond for £10,000. The money payment and the obligation to indemnify the father's estate against the debts of the firm constituted the only additional consideration for the acquisition of the father's two-thirds. Can the arrangement above summarized, looking at the case in substance apart from form, be fairly described as a case of sale and purchase within the meaning of the exception established by Fryer v. Morland? The contract between father and son is one and indivisible, and it is not permissible to isolate one of its terms from the other.

The event which has actually happened does involve a money payment by the son, but for the purpose of arriving at the true meaning of the arrangement it is necessary to consider also what did and what might have happened independently of that event. Now, the son actually got one-third of his father's capital without having to make any money payment to the father at all. If the partnership had lasted throughout the five years, or been determined by the father expelling the son or the son the father, the son would have got half the capital without having to pay anything. If it had been determined by the death of the son, his estate would have had £15,000, but would not have had to pay anything. It would hardly have been possible to say that in any of these cases the contract was one of sale and purchase in the sense in which that phrase is to be used for present purposes or in any ordinary sense. If the true nature of the arrangement was not in the cases referred to a contract for sale and purchase, the argument for its being so construed in the particular case which happened is greatly weakened, if not altogether destroyed. Looking at the contract broadly we do not think that it is one which ever would have been entered into with a stranger (unless the father chose to treat him as a son), but that it was to a great extent at any rate an arrangement for the benefit of the son, and that it is not converted into a contract for sale and purchase simply because the father stipulated for a money payment in a certain event to his estate. The distinction between the present case and that of Fryer v. Morland seems plain. Sir George Jessel in that case gives two reasons why ordinary contracts for sale and purchase should not be within the Act. The first and the main reason is the absurdity which would be involved if sales and purchases were to be included. In effect he says: If sales and purchases are to be included, then sales by auction must be. But it is altogether absurd to suppose that a stranger purchasing at an auction should pay 10 per cent. duty when a son purchasing in the same manner would pay 1 per cent. only. The same observation would apply to sales by private treaty. To an arrangement like that in the present case the argument would have no application. The other reason, founded on the language of section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, seems to be equally inapplicable. The Master of the Rolls remarks upon the difficulty of holding that a purchaser in an ordinary case of sale and purchase derives title from his vendor. He derives it from his own money paid out of his own pocket. Is that the case here? It would seem that the provision as to giving the bond for £10,000 involves no such conclusion. Immediately on the father's death his two-thirds share (amounting, say, to £40,000) is to pass to his son with, of course, the subsequent produce whether the son carries on the business or not. He has it either to sell or keep, and it is at least as easy to infer that he is to have this property to enable him to pay conveniently the instalments, as that £10,000 is to be fixed as a contractual value for property taken on the face of the contract as worth £40,000. The true conclusion seems to be that the father was actuated by mixed motives of business and bounty, and that in the case of the son becoming entitled to the whole busines £10,000 was fixed as a reasonable sum which could be paid without inconvenience out of the business for the benefit of the father's general estate, and not at all as a measure of the value of the property taken. This conclusion would be in accordance with the usual or, at any rate, a very general practice in the case of a successful trader carrying on an important business and taking into partnership one of several sons. It is highly improbable that in such a case the whole arrrangement should be based upon the ordinary pecuniary basis which would exist between vendor and purchaser. The partnership agreement is founded on mutual confidence between the parties, and it seldom, if ever, happens that the son gives full pecuniary value for the share secured to him, whilst some provisions for the other members of the family are very generally imported so as to make the arrangement analogous to, if it cannot properly be called, a family arrangement. Hitherto no reference has been made to the point very strongly relied on by the Solicitor-General, that, quite apart from the inadequacy of the sum to be paid on the son taking over the father's two-thirds share, the contrast between that sum and the £15,000 to be paid by the father on taking the son's one-third shows that the sums were fixed, not on the basis of sale, but rather with reference to the presumed and reasonable claims of the son in the particular events. This contrast, if not explained, is a strong ground for supposing that the whole arrangement was in the main an arrangement for the son's benefit.

The judgment proceeded to deal with the reasons on which the learned judges in the court below based their decision, pointing out that they had disregarded the estimated value of the partnership assets, and had apparently been impressed by arguments founded on the depressed condition of the cotton-spinning trade and on the reservation of the rent-charge of £139. The judgment then continued:

Having stated our reasons for differing in matters of comparative detail with the learned judges in the court below, we conclude by pointing out what, in our judgment, and with all deference to them, seems to be the main defect in their reasoning. They do not treat the contract as a whole, but, picking out and dealing separately with one clause of it, they seem to add together all the considerations given by the son for any part of the advantage secured to him and concentrate them on the single case of the taking over by the son of the father's two-thirds, not allowing for the circumstance that, with the exception of the £10,000 and the indemnity to be given for the debts due at the father's death, for the whole of which the son was liable to the creditors, the whole consideration moving from the son would have equally moved from him had he never become the taker of his father's share at all.

The result is that the judgment of the court below is to be reversed, and the Crown held to be entitled to succession duty, of course giving credit in the usual way to the son for the sum of £10,000 in estimating the value of the succession. Costs will follow the event.

Bankruptcy—Verbal agreement to lend money—Receipt by lender of a share of profits of business—Bankruptcy of borrower—Postponement of lender's proof—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), s. 2, sub-section (3); s. 3.

A verbal agreement to lend money on the terms that the lender shall receive a share of the profits of a business to be carried on by the borrower is within the provisions of section 3 of the Partnership Act, 1890; and therefore, in such a case, if the borrower is adjudged a bankrupt the lender is not entitled to recover anything in respect of his loan until the claims of the other creditors of the borrower have been satisfied.

Appeal of the trustee in bankruptcy from a decision of the Divisional Court reversing an order of the county court judge of Manchester postponing the respondent's proof until all the other creditors of the bankrupt should have been paid in full.

In April, 1894, Schofield, the respondent, lent Fort, the bankrupt, £3,000 with which to start in business.

It was verbally agreed between them that Fort should have £6 a week as manager of the business, that Schofield should be paid 6 per cent. interest, and that the net profits of the business should be divided between the parties. At the same time Schofield took a promissory note as collateral security. Schofield sued Fort on the note, and Fort pleaded that Schofield was his partner.

This issue was tried and decided in Schofield's favour, and Schofield obtained judgment. Fort then filed his petition in bankruptcy. Schofield tendered a proof in the bankruptcy for £3,153, being the principal, interest, and costs. The proof was objected to upon the ground that Schofield's claim must be postponed to the claims of the other creditors by virtue of section 2, sub-section 3 (d), and section 3 of the Partnership Act, 1890.

The Divisional Court (Vaughan Williams and Wright, JJ.) held that as the agreement under which Schofield was to take a share of the profits of the business was not in writing, section 3 did not apply, and that Schofield was entitled to prove for his debt equally with the other creditors.

The Partnership Act, 1890, s. 2, in determining whether a partnership does or does not exist, regard shall be had to the following rules:

(3) The receipt by a person of a share of the profits of a business is primâ facie evidence that he is a partner in the business, but the receipt of such a share or of a payment contingent on or varying with the profits of a business does not of itself make him a partner in the business; and in particular

(a) The receipt by a person of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business does not of itself make him a partner in the business or liable as such.

(d) The advance of money by way of loan to a person engaged or about to engage in any business on a contract with that person that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, or shall receive a share of the profits arising from carrying on the business, does not of itself make the lender a partner with the person or persons carrying on the business, or liable as such. Provided that the contract is in writing, and signed by or on behalf of all the parties thereto,

Section 3: In the event of any person to whom money has been advanced by way of loan upon such a contract as is mentioned in the last foregoing section, or of any buyer of a goodwill in consideration of a share of the profits of the business, being adjudged a bankrupt, entering into an arrangement to pay his creditors less than 20s. in the pound, or dying in insolvent circumstances, the lender of the loan shall not be entitled to recover anything in respect of his loan, and the seller of the goodwill shall not be entitled to recover anything in respect of the share of profits contracted for until the claims of the other creditors of the borrower or buyer for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied.

J. C. Bankes, for the appellant, the trustee in bankruptcy.—Section 2, sub-section (3), of the Partnership Act, 1890, provides that the receipt by a person of a share of the profits of a business is primâ facie evidence that such person is a partner in the business. The only evidence here is that Schofield was to receive a part of the profits, and, therefore, he is a partner. But, secondly, even if he is not a partner, he comes within section 3, and his claim is postponed until all the other creditors of the bankrupt have been satisfied. The Divisional Court held that the contract between Schofield and the bankrupt not being in writing, section 3 did not apply; but it cannot have been the intention of the Legislature that the lender should be in a more favourable position when the contract is verbal than when it is in writing. The words, "such a contract as is mentioned in the last foregoing section" in section 3 do not refer exclusively to the contracts in writing dealt with in section 2, sub-section 3 (d). Verbal contracts are also dealt with in section 2, as for example, in sub-section 2 (a). If the lender's proof is postponed under section 3, then he has no right to vote at the creditor's meeting: Ex parte Taylor, In re Grason, 28 W. R. 205, 12 Ch. D. 366.

H. Reed, Q.C., and Bradbury, for the respondent Schofield.—The question is whether section 3 applies to a verbal contract such as this. Section 3 is a disabling section, because apart from it any one who has lent money to a man can prove in the borrower's bankruptcy unless they are partners. Under section 2, sub-section 3 (d), a particular kind of contract is referred to, which confers a privilege if the contract is in writing. That privilege, and the disability imposed by section 3 are correlative, and unless the borrower obtains the benefit of section 2, sub-section 3 (d), by having a written contract he does not come within the disabling provisions of section 3. The words "such a contract" cannot refer to two different kinds of contract, one verbal and one in writing. Regard must be had to the use of the word "mentioned" in section 3. The only contract for an advance by way of loan which is mentioned in section 2 is that in sub-section 3 (d), and in determining whether a contract is within sub-section 3 (d) you must not take a part only of what is mentioned in that clause—viz., the substance of the contract, and ignore the proviso as to the form of the contract.

They referred to Bovill's Act, ss. 1 and 5.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the respondent Schofield lent a sum of money to a man in order to enable him to set up in business. The borrower has now become a bankrupt. The money was lent to him upon certain terms. First of all there was a term that Schofield at some future date was to be repaid the sum advanced; and, secondly, that, until he was repaid, he was to be paid interest. Then there was a further term to the effect that the borrower was to be paid a weekly allowance out of the profits of the business, as if he were the manager of it; and, finally, after these payments of interest and the allowance to the borrower had been made, the surplus profits arising from the business were to be divided equally between the lender and the borrower until the loan had been paid off.

Now, the question we have to determine is whether such a contract as that is a contract which is mentioned or, as I should prefer to say, dealt with in section 2 of the Partnership Act, 1890, not merely in sub-section 3 (d), but in any part of the section. Sub-section 3 (a) says that "the receipt by a person of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business does not of itself make him a partner in the business or liable as such." Now, does that clause deal with the case of money being lent upon the terms that the borrower shall be repaid out of the profits of a business? It seems to me perfectly clear that such a transaction does come within the words of the clause. The clause assumes the case of a person being paid a debt out of the profits of a business and, to my mind, that assumes that the lender has lent his money upon the terms that he should be repaid out of the profits of the business. Therefore, you have a transaction such as the one in this case dealt with by clause (a) of sub-section 3, and in clause (d) it is certainly dealt with again. Then section 3 says: "In the event of any person to whom money has been advanced by way of loan upon such a contract as is mentioned in the last foregoing section." Now, that case is dealt with both in clauses (a) and (d) of section 2, sub-section 3, but it is said that such a contract is not "mentioned" in clause (a). It is mentioned by absolute inference, for clause (a) cannot be read unless it is to be inferred as a matter of course and beyond any doubt that such a contract is included in it. To my mind that which is read in by necessary implication in such an Act of Parliament as this is equivalent to its being mentioned. [His lordship read the rest of section 3, and continued:] If, then, the case of money lent upon the terms that it shall be repaid out of the profits, is included under the word "mentioned," as I think it is, not only in clause (d) but also in clause (a) and in the earlier part of section 3 itself, then this case is brought within section 3. In that view of the case it is not necessary to decide whether Schofield was a partner with the bankrupt, for, assuming that he is not and that he is only a lender upon the terms which I have stated, the effect of section 3 is to postpone his proof until the other creditors have been paid. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This case turns upon the true construction of section 2, sub-section 3 (d), of the Partnership Act, 1890, coupled with section 3 of the same Act. The question is whether, when a lender lends money upon the terms that he shall receive a share of the profits of the business to be carried on by the borrower, he is postponed in the case of the bankruptcy of the borrower to the other creditors of the borrower. I first of all make this remark upon section 3. In certain cases there cannot be a doubt—I say certain cases so as not to infringe upon any vexed point—that where a lender loans money to be employed in trade, the lender to receive a share of the profits, in the event of the bankruptcy of the borrower, the lender cannot recover his money until all the other creditors have been paid. One cannot very well see why it is that if a contract of loan is made in writing the lender shall be postponed, but that he shall not be postponed if the contract is by parol. I cannot see any reason for that. I know the answer which was given by Mr. Reed, which was very ingenious. He says that the benefit and the burden in these two sections are correlative, and must go together; and if the lender wants to take the benefit of sub-section (d)—that is, the case of the contract being in writing, he has the burden imposed upon him by section 3 of having repayment postponed; but if he has not got the contract in writing under (d) then he is not postponed under section 3. It is not very easy to see the sense of that, and I see, in looking at the judgment of the court below, that this struck Wright, J., in the course of the argument although he has given judgment in the same way as Vaughan Williams, J. Now I come to section 2 and it seems to me that the court below has not arrived at the true construction of it. I will not go through the whole of section 2 and the sub-sections thereof, but I will come at once to sub-section (d), "The advance of money by way of loan"—that is what happened here—"to a person engaged or about to engage in any business"—that is an advance of money by way of loan from Schofield to Fort—"on a contract."

Now, I ask what is the ordinary meaning of that? I should say that means a contract either oral or in writing, and I do not think it can be denied that the true meaning of the word "contract" there is oral or in writing—"on a contract with that person that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, or shall receive a share of the profits arising from carrying on the business, does not of itself make the lender a partner with the person or persons carrying on the business or liable as such." Now, there is a loan on a contract whether by parol or in writing to a borrower carrying payment by way of share in profits and the sub-section says that that does not of itself make the lender a partner with the borrower. Then it goes on: "Provided that the contract is in writing and signed by or on behalf of all the parties thereto." In my judgment the true reading of that clause (d) is that the contract part-embraces contracts by parol or in writing, but there is a limitation in this respect; that if the benefit of that section is wanted by the lender the contract must be reduced into writing and signed by him. Now, before I go to section 3 I may point out that it is remarkable, if the learned counsel for the respondent are right, that if the Legislature did not mean to alter the phraseology as to the meaning of "contract" they have taken pains in repealing Bovill's Act (which is repealed by the Partnership Act, 1890) to alter the phraseology of Bovill's Act, which is "upon a contract in writing" and have inserted "on a contract," leaving out "in writing," and as I say, the contract may be either by parol or in writing, but if the lender wants the benefit of the Act, then the contract must be in writing. Now I come to section 3, and it is upon section 3 that the whole of this question turns: "In the event of any person to whom money has been advanced by way of loan upon"—what?—"such a contract." That means by parol or in writing, exactly as in sub-section 3 (d) of section 2. The proviso is not needed here. If the money is loaned upon such a contract either by parol or in writing, then the lender is to be postponed. That is my construction of this Act, and for the reasons I have given I think the court below was wrong, and this appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is really a very short one, What is "such a contract" as is mentioned in section 3? The particular contract mentioned is, in my opinion, the one mentioned in sub-section 3 (d) of section 2—that is, a contract that the lender shall receive a share of profits derived from carrying on the business. Then there are certain provisions as to what shall follow. This is not amplifying or varying or altering the contract in any way. We have already got a description of the contract that has been dealt with. Now I go on with the sub-section, which goes on to say that such, as a contract, "does not of itself make the lender a partner with the person or persons carrying on the business or liable as such. Provided that the contract is in writing, and signed by or on behalf of the parties thereto." According to the simplest interpretation of English words the contract is described before, and the whole description is contained in the section before you get to what is to be the result. Such a contract shall have such an effect if it is in writing. I might use the language of A. L. Smith, L.J. I will not repeat it, but I agree entirely with what he said. The proviso is that such a contract as we have described shall have a certain effect if it be in writing. Section 3 says that the contract shall have another effect, and if we had this section alone to deal with I cannot really think that there is much difficulty about the interpretation. It certainly is not rendered more difficult by considering the state of things under Bovill's Act, which has been repealed. There it refers to a contract in writing, and there were certain cases in which you might have had this absurdity: that if a man contracted verbally no result would necessarily follow, but if he entered into the same contract in writing an important result might follow. Really that must have been accidental, and the accidental effect of that was, I should say, carefully avoided by changing, in the way in which the words have been changed, the language of section 1 of Bovill's Act. We have gone upon the assumption here that this contract did not create a partnership. The only question being whether Schofield should vote or not, which depends upon the question of whether he is postponed to the other creditors, we do not need to say anything more than is necessary to decide that question. Therefore anything which we have said has not the slightest bearing upon that verbal contract. We assume it is a loan of money, and a loan of money only; and although it is not in writing we think it comes entirely within the terms of section 3.

BOORD v. AFRICAN CONSOLIDATED LAND CO. (a.)

Company—Register—Inspection—Right to take extracts —Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 32.

The right of inspection under section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, includes the right of taking copies of the register.

Motion.

The plaintiffs were holders of 1,000 and 50 shares respectively in the defendant company.

On the 7th of September a resolution was passed to forfeit their shares because of non-payment of a call.

By article 41, where any shares shall have been so forfeited, notice of the resolution shall be given to the member whose shares shall have been forfeited, and an entry shall be made in the register. And by article 44, forfeiture was not to affect liability to pay calls.

On the 21st of October the plaintiffs obtained an order for inspection from the Vacation Judge. The company refused to allow the plaintiffs to take notes.

On the 22nd of October the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote asking for inspection, including the right of taking notes, and stating that if this was refused they would commence an action, and upon the company's refusal issued a writ asking that the company might be restrained by injunction from preventing the plaintiffs at reasonable times from inspecting and taking extracts from the register.

In the register the names of shareholders whose shares were alleged to be forfeited had a red line drawn through them, but the names were still legible.

The company contended that these names did not form part of the register, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to copy a list of the names of the forfeited shareholders.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the plaintiffs.—The right to inspection includes the right to take copies. This has been decided under the Company's Clauses Act: Mutter v. Eastern and Midlands Railway Co., 36 W. R. 401, 38 Ch. D. 92; Holland v. Dickson, 36 W. R. 320, 37 Ch. D. 669. The right of inspection of the register of mortgages under section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862, includes a right to take copies of the register: Nelson v. Anglo-American Land Mortgage Agency Co., 45 W. R. 171, [1897] 1 Ch. 130. It must be the same under section 32.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and W. Higgins, for the company.—The plaintiffs have cease to be members. The cases cited do not apply, for under section 32 a a copy can be obtained on payment of sixpence for every hundred words copied. Anyone who wants a copy must pay a proper fee and get a copy from the company, and not make a copy himself.

NORTH, J.—This is an application that the company may be restrained by injunction from preventing the plaintiffs at reasonable times from inspecting and taking extracts from the register. The case is covered by authority, for where there is power to inspect the register there is power to take extracts. Holland v. Dickson and Mutter v. Eastern and Midlands Railway Co. show this, unless there is a distinction, because the application here is under section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862. As a copy can be obtained upon payment of sixpence for every hundred words copied, it is said that the right to take extracts is excluded. In my opinion the power to call on the company to give a copy of the register is an additional privilege. A man can take notes, and also if he likes obtain a full copy. If the plaintiffs are members, their right to inspection is clear. It is said, however, that the plaintiffs have ceased to be members, and omitted to tender a shilling. But this was not the ground the company took; the company refused to allow the plaintiffs to take extracts, and would have done so whether the shilling was tendered or not. The plaintiffs must have the costs of the motion in any event.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC v. LA COMPAGNIE FRANCO-BELGE DU CHEMIN DU FER DU NORD. (a.)

International law—Foreign state—Cross-action.

Where a foreign state sues in this country, a counter-claim cannot be made against it except for matters arising out of the original action, and claims for damages for breach of agreement by the plaintiff state which would, if a subject were suing, form the subject-matter of a separate action will be struck out.

The plaintiff republic brought an action for the appointment of a new trustee of large sums of money which, in pursuance of an arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendant, had been lodged in a bank in the joint names of two trustees, one of whom was nominated by the plaintiff and the other by the defendant. The trustee nominated by the plaintiff died, and the plaintiff brought this action asking for a declaration that the fund ought to be held by two trustees; a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled now and from time to time hereafter to nominate a trustee; the appointment of a trustee on the plaintiff's nomination in the place of the deceased trustee; and payment of the funds (which had been paid into court) to the trustees when constituted.

The defendant submitted that it would be inequitable that the fund should be placed under the control of the plaintiff except upon the terms of the plaintiff agreeing to perform the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant.

A counter-claim asked for (1) payment by the plaintiff of three sums of £60,000, £1,800, and £147,895 16s. 8d.; (2) £100,000 damages for libel; (3) that the plaintiff might be restrained from taking proceedings in the republic's own courts to have the concessions to the defendant declared void, or in the alternative for £100,000 damages.

The claim for damages for libel had already been struck out (46 W. R. 67, [1897] 2 Ch. 487).

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiff.—Where a sovereign state sues in this country, cross-proceedings can only be taken for discovery or in mitigation of the relief claimed. The counter-claim is not connected with the relief asked, and should form the subject-matter of a separate action.

They cited Duke of Brunswick v. King of Hanover, 6 Beav. 1, 2 H. L. Cas. 1; Strousberg v. Republic of Costa Rica, 29 W. R. 125; Prisleau v. United States, 14 W. R. 1012, L. R. 2 Eq. 659; The Parlement Belge, 28 W. R. 642, 5 P. D. 197; The Newbattle, 33 W. R. 318, 10 P. D. 33; Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, [1894] 1 Q. B. 149. A counter-claim is equivalent to a cross-action: Birmingham Estates Co. v. Smith, 28 W. R. 666, 13 Ch. D. 506; Amon v. Bobbett, 37 W. R. 329, 22 Q. B. D. 543. The defendant is not in a better position because he makes a counter-claim than if he brought a cross-action. There is no jurisdiction to entertain the counter-claim.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Whinney.—The counter-claim should be dealt with at the trial. The plaintiff has come here and submitted to the jurisdiction: Griendtoveen v. Hamlyn, 8 Times L. R. 231. The trusts are to apply the fund to making a railway. This would be a proper counter-claim even if both plaintiff and defendant were subjects. The plaintiff is acting wrongly in taking proceedings to set aside the agreement, and if the defendant is not allowed to counter-claim, the plaintiff cannot be sued.

NORTH, J.—The application to strike out the counter-claim must succeed. The plaintiff is a foreign republic in the position of a foreign sovereign. Certain arrangements were made as to funds lodged in a bank in the name of two trustees, one nominated by the plaintiff, the other by the defendant. The plaintiff and the defendant had different views as to the application of those funds. The trustee nominated by the plaintiff died, and the nominee of the defendant survives, and claims to deal with the funds in a way the defendant thinks right, but which the plaintiff thinks wrong. The plaintiff asks for a declaration that the funds ought to be held by two trustees, the appointment on the plaintiff's nomination of a new trustee, and the payment out of the fund to the trustees. The plaintiff says the funds ought to be in the names of two trustees as it was before the death of the trustee nominated by the plaintiff. The fund has been paid into court. The defence is that the plaintiff has acted wrongly in many respects. After forty-two paragraphs of defence there is a counter-claim asking for (1) payment of three sums of £60,000, £1,800, and £147,895 16s. 8d.; (2) for £100,000 damages for libel; and (3) that the plaintiff may be restrained from taking proceedings in its own courts to have the concessions to the defendant declared void, or, in the alternative, £100,000 damages.

The application for damages for libel has been struck out, but no further relief was then asked. The plaintiff denies, and the defendant alleges, that the plaintiff has submitted to the jurisdiction of the court. As to the position of a foreign Government suing here, the cases of Duke of Brunswick v. King of Hanover, 2 H. L. Cas. 1, and Strousberg v. Republic of Costa Rica, 29 W. R. 125, have been cited. The defendant says that justice will not be done unless the counter-claim is admitted. With regard to this the question arises, first, Is it a claim that can be made at all? and, secondly, Can it be conveniently tried in this action? Is a sovereign suing in this country liable to have a cross-action brought against him? It is conceded that the part of the counter-claim asking for an injunction against proceedings in the plaintiff's own courts cannot succeed. The claim for damages for libel has been struck out. The claim for the three sums of money is not a claim in respect of the fund in court, and I do not think the claim can be rightly made in this action; it is a pecuniary claim quite outside it. If the plaintiff could be sued in this country this claim would be the subject-matter of a separate action.

The counter-claim must be struck out, but I give no costs, because part of the counter-claim has been already struck out, and the whole might have been struck out on the first application if it had been asked for.

BATEMAN v. FABER. (a.)

Married woman — Restraint on anticipation — Life interest determinable on fulfilment of certain condition —Bonâ fide but untrue admission by married woman that condition had been fulfilled — Admission inoperative—Inability of a married woman by her own act to annul a restraint on anticipation.

A married woman cannot, by any act of her own, annul the effect of a restraint upon anticipation to which her property is subject. Accordingly, where a married woman, who is entitled for her separate use, without power of anticipation, to an interest for her life, determinable in the event of her fulfilling a certain condition, executes a deed whereby she admits in good faith, though contrary to the truth, that she has fulfilled such condition and purports to release her life interest, her interest will not be affected by such admission any more than by such purported release, notwithstanding the fact that such admission and release were made with the object of inducing, and did in fact induce, an interested party so to alter his position as, in the result, to prejudicially affect his own interests.

Action.

By an indenture dated the 26th of June, 1867, and made between the defendant, Lord Bateman, of the one part, and Sir E. C. Kerrison and Russell Ellice, of the other part, Lord Bateman, in consideration of the sum of £11,430 then advanced to him by Kerrison and Ellice, conveyed to them his life interest in certain freehold estates called the Kelmarsh and Shobdon Court estates upon trust to secure the performance by him of the covenants entered into by him relating to the loan, and subject thereto upon trust to pay the net rents and profits thereof to his wife, Lady Bateman, the plaintiff, for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation. The deed then continued with the following proviso: "Provided, nevertheless, that if at any time the said Lady Bateman shall succeed to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum for her separate use, then and in such case the trust lastly hereinbefore declared shall absolutely cease and determine," and thereupon the property was to be held, subject, nevertheless, to the subsisting trusts, upon trust for Lord Bateman.

Lord Bateman subsequently mortgaged his interest in the Kelmarsh and Shobdon Court estates, subject to the above indenture, to Andrew Montagu as a collateral security for £110,000.

Upon the death of Sir E. C. Kerrison in 1886 the plaintiff became entitled to a life interest in the Kerrison estates in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Middlesex, and the question then arose as to whether or not the condition contained in the above-mentioned proviso had been fulfilled. The plaintiff's then solicitor advised her that she had fulfilled the condition, and, acting upon this advice, and in order to help her husband to obtain better terms with Montagu, the plaintiff executed a deed-poll dated the 4th of March, 1890, whereby, after reciting the above-mentioned facts, she admitted that the trust as to her life interest in the rents and profits of the said Kelmarsh and Shobdon Court estates under the indenture of the 26th of June, 1867, had determined under the proviso in that behalf therein contained, and did thereby release and quit claim to such rents and profits to the intent that the same might be held upon the thenceforward subsisting trusts of the said indenture freed and discharged from all claims and demands of her, the said Lady Bateman, in respect of such rents and profits.

As a result of the execution of the deed-poll Lord Bateman procured more advantageous terms from Montagu for payment of the principal and interest in respect of the said loan of £110,000. Montagu died in October, 1895, and the defendant, George Denison Faber, was his sole executor and residuary legatee.

After the execution of the deed-poll, the plaintiff discovered, as she alleged, that her income from the Kerrison estates did not amount to £8,000 a year, on account of numerous prior incumbrances, so that the deed-poll was executed by her under a misapprehension as to the true state of the facts. The plaintiff accordingly brought the present action against Faber, her husband, and his mortgagees, as defendants, claiming a declaration (1) that she had not at any time since the execution of the deed of 1867 succeeded to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more for her separate use within the meaning of the proviso; and (2) that her admission in the deed-poll of the 14th of March, 1890, was not binding upon her in respect of the income to which, under the deed of 1867, she became entitled for her separate use without power of anticipation, and that, notwithstanding the deed-poll, she had always been, and still was, entitled to such income and consequential relief. At the trial of the action the argument was confined to the question whether or not the deed-poll was binding upon the plaintiff having regard to the fact that she was under the deed of 1867 restrained from anticipation.

Warrington, Q.C., and Beaumont, for the plaintiff.—Lady Bateman, being restrained from anticipation under the deed of 1867, could not in the circumstances assign, release, or dispose of her interest under that deed. This would be so even if there had been fraud on her part: see Jackson v. Hobhouse, 2 Mer. 483, where Lord Eldon favours such a view, although in that case he did not so decide, as he held that no fraud had been made out. The same question arose for decision in Stanley v. Stanley, 26 W. R. 310, 7 Ch. D. 589, and according to that case, even if Lady Bateman had fraudulently recited the indenture and then executed the deed, that act of hers would have no effect. Stanley v. Stanley has been twice referred to in the House of Lords with approval, in Cahill v. Cahill, 31 W. R. 861, 8 App. Cas. 420, and again in Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, 42 W. R. 628, [1894] 2 Q. B. 559. The court refused to disregard or interfere with restraint on anticipation in Arnold v. Woodhams, 21 W. R. 694, L. R. 16 Eq. 29, and in In re Glanvill, 34 W. R. 309, 31 Ch. D. 532, where the correctness of the decision in In Re Andrews, 34 W. R. 62, 30 Ch. D. 159, was called in question. The defendants also contend that the plaintiff is bound by estoppel, but the cases on which they will doubtless rely, such as Sharpe v. Foy, 17 W. R. 65, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 35, and Jones v. Frost, 20 W. R. 1025, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 773, although showing that a married woman can be affected by estoppel as to her separate estate, do not deal with a case like the present, where she is also restrained from anticipation. We submit that on the authorities the decision of the court ought to be in Lady Bateman's favour.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Renshaw, Q.C., and Brabant, for the defendant Faber.—This is simply a question of fact—namely, had Lady Bateman succeeded to an income of £8,000 a year or not? In the recital she stated that she had, and that the provision had operated. We submit that this admission by her would be good and binding on her, because she is the only person who could prove it. It was on the faith of this admission that Montagu changed his position. Married women, even when restrained from anticipation, are subject to the discipline of the court: Derbishire v. Home, 3 De G. M. & G. 80, and White v. Greenish, 11 C. B. N. S. 209, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 34. We submit that the plaintiff's admission was a final statement made with knowledge of all the facts and with the object of getting Montagu to alter his position, that the plaintiff is bound by it, and that she has ceased to have any interest under the deed.

Quin, for the defendant Lord Bateman.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question for decision is one of law rather than fact. It is suggested by the defendants that it is one of fact, but their argument shows that from their point of view it really is one of law. The plaintiff's point is simple enough. By this deed of the 26th of June, 1867, Lady Bateman was entitled to the rents and profits for her life without power to anticipate them, but there was a cesser of her interest in the event of her succeeding to an income of £8,000 a year; in that event the rents and profits were then to go to Lord Bateman, he deriving his interest by virtue of the cesser. There is a question which will arise on this further point—namely, whether Lady Bateman had in fact succeeded to such an income. That no doubt is a pure question of fact, except that we shall have, first of all, to determine what is intended by the words "succeed" and "income in her own right." If Lady Bateman has, in fact, fulfilled the condition no question could arise, the fact occurring, the cesser follows indisputably.

It is said, however, that the plaintiff has admitted that she has succeeded to such an income, and that the proviso has taken effect. There is no doubt that she did make that statement and did so for the purpose of inducing Mr. Montagu to enter into the arrangement concerning the mortgage, but there is no suspicion of fraud because she did it in good faith and acting under her solicitor's advice. If there is fraud it is in insisting now on a right which she can only hold by defeating the deed-poll. Mr. Montagu has been misled, but he has been misled with his eyes open. To my mind fraud in the ordinary sense of the word does not come into the question at all. The defendants wish me to infer that the fact of her succession to £8,000 a year was incapable of any other proof; they say that Lady Bateman, having once admitted the fact, notwithstanding that it was not true, cannot now set up the truth. But what is the difference between that way of putting the argument and the way in which it was put for the plaintiff. Whether Lady Bateman says, "I admit that the proviso has come into operation," or "I release my life interest," it amounts to the same thing. She was restrained from doing either the one or the other, for in whatever way it is put she purports to get rid of her life interest by her own act. If I were to say in the present case that owing to her admission of a fact which in reality was not true, her restraint on anticipation was gone, I should be going contrary to the principle of Jackson v. Hobhouse. Then it was said that by the admission she did not derogate from the restraint on anticipation. I do not think so. The restraint on anticipation was annexed to the life estate. What Lady Bateman was entitled to was an estate for life with a restraint on anticipation, and if you once destroy the restraint on anticipation you destroy the estate for life; the two are inseparable. In my opinion Lady Bateman could not, by taking advantage of the proviso, cause a cesser of her estate for life; on this point, therefore, the plaintiff succeeds.

KAY v. DEWHIRST. (a.)

Will—Absolute gift of share of personalty—Share settled by codicil "instead of" gift by will—No revocation.

A father by will gave his personal estate to his two daughters, S. and H., equally. By a codicil he directed that "instead of such bequests in the manner expressed in my said will to such daughter absolutely," his executors were to hold the income of the proceeds of his personal estate, after sale and conversion, on trust to pay one moiety to each daughter for life, and on their respective deaths to pay the respective moieties of the fund to their respective children as they should by deed or will appoint, and, in default, to such children equally. There was no gift over in the event of a daughter dying without issue. H. died without ever having had any issue, leaving a will by which she disposed of all her real and personal property.

Held, that there was no intestacy in the event which had happened as to the share in which H. took a life interest by the codicil, as there had been no revocation of the absolute gift in the will.

Doe d. Murch v. Marchant, 6 Man. & G. 813, discussed.

Adjourned summons.

David Wilcock duly made his will dated the 10th of October, 1840, and after disposing of his real estate in the manner therein directed, but not material for the purposes of the present decision, gave and bequeathed all his personal estate and effects, not thereinbefore bequeathed (subject to the payment of legacies, debts, funeral and testamentary expenses) unto and equally between his said daughters share and share alike. And directed that each of his said daughters should have and be paid £1,000 on their respective days of marriage in part of their respective shares of his personal estate. And he thereby appointed his wife and his said two daughters executrixes of his said will.

There was a first codicil not material for the present decision.

The testator made a second codicil dated the 27th of May, 1847, to his said will, and thereby directed that the provision contained in his said will for payment of £1,000 to each of his daughters upon marriage should be null and void, as if the same had not been therein inserted, and as to all his personal estates and effects which he had given and bequeathed in his said will, subject as therein mentioned unto and between his two daughters share and share alike the testator thereby willed and directed that instead of such bequests in the manner expressed in his said will to such daughters absolutely his executors should stand possessed of all such aforesaid personalty upon the trusts thereinafter contained—that was to say, "Upon trust to convert all saleable parts thereof into money and to invest and keep invested upon the terms of altering any security from time to time all moneys arising or to arise from the whole of such aforesaid personality, estates, and effects bequeathed to him by my said will as aforesaid unto my said daughters upon trust to receive the yearly interest or profits thereof, and as to one-half thereof to pay the same from time to time unto my eldest daughter Sarah Ann during her life for her own sole use and for such purpose into her own hands only, so as not to be liable to the disposition or power of any husband and as to the other half part of such income upon trust to pay the same from time to time unto my daughter Harriet during her life for her own use and for such purpose into her own hands only, so as not to be liable to any disposition or power as last mentioned of any husband. And from and after the decease of either of my said daughters respectively, then as to one equal half part of all such trust moneys or personalty upon trust to pay the same unto and amongst such one or more of the lawful child or children of such first deceased daughter that shall attain the age of twenty-one years (and exclusive of the other or others of them) and in such shares or proportions and at such time or times or to pay the income thereof or of any part thereof to any such child or children as such first deceased daughter shall by any deed or will duly execute in her lifetime direct, appoint, give, or bequeath the same, and in default any such gift or bequest upon trust to pay such equal half part of all such trust moneys unto and amongst all such child or children as aforesaid of such first deceased daughter share and share alike as hereinafter mentioned, and as to the other half part of such income from all such trust moneys and personalty as aforesaid upon trust to pay the same from time unto the surviving daughter during her life in manner aforesaid and after the decease of such surviving daughter upon trust to pay such last described half part of all such trust moneys and personalty as aforesaid unto and amongst such one or more exclusive of the other or others of the lawful child or children of such surviving daughter that shall attain the age of twenty-one years, and in such shares or proportions and at such time or times or to pay the income thereof or of any part thereof to any such last-named child or children as such deceased surviving daughter shall by any deed or will duly executed in her lifetime direct, appoint, give, or bequeath the same, and in default of any such gift or bequest upon trust to pay such last described equal half part of all such trust moneys and personalty unto and amongst all such child or children as aforesaid of such last deceased daughter subject as hereinafter mentioned. And I do will and direct that such powers to dispose of all my said trust moneys and personalty as aforesaid so given to my said daughters shall not prevent either of my said daughters from bequeathing the whole or any part of the income of their respective shares thereof for the benefit of any surviving husband of either of them during his lifetime, and I do accordingly empower my said daughters respectively by any deed or will to give the whole or any part of the income last described to any such husband for his own benefit during his lifetime."

The testator died in 1847, and his will and codicils were duly proved.

He had three children, William Butterfield Wilcock, Sarah Ann Wilcock, and Harriet Wilcock.

Sarah Ann married James Dewhirst, and died in 1858, leaving six children surviving her, two of whom, Hannah Beatrice Dewhirst and Mary Lucilla Dewhirst, were defendants to the action.

Harriet Wilcock, the testator's other daughter, married David Hemsworth, and died a widow on the 20th of October, 1896, without ever having had any issue, and by her will she gave all her real estate and her personal estate not otherwise therein disposed of to the plaintiff and the defendant Mary Lucilla Dewhirst upon trust for sale and conversion, and then upon further trusts under which the said Mary Lucilla Dewhirst was absolutely entitled, subject to the payment of the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and an annuity of £12 to an old servant.

The question in the originating summons taken out by the plaintiff, who was one of the trustees of the testator's will, on which the decision is reported, was whether, in the events which had happened, there was an intestacy as to the undivided moiety of the testator's residuary personal estate in which Harriet Hemsworth was entitled to a life interest.

Levett, Q.C., and Mark Romer, for the defendants Joseph Hill and Vernon David Wilcock.—There is an express revocation, and so an intestacy: Re Richards, Williams v. Gorvin, 50 L. T. Rep. 22, 32 W. R. Dig. 227. The word "instead" distinguishes this case from Lassence v. Tierney, 1 Mac. & G. 551.

ROMER, J.—I have had, and still have, considerable doubt as to what my decision ought to be in this case. But on further consideration I have come to the conclusion, contrary to my first impression, that there is no intestacy as to Mrs. Hemsworth's share of the residuary personal estate. Undoubtedly by the will that share is given to her absolutely. And the question is whether that gift is revoked by the codicil beyond what is necessary to give effect to the special provisions of that codicil. The principles applicable to the question are clear. The first is that referred to by Lord Cairns in Kellett v. Kellett, L. R. 3 H. L. 160, 167, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 3, 18, where he says, "The principle is perfectly clear that where you have a distinct disposition made by a will, that disposition cannot be revoked by a codicil except through the medium and use of words equally clear and distinct." Another principle is that pointed out by Lord Cottenham in Lassence v. Tierney, 1 Mac. & G. 551, 561, that "If a testator leaves a legacy absolutely as regards his estate, but restricts the mode of the legatees' enjoyment of it to secure certain objects for the benefit of the legatee upon failure of such objects the absolute gift prevails." On the other hand, as pointed out in Gompertz v. Gompertz, 2 Ph. 107, and also in Lassence v. Tierney, and again by Pearson, J., in In re Richards, 50 L. T. Rep. 22, 32 W. R. Dig. 227, it is clear that if there is an absolute gift by will, and then a clause (whether a subsequent part of the will or by codicil), not merely modifying the enjoyment by the legatee, but diminishing the estate originally given to him, then the absolute gift has in effect been cut down, and the court can only give effect to it as so diminished. Now, applying these principles to the case before me, what effect ought I to give to the codicil? The conclusion I come to is that the testator has not merely entirely revoked the gift by the will, but has only modified it to the extent shown by that codicil. It is noticeable that by the codicil the payment of £1,000 provided for by the will is clearly revoked. But when the testator comes to deal with the residuary personal estate he only says that "instead of the bequest in the manner expressed in the will to his daughters absolutely" he directs his executors to stand possessed of the residuary personal estate upon trusts which are for the benefit of the daughters, their children and appointees.

This is certainly not clearly a total revocation, and I gather that the real object of the codicil was only to modify the gifts to the daughters in the will to the extent and in manner pointed out by that codicil but not beyond.

I quite feel the force of the word "instead" used in the codicil, but the other words used "in the manner expressed in my said will to such daughters absolutely" seem to me to point, not to a total substitution of the new gift for the old, but a modification of the old gift, and I think to carry out the will and codicil taken together the same meaning should be given to the word "instead" as was given in Doe d. Murch v. Marchant, where Tindal, J., says: "The argument on the part of the plaintiff has been that inasmuch as the devise in the codicil is expressly given to Betty Jones" instead of "the devise and bequest contained in the will it must be considered as an express revocation of the former devise, and the substitution of that contained in the codicil. But we think the force of that word will be satisfied without giving it so large an operation, and that it may well be interpreted to mean" instead of so much only of "the devise in the will as is incompatible with the disposition contained in the codicil. And this appears to us the sounder construction, as it is the manifest intention of the testatrix both in the will and codicil to make Betty Jones the principal object of her bounty?"

On these grounds there must be a declaration that there is no intestacy as to the moiety of the personal estate given to Mrs. Hemsworth.

PHILLIPS v. THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.
COCKERTON v. THE SAME. (a.)

Elementary education—School board—Superannuation fund—Deductions from salaries of teachers—Ultra vires—Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), s. 35.

A school board established a fund, to be formed by means of deductions from the salaries of the school teachers, for the purpose of providing superannuation allowances for the teachers on their retirement owing to age or ill-health. The expenses of managing the fund were paid by the board out of their general revenues.

A teacher who, by an agreement in writing with the school board, had contracted to come under the superannuation scheme and to permit the deductions from her salary to be made, subsequently brought an action to recover the amount of the deductions so made.

Held, that the contract between the plaintiff and the school board was not illegal as being ultra vires of the board, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Appeals from decisions of His Honour Judge Lumley Smith, sitting at the Westminster County Court.

The plaintiff Phillips was appointed a teacher by the London School Board in the year 1884. Shortly afterwards the school board prepared a scheme for providing superannuation allowances to their officers and teachers. Under this scheme two per cent. was to be deducted from the salaries to form the corpus of a superannuation fund, and out of this fund the officers and teachers were to receive allowances, according to a certain scale, on their retirement from the service of the board through age or ill-health. The board were to guarantee the solvency of the fund.

The board desired to obtain statutory powers enabling them to carry the scheme into effect, no such powers being contained in the Elementary Education Acts; they accordingly prepared Bills for this purpose, but no such Bill was passed. Subsequently the board passed a resolution bringing the scheme into operation, subject to the proviso that should they not obtain Parliamentary authority for the scheme within two years the deductions made from the salaries would be returned to the recipients of the salaries less the expenses of managing the fund. They afterwards passed a resolution extending the period of two years to five years. The plaintiff Phillips agreed in writing to come under the scheme.

In March, 1893, the five years having expired without statutory powers having been obtained, resolutions were passed under which the teachers then in the service of the board were given the option either of receiving back with interest the contributions to the fund which had been made by means of deductions from their salaries or of permitting these contributions to be carried to a new superannuation fund, the solvency of which was not to be guaranteed by the Board, or in any way aided out of money arising from the rates.

The plaintiff Phillips chose the latter alternative, and on the 13th of April, 1893, in writing agreed with the board that the part deductions from her salary should be carried to the new fund, and that the board should be entitled in the future to deduct two per cent. from her salary as a contribution to the new fund. This deduction was accordingly made each year until January, 1897, when she resigned her office of teacher. She then requested the accountant of the fund to repay to her all moneys which had been deducted from her salary since 1888, and on his refusal to do so she brought this action in the Westminster County Court.

The facts in Cockerton's case were similar; the only material difference being that she entered the service of the board after the passing of the resolutions of March, 1893. Under those resolutions it was made compulsory upon a teacher thereafter entering the service of the board to sign an agreement to come under the superannuation scheme and permit the deductions from salary to be made; the plaintiff Cockerton so agreed.

It was admitted that the clerical expenses connected with the management of the superannuation fund were paid out of the general funds of the board.

The county court judge found in both cases that the deductions were made with the consent of the plaintiffs, and held that they were not in law entitled to recover them; he therefore gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Jelf, Q.C. (Organ with him), for the appellants.—The appellants are entitled to recover. Although under section 35 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, a school board is entitled to appoint teachers "and assign them such salaries or remuneration (if any) as they think fit," they have no power to establish a superannuation fund or make agreements with their employés as to their contributions to that fund. They are a corporation established by Parliament for a particular purpose, and if they act outside that purpose they are acting ultra vires: Brice on Ultra Vires, pp. 37, 40, 640; Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, 24 W. extra clerical expenses rendered necessary by the establishment of this fund. [WRIGHT, J.—Why cannot the board under section 35 fix a teacher's salary by paying so much to the teacher and allotting so much with her consent to a common fund for the benefit of all the teachers? Hewlett v. Allen, 42 W. R. 670, [1894] A. C. 383, at p. 392.] That is not within the powers of the board under section 35.

A. J. Ram, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

WRIGHT, J.—By section 35 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, a school board has power to appoint officers and teachers and to "assign them such salaries or remuneration (if any) as they think fit." It appears that in the year 1888 the London School Board established a kind of superannuation fund. So far as their scheme is before us the fund out of which the payments or allowances are to be made is derived entirely from the contributions of the teachers themselves, although it appears that the management expenses are, to some extent at all events, paid out of money derived from the rates. The plaintiff Mrs. Phillips, who was a teacher before the scheme was set on foot, agreed to come under the scheme, and deductions were accordingly made out of her salary for the purposes of the superannuation fund. In 1893 the board proposed to alter some of the arrangements as to the fund, and gave an option to the existing teachers either to receive back all their contributions with interest or to come under the amended scheme. Mrs. Phillips exercised her option by electing to come under the scheme. Then on leaving the service of the board she brings this action to recover the amount of her contributions.

Now, these moneys had been carried to the superannuation fund in pursuance of a contract between the plaintiff and the school board. The plaintiff can only recover if she can show that that contract is void or illegal. The only ground upon which it is suggested that it is void or illegal is that it is ultra vires of the school board; and the only ground upon which it is suggested that it is ultra vires is that some charge is thrown on the money arising from the rates for the expenses of management of the superannuation fund. I will assume for the moment that that is illegal in some sense as being beyond the powers of the board; yet there was no contract between the board and the plaintiff that the rates should be charged, and I cannot see any ground for saying that the contract is vitiated because of this charge on the rates. I do not see why the fact of the charge on the rates being ultra vires can entitle the plaintiff to recover money which, with her full consent, has been paid to a particular fund to be applied for the benefit of herself and others.

But I desire to say a word as to the legality of what the school board have done. They may, under section 35, assign such salaries or remuneration as they think fit; I cannot see that it was not competent for them to assign to a teacher who consented a salary or remuneration, part of which was to be paid quarterly (or as it may be) and part to be accumulated until the expiration of the service or other period, and then to be applied for the benefit of all those who agree to join in the scheme. I am not sure that it would be wrong for the board to pay out of rate-provided money the expenses of administering such a fund. That is not for our decision, but it seems to me an open question.

As regards the other plaintiff, I see no substantial difference; she was appointed after the scheme of 1893 had been adopted, and she agreed to enter the service on the terms of these deductions being made. I think both appeals must be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J.—I entirely agree. There is nothing ultra vires in the contracts between the plaintiffs and the school board. There was no contract to pay anything out of the rates, and this is of itself sufficient to dispose of the argument of Mr. Jelf. The contract was not illegal, and it is impossible to hold that money ought to be repaid which was paid with the full consent of both parties for a special purpose.

Appeals dismissed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, J.) } July 15, 1897.

WATKINS v. BARNARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Execution—Administration order—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 46, 125—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11 (2).

A judgment creditor levied execution upon the goods of a judgment debtor. The sheriff seized and sold the goods, retaining the proceeds for fourteen days as required by section 11 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. Within the fourteen days the sheriff had notice of a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor, and therefore continued to hold the money after the fourteen days had expired. Soon after that date the debtor died, and the petition of which the sheriff had had notice was dismissed; but a petition was presented by a different creditor for administration under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, upon which an administration order was made.

The trustee in the administration and the execution creditor both claimed the money in the hands of the sheriff.

Held, that the execution creditor was entitled to the money, because it had become his property prior to the making of the administration order, and at that date no longer formed part of the property of the debtor.

Interpleader issue directed to be tried before Vaughan Williams, J., to decide whether Watkins, the trustee of the property of A. A. Cronmire, deceased, or Barnard, an execution creditor of the said Cronmire, was entitled to certain money in the hands of the sheriff.

Upon the 8th of March, 1897, Barnard recovered judgment in the Queen's Bench Division against A. A. Cronmire for £956 11s. 6d. Upon March 9 he issued execution. The sheriff went in and seized the debtor's goods, which he sold on March 29, retaining the proceeds as required by section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

Within the fourteen days for which that section required him to retain the proceeds the sheriff received notice of the presentation of a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor, returnable on the 26th of April.

Upon the 16th of April the debtor died. Upon the 23rd of April a petition was presented for the administration of the debtor's estate in bankruptcy under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. This petition was heard and an order made thereon upon the 24th of April, and at the same time the previous petition in bankruptcy was dismissed.

The trustee under the administration order and the execution creditor both claimed the fund in the hands of the sheriff, who interpleaded, whereupon the present issue was directed.

A. R. Jelf, Q.C., and Hume Williams, for the creditor.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The question in this case is as to what effect, if any, section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, has on the rights of the execution creditor in this case. The dates in the case are not material, but the consecution of events is. There was a judgment, execution was levied on that judgment by the sheriff who seized and sold the goods of the debtor and received the proceeds. By the terms of section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, the sheriff had to hold those proceeds for fourteen days, and nobody doubts or disputes that section 11 had that amount of application. That is an application which section 11 has, not in bankruptcy, but in anticipation of the contingency of bankruptcy. The Legislature thinks that in cases where there is judgment and execution there is an inherent probability of such a state of insolvency that the judgment debtor's goods should be distributed equally among his creditors, and therefore it enacts that where there is this state of probabilty of insolvency the sheriff is to hold the proceeds of the goods sold for fourteen days before handing them over to the execution creditor.

On the facts of this case it is impossible to say that the execution creditor had acquired an absolute title to the proceeds, it was subject to bankruptcy not supervening within fourteen days. Within those fourteen days the sheriff received notice of a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor, shortly after the debtor died, and an order was made for the administration of his estate in bankruptcy under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Then the question arises whether sub-section 6 of section 125 makes section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, so apply as to defeat the defeasible title of the execution creditor.

Sub-section 6 of section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, enacts that: "With the modifications hereinafter mentioned all the provisions of Part III. of this Act, relating to the administration of the property of a bankrupt, shall so far as the same are applicable, apply to the case of an administration order under this section in like manner as to an order of adjudication under this Act."

Section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, is in substitution of section 46 of the Act of 1883, which was a provision of Part III. of that Act.

In spite of this it has been argued that section 11 of the Act of 1890 does not apply to administrations under section 125 of the Act of 1883 because the words of section 11 are if the sheriff have notice of "a bankruptcy petition" and "a receiving order is made thereon, or on any other petition of which the sheriff has notice." These words, it is urged, are not apt words to apply to "a petition for an order of administration" or to an "administration order." I do not assent to this argument; if I think any provision of Part III. of the Act is applicable to section 125 I shall apply it, even though the words of such provision be words apt for bankruptcy and not for administration. If I were not to do so no provisions of Part III. would be applicable to section 125 because the words of that part of the Act are throughout apt for bankruptcy rather than for administration.

Then, as to the case of In re Gould, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 35 W. R. 458, 19 Q. B. D. 92, that is an authority binding on me but it only decides that sub-section 6 of section 125 is not intended to operate so as to enlarge the assets of the deceased by taking in other people's property. That being so I have to enquire in this case whether the money in the hands of the sheriff formed, at the date of the administration order, part of the estate of the deceased, or was the property of the execution creditor, and I have come to the conclusion that it had become the property of the execution creditor, because no receiving order was made on the petition which was presented during the fourteen days for which the sheriff had to hold the money, and he had no notice within those fourteen days of the petition for administration on which an order was made. There will be judgment for the defendant and an order that the amount in the hands of the sheriff be paid to the defendant's solicitor, and that the plaintiff do pay the costs.

Judgment accordingly.

Admiralty—Practice—County court having admiralty jurisdiction — Mode of trial — Meaning of term "actions" in consolidating and amending Act—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 2—Maritime cause—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 101.

The proper mode of trial in the case of a maritime cause over which a county court having admiralty jurisdiction has jurisdiction under the 2nd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869, is either by the judge alone or by the judge assisted by mercantile assessors.

The parties in such a suit are not entitled to a jury: section 101 of the County Courts Act, 1888, by which it is provided that, in all "actions" where the amount claimed shall exceed five pounds, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff or defendant to require a jury to be summoned to try the said action, unless the action is of the nature of the causes or matters assigned to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, not being by the context applicable to admiralty or maritime causes tried in a county court having admiralty jurisdiction.

This was an appeal from the Admiralty side of the county court of Hampshire, holden at Portsmouth.

By the order appealed from, the judge of the county court of Hampshire had refused an application by the defendants, the Thames Moss Litter Co., to allow a jury to be sworn to try an admiralty action for balance of freight exceeding £5. The proceeding was taken under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869,*

---

* The section so far as material is as follows: "Any county court appointed or to be appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes: As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds."

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

An objection having been taken on behalf of the plaintiff, and sustained by the judge, that the action being a maritime action instituted in a county court having admiralty jurisdiction under the 2nd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869, the suit could not legally be tried by a jury.

March 23.—The appeal was heard by a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty (Jeune, P., and Barnes, J.).

The arguments and authorities referred to on the question decided by the court appear from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8.—JEUNE, P.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment prepared by my learned brother, and I agree in its conclusion; but as the matter is one of practical importance I think it well shortly to state the reasons which determine my decision. The question is whether under section 101 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the plaintiff or defendant can claim to have the action tried by a jury where the proceeding is one in which jurisdiction is given by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts, 1868 and 1869, and the subject-matter is not salvage towage or collision. To my mind the question resolves itself into this, Whether the Act of 1888 gave that right for the first time? I entertain no doubt that under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, no right to a jury was conferred. In The Tynwald, 43 W. R. 509. [1895] P. 142, my learned brother, Bruce, J., so held, on the ground mainly that the words "ordinary civil causes" in section 10 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, imputed a reference to the mode of trial alone common to such causes—namely, that before a judge. I do not wish to challenge this view, but my opinion is based rather on observation that the Act of 1868 gives an appeal on fact which is inconsistent with jury procedure, and provides for transfer of causes when convenient to the High Court of Admiralty.

Then came the Act of 1869. It may, I think, be assumed that this Act gave to the county courts an admiralty jurisdiction over matters previously within the cognizance of the courts of common law, and I feel the force of the argument that to hold that there is no right to a jury in trials under this Act is to suppose that the Legislature withdrew the right to a jury from causes in which it previously existed. But if the Act of 1868 did not give a right to a jury there is no language in the Act of 1869 which conferred that right. On the contrary, the provision as to assessors, though it does not, as does section (1) of the Act of 1868, give a right to assessors, and therefore does not lead so conclusively to an inference, as that section, still appears to me to point to trial before a judge as the recognized mode of trial. I think it would be a strong confirmation of this view if the decision in Simpson v. Blues, 20 W. R. 680, L. R. 7 C. P. 290, and Gunnestad v. Price, 23 W. R. 470, L. R. 10 Ex. 65, to the effect that these Acts do no more than give to the county courts a portion of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, could properly be preferred to those of the Privy Council in The Cargo ex Argos, 21 W. R. 707, L. R. 5 P. C. 134, and The Hewsons, L. R. 5 P. C. 134, and of the Court of Appeal in The Alina, 5 Ex. D. 227, and the Admiralty Court in The Rona, 30 W. R. 614, 7 P. D. 247, because it would seem impossible to suppose that in merely giving a portion of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty to the county court it was intended without any express words to that effect to set up a different mode of trial for that portion. This question, however, cannot, I think, now be considered open, and no such argument can be relied on. But it is to be observed that in The Alina the late Master of the Rolls, while holding that the county courts had obtained a wider jurisdiction than the High Court of Admiralty, assumed that in the county court trials would be before a judge without a jury. "The only suggestion we have heard," the learned judge said, "is that the plaintiff might not get a jury or the defendant might, but the answer was very simple. It does not follow that that was considered an evil by the Legislature. We know perfectly well that by the comparatively recent Judicature Act that very option is given to a plaintiff of going to a Division where there is no jury instead of to a Division where there is a jury. Did the Act of 1888, s. 101, reproducing the language of the County Court Act of 1846 (section 70), include actions on the admiralty side of the county courts? In The Tynwald I expressed my opinion that the Act (section 101) did not include causes of collision, salvage, and towage. It seemed to me impossible to suppose that it was intended by the general words employed to escheat the right to nautical assessors which was the well-established rule of trying such causes. If this view be correct, the absolute universality of the language of section 101 cannot be insisted on. I cannot, however, conceal from myself that the causes of collision, salvage, and towage stand on a different footing from the other causes in which jurisdiction was given by the Acts of 1868 and 1869. There are no words in the Act which seem so distinctly to exclude trial by jury in their case as to render a repeal of such words by general language improbable, and there is nothing in their nature unfitted for trial by jury. But on the whole, though not without some hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that, having regard to the subject-matter and the context, as the interpretation clause directs, the word "actions" in section 101 of the Act of 1888 should be understood not to include actions on the admiralty side of the county court. When it was a question of the local limits of the jurisdiction, as in The Hero, 40 W. R. 143, [1891] P. 294, or of appeal, as in The Eden, 40 W. R. 415, [1892] P. 67, or The Delano, 43 W. R. 65, [1895] P. 40, there was no reason why what applied to common law or Chancery proceedings should not also apply to those in admiralty. But mode of trial appears to me to be in a different position. If I am right in thinking that from 1868 to 1888 it was intended that admiralty actions in the county court should be tried in the same way as admiralty actions in the High Court, it seems to me highly improbable that by the use of general language in the Act of 1888 it was intended to effect a complete change in this respect. This view, I think, receives strong support from the consideration that, as was held by the Court of Appeal in The Delano, with regard to all admiralty actions, and as the provisions of the Act of 1885, s. 125, as to assessors in appeals in the High Court show, at any rate with regard to some admiralty actions, the appeal on fact given by the Act of 1868 remains a provision inconsistent with trial by jury. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

BARNES, J.—In this case the defendants, the cargo owners, contend that though the action is brought in rem under the Act of 1869, yet that by virtue of section 101 of the County Courts Act, 1888, they are entitled to require a jury to be summoned to try the case. On the other hand the plaintiff contends that the defendants have no such right and that the case must be tried by the judge sitting with assessors if required. The plaintiff desired to have the judge assisted by mercantile assessors, but was informed by the registrar that there were no such assessors attached to the court, and as no request was made to have assessors appointed, the question for determination resolves itself into this: Are the defendants entitled to have the case tried by a judge and jury, or is the judge to hear it alone? To answer this question it is necessary to review the Acts which bear upon the subject. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, conferred admiralty jurisdiction on county courts. Section 2 gave power to Her Majesty in Council to appoint county courts to have admiralty jurisdiction. Section 3 provided that "any county court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of the Act, certain causes (in the act referred to as admiralty causes)—namely, causes of salvage, towage, necessaries, wages, and damage to cargo or damage by collision within certain limits as to amount, and causes of the same kind as aforesaid where the said limits are exceeded, where the parties agree to the court having jurisdiction." There is now a further limit as to suits for wages, by section 165 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Act of 1868 contain provisions for transfer of causes to the High Court of Admiralty or to another county court. Sections 10, 11, and 13 are as follow: 10. "In an admiralty cause in a county court, the cause shall be heard and determined in like manner as ordinary civil causes are now heard and determined in county courts, save and except that in any admiralty causes of salvage, towage, or collision the county court judge shall, if he think fit, or on the request of either party to such cause, be assisted by two nautical assessors in the same way as the judge of the High Court of Admiralty is now assisted by nautical accessors." 11. "In any such admiralty cause as last aforesaid it shall be lawful for the judge of the county court, if he think fit, and he shall, upon request of either party, summon to his assistance, in such manner as general orders shall direct, two nautical assessors, and such nautical assessors shall attend and assist accordingly." 13. "The judge of every county court having admiralty jurisdiction shall hear and determine admiralty causes at the usual court held within his jurisdiction or at special courts to be held by him, and which he is hereby required to hold as soon as may be after he shall have had notice of an admiralty cause having arisen within the jurisdiction of the court." Section 26 provides for appeals to the High Court of Admiralty from decrees or orders of county courts in admiralty causes; and section 31 limits the right of appeals to cases where the amount decreed or ordered to be due exceeds £30. Section 34 provides that the Act shall be read as an Act with so much of the County Courts Act, 1846, and the Acts amending or extending the same as was then in force. Sections 35 and 36 contain provisions for the making of general orders for regulating the practice and procedure of the courts, but the rules now in force appear to have been made under these sections, combined with sections 164 and 165 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The present rules contain numerous special provisions relating to Admiralty actions. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act Amendment Act, 1869, is by section 1 to be read and interpreted as an Act with the Act of 1868, and by section 2 any county court appointed or to be appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes: (1) "As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship or in relation to the carriage of goods on any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds." (2) "As to any cause in respect of any such claim or claims as aforesaid, but in which the amount exceeds the said limit when the parties agree to the court having jurisdiction." Section 3 provides that the jurisdiction conferred by that Act and by the Act of 1868 may be exercised either by proceedings in rem or proceedings in personam. Section 4 extends the third section of the Act of 1868 to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds. Sections 5 provides that in any admiralty or maritime cause the judge may, if he think fit, or on the request of either party, be assisted by two mercantile assessors. The County Courts Act of 1846, by section 69, enacted that the judge of the county court should be the sole judge in actions brought in the said court, and should determine all questions of fact as well as of law, unless a jury should be summoned. As thereinafter mentioned and by section 79 it was enacted that in all actions where the amount claimed should exceed five pounds it should be lawful for the plaintiff or defendant to require a jury to be summoned to try the said action; and in all actions where the amount claimed should not exceed five pounds it should be lawful for the judge in his discretion, on the application of either of the parties, to order that such action be tried by a jury. It never seems to have been contended that those sections affected the mode of trial of admiralty actions.

The County Courts Act, 1888, which repealed the Act of 1846, by sections 100 and 101 repealed these provisions as to trial, but excepts actions of the nature of the causes or matters assigned to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice from the actions in which the parties have a right to a jury. Equity actions appear to be expressly excepted, because they are mentioned in Part III. of the Act, dealing with jurisdiction and law. They were not included in the Act of 1846, and jurisdiction in such actions was not conferred until 1863, and although it would seem that a judge may order a trial by jury, in that case neither party has a right to a jury.

Such being the Acts affecting the trial of admiralty actions in county courts, it was decided by this court in the case of The Tynwald that in an admiralty cause of collision in a county court, if one party asks for a jury and the other for assessors, the trial must be by judge and assessors. The President held that the exception in section 10 of the Act of 1868 enabled either party, or the judge, in cases of salvage, towage, or collision, to say that the trial should be by judge and assessors, and that section 101 of the Act of 1888 was not to be construed to repeal section 111 of the Act of 1868 and to establish a new mode for the trial of admiralty causes of salvage, towage, and collision. Bruce, J., arrived at the same conclusion, but by different reasoning from that adopted by the President. He held, for reasons given at length by him, that the provision in the first part of section 10, that an admiralty cause in a county court shall be heard and determined in like manner as ordinary civil causes were then heard and determined in county courts, meant that they were to be heard and determined by the judge alone, and that section 101 of the Act of 1888 had no application to admiralty actions. The President's judgment would not cover the present case, because the exception in section 10 is confined to salvage, towage, and collision actions, and it was not necessary to go further than he did; but the reasoning of Bruce, J., would apply to the present case.

In the main I agree with the views held by him. The Act of 1868 conferred admiralty jurisdiction on county courts, and admiralty jurisdiction was always exercised in the High Court of Admiralty by the judge alone or the judge assisted by assessors. The two classes of causes left untouched by the exception in the 10th section of the Act of 1868 are causes of necessaries and wages, with regard to which it was argued that the Act had not taken away the parties' common law right to a jury. But it is to be observed that in suits of this kind in the Admiralty Division of the High Court there is no right to a jury, although the Court of Admiralty had power, under section 11 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, if it thought fit, to direct a trial by jury of any issue or issues on any question or questions of fact arising in any contested suit.

When the ancient jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court to enforce the maritime lien of a seaman for his wages was extended by section 10 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, to claims by the master for his wages and disbursements, and to cases of special contract which could only be dealt with previously in the courts of common law, no right to a jury in the Admiralty Court in these cases was given. Again, when the 6th section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 and the 4th and 5th sections of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, gave the Admiralty Court jurisdiction over claims for necessaries in certain cases, and for the builders equipping or repairing of any ship, where the ship or proceeds thereof are already under arrest, no right to a jury was conferred. There seems, therefore, no reason for saying that in conferring admiralty jurisdiction on the county courts the Legislature did not intend causes of necessaries and wages to be determined without a jury. Further, if any such cause is transferred to the High Court under sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Act of 1868, it would be tried in the High Court without a jury. Moreover, an appeal is given in the 26th section of the Act of 1868 to the High Court of Admiralty from a decree or order of a county court in an admiralty cause. This provision is intelligible if the appeal is from a judge's decision, but not if a jury has tried the case, and there is no provision in the Act dealing with such a subject as new trials. In my opinion, if the whole scope of the Act of 1868 is considered, the intention was to set up inferior Admiralty Courts to deal with certain cases within certain limits, as such cases would be dealt with in the High Court of Admiralty, and the only difficulty in arriving at this conclusion, so far as it affects the mode of trial, is created by the first part of section 16 of the Act of 1888 and the incorporation of the Act of 1846 by section 34 of the Act of 1868, but this difficulty can be eliminated by adopting the opinion expressed by Bruce, J., in the case of The Tynwald.

The Act of 1888 is "an Act to consolidate and amend the County Courts Acts." Section 3 of that Act provides that every court held under the Act shall have all the jurisdiction and powers at any time prior to the coming into operation of the Act of 1846 belonging to any county court for the recovery of debts and demands as altered by the Act—i.e., the Act of 1888—throughout the whole district for which it is held. Part III. of the Act, under the title "Jurisdiction and Law," contemplates only common law actions and certain jurisdiction in equity. The only reference to an admiralty action is in section 125, where provision is made for assessors on the hearing of an appeal. The Acts repealed by the Act of 1888 are all Acts which relate only to the common law, equity, and bankruptcy jurisdiction of the county courts. The Acts of 1868 and 1869 are not mentioned. There are strong reasons for holding that the Act of 1888 was not intended to affect proceedings under the Acts of 1868 and 1869, but the judges of this court and of the Court of Appeal have held that some of the sections of the Act of 1888 have by the generality of these terms affected the Acts of 1868 and 1869. In The Hero, in this division, it was held that section 74 of the Act of 1888 extended the provisions of the Act of 1868 as to the mode of commencing proceedings. In The Eden the same court held that section 120 of the Act of 1888 gave a right of appeal in an admiralty action upon a point of law, although the amount decreed was under fifty pounds. In The Delano the Court of Appeal approved of and followed the decision in The Eden, and held also that in respect of a question of fact the special provisions of the Act of 1868 are left unaffected.

These decisions are binding on this court, but they do not decide the present question. They show, however, what difficulties have been produced in the admiralty procedure under the Acts of 1868 and 1869 by the Act of 1888, and it seems to me very desirable that these difficulties should be dealt with by fresh legislation. I do not feel that I am bound by these decisions to hold that section 101 of the Act of 1888 entitles the parties to trial by jury in causes of necessaries and wages under the Act of 1868. As soon as the conclusion is reached that according to the Act of 1868 all the causes mentioned in it are to be tried by a judge alone except in the three cases where he must have assessors if required, it seems to me to follow that the actions referred to in section 101 of the Act of 1888 do not include admiralty actions, because if they do then in my opinion they would make a trial by jury compulsory at the request of either party in salvage, towage, and collision causes, as well as in other causes which the case of The Tynwald shows cannot have been intended. In my opinion the application of the word "actions" in the 101st section of the Act of 1888 to admiralty causes is repugnant to the subject or context, and according to the usual rules of construction it would be erroneous to hold that the special provisions of the Act of 1868 for the trial of admiralty causes by a judge alone or by a judge assisted by assessors are to be repealed by a general Act with which the Act of 1868 is to be read containing provisions for the trial of actions by a judge and jury. So far I have dealt with the Act of 1868, but the Act of 1869, under section 2, sub-section 1, of which the claim and counter-claim in this case are made, is to be read and interpreted as one with the Act of 1868, and the observations I have made upon the Act of 1868 apply, in my judgment, with equal force to the Act of 1869. The sub-section gives to the county court a somewhat wider jurisdiction in respect of the subject matter than was possessed by the Admiralty Court and the claims mentioned in it are of a common law character, but similar considerations to those pointed out above in dealing with the Act of 1868 apply. In conferring jurisdiction by section 6 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, on the High Court of Admiralty over certain claims for damage to imported cargo no right to have a trial by jury was given by the Legislature, and there seems no reason to think that it was intended that such a right should remain in respect of the maritime causes mentioned in section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1869. The county court having admiralty jurisdiction is to have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine these causes. The liability to transfer to and trial in the High Court without a jury, and the mode of appeal are the same as for cases under the Act of 1868. And section 5 of the Act of 1869, giving power to the judge to have two mercantile assessors, is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the notion of a right existing to trial by jury of cases arising under the Acts of 1868 and 1869. Lastly, some of the County Court Rules specially applicable to admiralty actions are inconsistent with the trial of such actions taking place before a jury. For instance, ord. 39B, r. 65, empowers the judge in all actions to order a reference to the registrar or to the registrar and assessors as to the amount for which judgment should be given, and then appoint that tribunal to discharge one of the functions of a jury—namely, the assessment of damages. This is in accordance with the ordinary practice of the High Court in admiralty actions.

No appeal having been brought against this decision the action was heard by the judge of the court below sitting alone, and a decree pronounced by him in favour of the plaintiff's claim for the balance of freight, £5 14s. 4d. proceeded for, and dismissed a counter-claim by the defendant, claiming damages on the ground that the arrest of the cargo had been unjustifiable on the facts.

July 8.—An appeal brought by the defendants against the above decision of the county court judge on the merits was heard before a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division—[The President and Barnes, J.]—and the decision appealed from was affirmed.

[No question appears to have been raised either in this court or in the court below whether, in an action for balance of freight under the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869, the action could legally be brought against the cargo in respect of which the balance of freight was claimed.]

LOLE AND ANOTHER v. BETTERIDGE.
MALLAM (CLAIMANT). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Protected transaction—Execution—Sheriff to hold goods for fourteen days—Notice of bankruptcy petition—Hours for service—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11, sub-section 2—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 90.

By section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, the sheriff is to retain the proceeds of an execution for fourteen days, and if within that time notice is served on him of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against or by the debtor, and a receiving order is made thereon, he is to pay the money to the official receiver. By rule 90 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, service of notice is to be effected before six in the afternoon, except on Saturday, when it is to be effected before two in the afternoon; and service effected after those hours shall, for the purpose of computing any period of time subsequent to such service, be deemed to have been effected on the following day, or, in the case of Saturday, on the following Monday.

Notice of a bankruptcy petition, and a receiving order made thereon against the debtor, was served upon the sheriff, who was holding the proceeds of an execution, after the hour named in rule 90, on the fourteenth day.

Held, that the notice was served in time, as rule 90 did not apply to such a notice, but only to service of notices of procedure in the bankruptcy; and, further, that, even if the rule did apply, it did not invalidate the service upon that day, but merely postponed the date for computing the time within which the next step in the proceedings was to be taken.

Appeal from an order of Day, J., at chambers.

The sheriff having levied execution upon the goods of the defendant in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding £20 recovered by the plaintiffs against the defendant, the latter, on the 18th of September, 1897, paid the sheriff the amount of the judgment debt and costs. Upon Saturday, the 2nd of October, the defendant presented his own petition in bankruptcy, and a receiving order was made against him on the same day. On the afternoon of that day the official receiver gave notice to the sheriff by telegram of the bankruptcy petition and receiving order and claimed the moneys in his hands. This telegram was received by the sheriff at 3.40 on the afternoon of that day. The execution creditors contended that the moneys ought to be paid over to them upon the ground that, as the notice of the bankruptcy petition was not served until after two in the afternoon of the 2nd of October, the notice was, by rule 90 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, too late, and the fourteen days during which the sheriff was required by section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, to hold the moneys, had expired.*

Day, J., upon an interpleader summons, held that the notice, having been served after 2 p.m., must be deemed to have been served on the following Monday, and ordered the sheriff to pay over the money to the execution creditors.

The claimant appealed.

H. Reed, Q.C., and H. J. Turrell, for the claimant.—It is admitted by both parties that the fourteen days did not begin to run until the 19th of September: section 141 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The fourteen days therefore did not expire until midnight

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* By section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, "Where, under an execution in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding £20, the goods of a debtor are sold or money is paid in order to avoid sale, the sheriff shall deduct his costs of the execution from the proceeds of sale or the money paid, and retain the balance for fourteen days, and if within that time notice is served on him of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against or by the debtor, and a receiving order is made against the debtor thereon or on any other petition of which the sheriff has notice, the sheriff shall pay the balance to the official receiver."

By rule 90 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, "Service of notices, orders, or other proceedings shall be effected before the hour of six in the afternoon, except on Saturdays, when it shall be effected before the hour of two in the afternoon. Service effected after six in the afternoon on any week day, except Saturday, shall, for the purpose of computing any period of time subsequent to such service, be deemed to have been effected on the following day. Service effected after two in the afternoon on Saturday shall for the like purpose be deemed to have been effected on the following Monday."

of the 2nd of October, and the notice was given in time. Rule 90 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, upon which the execution creditors rely, does not apply. That rule comes under a group of rules headed "Service and Execution of Process," and simply deals with the service of process in bankruptcy proceedings—that is, notices in respect to court matters: Curtis v. Wainbrook Iron Co., Cab. & Ell. N. P. Rep. 351. In computing time the days mentioned in the Bankruptcy Act mean whole days: In re North, Ex parte Hasluck, [1895] 2 Q. B. 264, 43 W. R. Dig. 10; In re Maud, Ex parte Townend, 40 W. R. 47, 8 Morrell Bank. Rep. 144; In re Cripps, Ex parte Ross, 36 W. R. 845, 21 Q. B. D. 472. A notice by telegram is sufficient, as in the case of notice of an injunction. If the learned judge's decision is right, the sheriff might have paid away the money at any time after two o'clock on the 2nd of October, as no valid notice of a bankruptcy petition could have been served after that hour.

Muir Mackenzie, for the execution creditors.—Section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, speaks of a notice being "served." This is different from the expression "having notice," an expression which is used in section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and also in the latter of section 11, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1890. The two expressions are distinguished throughout the Bankruptcy Acts: see section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Act of 1883, where the word "served" is used. This latter expression signifies more than merely having knowledge; they imply a more formal act. Service of notices is dealt with in rule 90, which prescribes the hours within which notices must be served. This notice, having been served after two on Saturday afternoon, must be deemed to have been served on the following Monday, when the fourteen days had expired.

He referred to Bellyse v. M'Ginn, [1891] 2 Q. B. 227, 39 W. R. Dig. 24.

R. W. Coventry, for the sheriff.

A. L. Smith, L.J.—The question, as it seems to me, in this case is whether the fourteen days during which the sheriff is required by section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, to hold the proceeds of an execution, are cut down by rule 90. In this case the fourteen days did not, in fact, terminate till midnight of the 2nd of October. The official receiver claimed the money in the hands of the sheriff on that day, having served upon him notice of the bankruptcy petition. The execution creditor contended that the service of the notice was too late, as the 2nd of October was a Saturday, and the notice ought to have been served before 2 p.m. on that day. That depends upon whether rule 90 applies to this case. In my opinion it applies to notices of procedure and not to notices such as this. This part of the rule is headed "Service and Execution of Process." Rule 89 obviously applies to notices relating to procedure and to nothing else. So also do rules 90 and 91. They all deal with notices of procedure. Therefore I do not think that rule 90 applies to such notices as this, and I agree with the decision of Grove, J., in Curtis v. Wainbrook Iron Co., a case which, no doubt, has been acted upon by sheriffs ever since it was decided. If, however, I am wrong upon this point, there is another ground upon which my judgment can be put—namely, that there is nothing in rule 90 which says that a notice is bad as a notice upon that day if it is not served until after 6 p.m. or 2 p.m., as the case may be. The rule merely says that for the purpose of computing the time within which the other party must take the next step in the proceedings the following day or the following Monday is to be the day from which the time runs. The appeal must therefore be allowed, and the sheriff must be ordered to pay the money to the official receiver.

Rigby, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Rules 89 to 93 are headed, "Service and Execution of Process." They are concerned only with those notices which are to be acted upon in the bankruptcy itself—that is, they are only applicable to something to be done in the bankruptcy. They have no application to a notice to the sheriff that a bankruptcy petition has been presented against the debtor. It is said that when section 11, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, speaks of a notice being "served" on the sheriff, that brings in rule 90. But the sheriff is bound under that section to hold the proceeds of the execution for fourteen days, and he cannot justify paying away the money until the entire fourteen days have passed. I do not think that the word "served" makes rule 90 applicable. Fourteen days means fourteen times twenty-four hours. We cannot depart from that. The rule, in my opinion, has no application to this case at all, and even if it had any application it does not invalidate a notice served after a certain hour as a notice upon that day merely because it treats the service of the notice as postponed for the sole purpose of computing the time within which the other party is to take some subsequent step in the proceedings.

Collins, L.J., concurred.

Diederichsen v. Farquharson. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Incorporation of conditions in charter-party into bill of lading—"Freight and all other conditions as per charter-party."

Goods were shipped under a charter-party and bill of lading. The charter-party provided that the ship was to load and deliver a cargo, including a deck cargo "at merchant's risk." Under the bill of lading the goods were to be delivered in good order and condition, "freight and all other conditions as per charter-party." On the voyage the deck cargo was damaged without negligence on the part of the shipowner.

Held, by A. L. Smith and Collins, L.JJ., affirming the Divisional Court (Rigby, L.J., dissenting), that the condition in the charter-party as to the carriage of the deck cargo at merchant's risk was not incorporated in the bill of lading, and that the shipowner was liable to the indorsees of the bill of lading for the damage to the deck cargo.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) reversing the judgment of the Common Serjeant, sitting at the Mayor's Court, London.

---

(a.) Reported by F. O. Robinson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff was the owner of the ship Thea, and the defendants were the indorsees of a bill of lading for timber shipped upon the vessel at a port in Sweden for London. The ship was under charter, and by the charter-party the ship was to load a full and complete cargo of battens, including a deck cargo "at merchant's risk," "and . . . proceed to London . . . and deliver the same." That part of the timber which was carried on deck was shipped under bills of lading which stated that the goods were "shipped in good order and well conditioned . . . and to be delivered in like good order and condition. Freight and all other conditions as per charter-party."

The action was brought to recover freight. The claim was admitted subject to the defendant's counter-claim for damage to the goods. The jury found that the goods were damaged while on the voyage to the extent of £10; that the damage was not caused by the negligence of the plaintiff or his servants; that their ship was seaworthy when she sailed; that the damage was not caused by unseaworthiness. The Common Serjeant held that the words in the charter-party, "at merchant's risk," were incorporated in the bill of lading, and gave judgment for the plaintiff upon the claim and counter-claim. The Divisional Court held the words were not incorporated in the bill of lading, and entered judgment for the defendants on the counter-claim.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and E. Bray, for the plaintiff.—The effect of the words in the bill of lading "all other conditions as per charter-party" is to incorporate into the bill of lading all those conditions in the charter-party which are not inconsistent with, and are applicable to, the bill of lading. The condition that the deck cargo should be carried "at merchant's risk" is such a condition. It is true that where the words have been "paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," it has been held that the conditions to be incorporated must be limited to those which are to be performed by the receiver of the goods. The word "paying" is not used in this bill of lading, and therefore these cases are not in point, and there is no reason why these general words should be cut down in the manner contended for by the defendants.

J. A. Hamilton, for the defendants.—No distinction can be drawn from the fact that the word "freight" is not preceded by the word "paying." The term in the charter-party as to the carriage of the cargo at merchant's risk is not a condition and is inconsistent with the bill of lading. The contract in the bill of lading is an absolute contract to carry, and, in the absence of evidence as to custom, it is an implied term of such a contract that the cargo shall not be carried on deck.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the arguments: Porteus v. Watney, 27 W. R. 30, 3 Q. B. D. 534; Gullischen v. Stewart Brothers, 32 W. R. 763, 13 Q. B. D. 317; Gardner v. Trechmann, 15 Q. B. D. 154, 33 W. R. Dig. 190; Hamilton v. Mackie, 5 Times L. R. 677; Russell v. Niemann, 13 W. R. 93, 17 C. B. N. S. 163; Gray v. Carr, 19 W. B. 539; Royal Exchange Shipping Co. v. Dixon, 35 W. R. 461, 12 App. Cas. 11.

Nov. 22.—A. L. SMITH, L.J.—We are called upon in this case, as it appears to me, to consider the at one time much-debated question as to how much of a charter-party is incorporated into a bill of lading which contains the words, "he or they paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party." The point arises thus: The plaintiff, the shipowner, sues the defendant, who is the receiver of cargo under a bill of lading, for freight. The defendant counter-claims for damage to cargo during the voyage, the cargo having been carried on deck, whereby it became damaged, and not delivered in like good order and condition as when shipped. The plaintiff, the shipowner, replies to this claim of the bill of lading holder that by the charter-party he was at liberty to carry a deck cargo at merchant's risk, that this term was incorporated into the bill of lading, and thus he is not liable to the defendant for the damage counter-claimed for. The question in this case, therefore, is whether this term of the charter-party as to the "deck cargo being carried at merchant's risk" is incorporated into the bill of lading by the words "freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," for if not, the plaintiff, the shipowner, is liable under the counter-claim to the defendant. The bill of lading in question was given for a portion of timber cargo to be carried from Norway to London, the material parts of which are as follows: "Shipped in good order and condition. Redwood . . . specifying it to be delivered in like good order and condition at the Port of London unto orders. Freight and all other conditions as per charter-party." Now there is a body of authority which has proved conclusively that the words in a bill of lading, "they pay freight for the goods and all other conditions as per charter-party," do not incorporate all the conditions of the charter-party, but only those conditions "which would apply to the person who has taken the bill of lading, and is taking delivery of the cargo, such, for instance, as payment for demurrage the payment of freight," "the manner of paying and so on." These are not my words, but the words of Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords in Taylor v. Perrin, not reported, but quoted by Lopes, L.J., in Serraino v. Campbell, [1891] 1 Q. B., at p. 294. It would be mere waste of time to go through all the cases upon this question, especially as this was done by Kay, L.J., in this court in the year 1890 in the case of Serraino v. Campbell, p. 283, and I will just take three cases to show what has been held to be incorporated in a bill of lading containing the words, "They are paying freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," and what is the rule of construction to be applied thereto.

Thirty-three years ago in the case of Russell v. Niemann, Willes, J., after consideration, gave the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas upon this point as follows: "We now proceed to dispose of the second point, which is whether the exception contained in the bill of lading is expanded by the exception in the charter-party. That depends upon whether the words 'and other conditions as per charter-party' include all the stipulations and conditions contained in that instrument, or whether they are not limited to conditions ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned—viz., payment of freight, conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. It is a mere question of language and construction, and we think it is enough to say that the latter is the construction we put upon these words." This case has never been overruled, but, on the contrary, this court in Serraino v. Campbell pointed out that it was expressly approved of by the House of Lords. In Serraino v. Campbell Lord Esher laid down the rule of construction which was to be applied thus: "After full consideration I think that the words ought to be construed as meaning all those conditions of the charter-party which are to be performed by the consignee of the goods." Lopes, L.J., cited Lord Blackburn's words, which I have above referred to; and Kay, L.J., reviewed all the authorities in order of date, and arrived in the end at the same result as Lord Esher and Lopes, L.J. Again, in the year 1895, in Manchester Trust v. Furness, Withy, & Co., [1895] 2 Q. B. 282, 43 W. R. Dig. 167, Mathew, J., treats this rule of construction as then well known and settled, as in truth it was, and in the same case upon appeal, 44 W. R. 178, [1895] 2 Q. B. 545, the present Master of the Rolls (Sir Nathaniel Lindley) said with reference to the words in a bill of lading, "they paying freight, and other conditions as per charter-party." "The effect of the reference has been considered more than once; it has been considered in Serraino v. Campbell and also in Fry v. Chartered Mercantile Bank, 14 W. R. 920, and the effect of the reference is to incorporate so much of the charter-party as relates to the payment of freight and other conditions to be performed on the delivery of the cargo. But there is no authority whatever for incorporating more than that."

If ever there was a rule of construction laid down and settled by overwhelming and conclusive authority—I mean from the House of Lords downwards to the court of first instance—it is this, and yet it is now insisted upon by the shipowner that when by his captain he signed the bill of lading in this case upon the 19th of August, 1896, containing the words, "Freight (in print), and all other conditions as per charter-party," the word "paying" being left out, he by so doing incorporated into the bill of lading conditions which otherwise would not have been incorporated, and which were well known would not be. With the contention that the word "freight" does not mean "paying freight" in the mercantile document I cannot agree, for in my judgment the words "freight" and "paying freight" therein mean the same thing, and had it not been for Rigby, L.J.'s, opinion to the contrary I should not have thought the first question open to argument. If we were to accede to the plaintiff's contention we should in my opinion be unsettling that which has long been settled, and upon the faith of which business has been transacted for years, and nothing could well be more mischievous than this. In my judgment the rule of construction above-mentioned applies to all bills of lading which seek to incorporate parts of a charter-party by the words "he or they paying freight" and all other conditions as per charter-party, "or freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," unless there is something therein clearly showing that the well-known rule is to be excluded. To point out that the contract of carriage contained in the bill of lading in the present case is absolute and without exception does not in my opinion avail the shipowners, for this does not, in my opinion, show that the rule is to be excluded, for it is a rule as applicable to a bill of lading containing no exception as to one containing exceptions. I rest my judgment in this case upon the grounds above stated, and I do not propose to discuss the question whether the term in the charter-party including a "deck cargo at merchant's risk" is or is not consistent with the bill of lading, which is silent as to a deck cargo, and only covers a cargo which is to be carried at shipowner's risk. I think that Day and Lawrance, JJ., were right in holding that the clause in the charter-party now sought to be incorporated by the shipowner was not incorporated into the bill of lading, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—After the best consideration which I have been able to give to this case I am unable to concur in the conclusion that the counter-claim of the defendants should succeed. The amount claimed is very small, but the principles of interpretation involved are of great importance. The evidence showed that the terms of the charter-party were usual in the trade in the sense of being frequently adopted, but did not show such an established usage as could be presumed to be the basis of every contract of the kind. The question, therefore, is one of construction only, and the issues appear to be reducible substantially to two. First, whether the words "freight and all other conditions as per charter-party" contained in the bill of lading are to be so construed as to extend only to conditions to be performed by the holder of the bill of lading, in which case none of the terms of the charter-party relieving the shipowner from responsibility would be introduced. Secondly, whether the clause relied upon as a defence to the counter-claim ought not to be treated as incorporated by the general words of reference on the grounds of its being repugnant to the other terms of the bill of lading. As to the first issue, I would observe that the argument depends, in my judgment, mainly, if not entirely, upon the decisions of which Serraino v. Campbell is a conspicuous and, I think, the latest direct example. I guard myself from the first by saying that I have not the slightest intention of laying down anything inconsistent with that class of cases. The decisions are binding upon the court, but I may be allowed to say that if they did not exist I should have had little difficulty in arriving at a similar conclusion in a similar case arising for the first time. The real question is what these cases in fact decided, and it is as important not to extend them so as to cover a case not really included as to preserve their authority with reference to cases really covered by them. I have gone through all those cases, and, without referring to them in detail, I will say at once that no one of them appears to me to go beyond what was laid down by Willes, J., in Russell v. Niemann. The reference to the charter-party in that case was contained in these words of the bill of lading, "paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." In the whole line of cases down to and including Serraino v. Campbell the words to be construed did not differ substantially from these. In each case there was the exact equivalent of the words "paying freight for the said goods," and the words "all other conditions" followed immediately afterwards. At p. 177 of the report of Russell v. Niemann Willes, J., says: "We disposed of the first question in this case yesterday, and we now proceed to dispose of the second, which is whether the exception contained in the bill of lading is expanded by the exception in the charter-party. That depends upon whether the words 'and other conditions as per charter-party' include all the stipulations and conditions contained in that or whether they are not limited to conditions ejusdem generis with that previously mentioned—viz., payment of freight conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. It is a mere question of language and construction, and we think it enough to say that the latter is the construction which we put upon these words." It is to be observed that the learned judge by construction puts in the words "to be performed," and I gather that if he had not felt himself entitled to do that he would have held that all the stipulations of the charter-party ought to be incorporated (see his statement, p. 172, of the point to be decided). In Serraino v. Campbell each of the learned judges, Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Kay, L.JJ., refer to the passage above quoted and treat it as the foundation of the decision in the later case. It is plain, to my mind, that following Russell v. Niemann the Court of Appeal, in Serraino v. Campbell, treated the matter as purely one of construction of the very words used and had no intention of laying down any general rule as to the meaning of the words "all other conditions as per charter" independently of the introductory words "they paying freight." I have looked through all the cases cited and I have not found one in which, independently of words of introduction equivalent to the words "paying freight," the words "all other conditions as per charter-party" have been cut down by construction to conditions to be performed by the bill of lading. In the absence of such words the Court of Appeal (Gardner v. Trechmann, 15 Q. B. D. 154) seem to me to have held that the words of reference "other conditions as per charter-party" when not controlled by the context are sufficient to introduce all the terms of the charter-party not repugnant to the contract contained in the bill of lading. What amounts to such repugnancy as to lead to the rejection of any term, and in what cases such a result follows will be dealt with in discussing the second question. Meantime the effect of the word "freight" preceding the words "and all other conditions" has to be considered. If the word conveys a meaning equivalent to "paying freight" the case is brought within the principle of Russell v. Niemann, because then it expressly refers to one condition to be performed by the bill of lading holder. But, in the first place, the forced character of the construction suggested seems to me to result from a comparison of the reasoning in the class of cases so often referred to and the present. The insertion in the former of the word "performing" so as to make the whole phrase run "paying the freight and performing all other conditions" is natural and perhaps even inevitable (see per Lord Bramwell in Gray v. Carr, 19 W. R. 1173, L. R. 6 Q. B. 522). Its insertion in the present case making the phrase run "freight and performing all the other conditions" is at once seen to be putting a strain upon the original words which, in my judgment, they will not bear. You cannot, in fact, bring in "performing" without first getting in "paying" or something of the sort.

Now, "freight as per charter-party" means in its obvious and primâ facie sense freight as fixed and ascertained by the charter-party and nothing else. The phrase no more carries as part of the meaning of the language the idea of payment than it would do if the rate followed the word in the bill of lading itself, without having to be imported from the charter-party. In each case the fixing of the rate would indeed involve as a consequence, arising by implication of law, the obligation to pay at that rate; but on the question of construction it is necessary to distinguish clearly between the interpretation of the language used and the consequences arising in law from using it; and the language used ought not, in my judgment, to be altered so as to put in an express condition when it is only implied. On the whole I am of opinion that the authorities relied upon are not applicable, that the reference cannot be cut down to mean only conditions to be performed by the holder of the bill of lading.

The second question remains whether the term a deck cargo to be taken at merchant's risk is to be rejected as repugnant to the bill of lading, and this must be decided in accordance with the general principles of interpretation applicable, not to bills of lading only, but to all contracts, and, indeed, to all written instruments.

It is plain that a clause incorporating by general words only terms of another contract will not incorporate any terms of the latter which are outside the scope and nature of the first.

The bill of lading is a contract for carriage, and in so far as the charter-party may contain terms not applicable to such a contract they will not be treated as incorporated. But no such question arises here. The special term proposed to be introduced has direct reference to the carriage of the goods. The first and most general rule of construction is that the document under consideration is to be construed according to the plain meaning of the words used. This is subject to certain ancillary rules not having the force of law, but intended to serve in proper cases as guides to the true interpretation. The only one of these applicable to the present case, if it is applicable, may, I think, be thus formulated: If the literal construction leads to an absurdity, repugnancy, or inconsistency which reasonable people cannot be supposed to have contemplated under the circumstances, it ought if possible to be modified so as to avoid such a result.

On the question of inconsistency I doubt whether the rule ought ever to be applied except where the inconsistency arises between a term of the contract appearing on the face of it to be the result of a special bargain between the part and the inconsistent term proposed to be introduced is imported by general words—such a case as that of Gardner v. Trechmann already referred to. It was impossible there to explain why the parties specified a particular rate of freight in the bill of lading if they really meant the higher rate mentioned in the charter-party to rule. The bill of lading freight was therefore treated as governing. If this be the correct view the rule referred to would be only a way of asserting the maxim, Generalia specialibus non derogant, and would have no application to the present case. The words of the bill of lading "to be delivered in like good order and condition" bear no sign of a special agreement. They are, in fact, in such a document the most ordinary and general words, and in almost every case their effect is cut down and controlled by the subsequent language of the document. True it is if they were uncontrolled they would involve an absolute contract on the part of the shipowner to deliver which would be broken even if the goods were lost by ordinary sea risks without negligence of any kind. Such a contract is not an impossible one, though it taxed the ingenuity of counsel to indicate cases in which it would practically arise independently of a special bargain at a rate of freight higher than the ruling rate. Here the rate of freight, when originally fixed, was fixed with reference not to an absolute contract on the part of the shipowner, but to a limited one; and it would be a remarkable result if the bargain in the bill of lading were held to entitle the shipowner only to the same freight as if consideration for a much more onerous obligation. But I do not think it legitimate to treat the words quoted from the bill of lading as standing alone and unexplained. They are subject to the words which follow, and ought to be construed as so subject, and not as containing the whole contract. Whether I am right or not in giving to the ancillary rule of construction the limitation which I have suggested, it seems to me that this case can be decided on a much broader ground before we have recourse to the ancillary rule at all. We should be satisfied that the literal interpretation involves something unreasonable, and the question arises whether it is not reason- to suppose that the parties to the contract intended to cut down the earlier words.

The case stands thus: In nearly every bill of lading and in nearly every charter-party there are provisions cutting down and limiting the absolute obligation of the shipowner to deliver. Is it more reasonable to suppose that the parties intended the contract to be interpreted literally, and so to incorporate the terms of the charter-party or not? In the first alternative they would be entering into a common and ordinary contract, and the shipowner would be getting in freight a consideration commensurate with a limited obligation. In the second they would be entering into a contract of so exceptional a nature that it is difficult to understand how any shipowner should submit to it or any shipper of goods insist upon it.

In my judgment the literal interpretation of the contract in this case is the most reasonable and therefore the correct one, and no occasion arises for resort to the ancillary rule of construction founded on repugnancy or inconsistency.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment in the court below is right, and ought to be affirmed.

It is not necessary to recapitulate the facts which have been already stated in the judgments delivered. The short question is: Is the indorsee of this bill of lading, being for a portion only of a cargo shipped on the plaintiff's vessel, bound by a provision in the charter-party that deck cargo is carried at merchant's risk? The bill of lading, which contains no exceptions, is on its face an acknowledgment that the goods in question are shipped in good order and condition, with an undertaking to deliver them in like good order and condition at the port of London. Then follow the words which give rise to the question in discussion, "freight," which is in point, and written after it, "and all other conditions as per charter-party dated the 1st of August, 1896."

The obligation of the shipowner therefore on this bill of lading is absolute, and certainly does not protect him from liability for damage to deck cargo unless he can find such protection by reason of its incorporation from the charter-party.

I am of opinion that the words which I have cited are not capable of the meaning sought to be put upon them by the shipowner. They are words whose meaning has repeatedly been considered in decided cases, and the view stated by Willes, J., in Russell v. Niemann as long ago as 1864—viz., "they are limited to conditions ejusdem generis with that previously mentioned—namely, payment of freight, conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods," and again in substantially the same terms by Lord Blackburn, and finally by Lord Esher in 1891 in Serraino v. Campbell, must be taken as establishing the principle upon which these words are to be interpreted.

The rule is thus stated by Lord Esher in the last case: "After full consideration I think that the words ought to be construed as meaning all those conditions of the charter-party which are to be performed by the consignee. If this be so, then the perils of the sea are not conditions which are to be performed by the consignee. Indeed, they are not conditions which have to be performed by anyone." The ground on which this rule rests is that, inasmuch as freight has to be paid by the consignee as a condition of receiving the cargo, the words "other conditions" are to be read in their natural meaning, and, following upon the word "freight," must be taken to import conditions to be performed by the consignee in relation to the receiving by him of the cargo.

I think it can make no possible difference to this construction that the words "payment of," before "freight," are omitted. "Freight," in my judgment, is obviously equivalent to "payment of freight," or "he or they paying freight," otherwise it could not be described as a condition so as to justify the words "other conditions," which follow it, and the canon of construction above stated is therefore applicable to this bill of lading, and excludes all terms of the charter-party which cannot be brought under the category of conditions to be performed by the consignee.

It has been urged that the absence of exceptions in the bill of lading is a reason for giving a larger interpretation to the words "all other conditions as per charter-party." In my judgment this fact can make no difference, the basis of the rule being what I have stated.

Exceptions, whether they are few or many, or wanting altogether, in the bill of lading, are not thereby turned into conditions to be performed by the consignee; they are merely terms of the bargain between the shipowner and the charterer. To hold otherwise would be to disturb a rule which, having regard to the length of time it has been established, must have been the basis upon which mercantile men have acted in numberless instances in framing their mercantile documents. Further, even if the word "conditions" could be interpreted in this larger sense, another question would arise. The bill of lading might have comprised only that part of the cargo which was in fact carried upon deck, and its absolute words import a contract to carry under deck, for there was no proof here of any custom to control them: Royal Exchange Shipping Co. v. Dixon, 35 W. R. 461, 12 App. Cas. 11; Gould v. Oliver, 2 Man. & G. 208. If, therefore, this provision from the charter-party were to be read into it, there would be at one and the same time in the bill of lading an absolute contract to carry under deck and at the risk of the shipowner all the goods comprised therein, and an imported provision that they might nevertheless be carried on deck and at the risk of the consignee.

Whether such an exception might not be so large as to eat up and destroy the express contract, and, therefore, to be incapable of being read into it (see instances of void exceptions, Com. Dig., "fact") it is not necessary to decide. I have not thought it necessary to go through all the cases bearing on its discussion, that process has been gone through several times already, and in Serraino v. Campbell, after a full review of all that had been decided up to that date the law was laid down by Lord Esher in the terms which I have stated. One reported case only, on the point, has arisen since then—viz., Manchester Trust v. Furness, Withy, & Co., and in that case the canon enunciated by Lord Esher in Serraino v. Campbell is again applied.

Copyright—Infringement—Action on the case—Action of detinue—Action of trover—Injunction—Delivery up and damages—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), ss. 15, 23.

In addition to the remedy of a special action on the case under section 15 of the Copyright Act, 1842, the registered proprietor of a copyright can also sue the offender in an action of detinue or an action of trover under section 23 of that Act, and he may join all these remedies in one action, which may be brought in the Chancery Division.

Action.

The plaintiff was the registered proprietor of the copyright in and author of a work called "A Wingless Angel." In 1886 the defendant, James Blackwood, a publisher, bought the stereotyped plates of the plaintiff's work at a public auction, the vendors being the original publishers of the work. The plaintiff had not published any copies of "A Wingless Angel" since 1875. In 1886, and again in 1896, the defendant, James Blackwood, published what were in fact reprints of the plaintiff's work, and it was not until the publication of the latter edition that the plaintiff became aware of the infringement of his copyright. Towards the end of the year 1896, the defendant, James Blackwood, transferred his business to the other defendants, a firm of publishers called J. Blackwood & Co. On the 24th of November, 1896, the plaintiff commenced an action in the Chancery Division for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling their copies of the work, an account, damages, and delivery up of the copies in their possession. The defendant, James Blackwood, thereupon offered to submit to an injunction and to pay a certain amount for damages and the plaintiff's costs, but this offer was refused by the plaintiff.

On the 18th of December the plaintiff made a demand in writing upon the defendants under section 23 of the Copyright Act, 1842, for all copies of the book unlawfully printed, and on the 23rd of December issued a writ in the Queen's Bench Division claiming damages for wrongful conversion and for unlawfully printing copies of the work without the plaintiff's written consent. This latter action was transferred to the Chancery Division and the two actions were then consolidated. The plaintiff delivered a statement of claim in the consolidated action claiming (1) an injunction restraining the defendants from infringing his copyright in the said work, and delivery up of all the plates and stereotype used by the defendants in and about the printing of the same; (2) delivery up of all copies of the infringing work in the defendant's possession; (3) an account of all profits, or alternatively, damages in respect of the said infringement and an inquiry as to the amount thereof; (4) £250 damages; and (5) costs.

Warrington, Q.C., and J. G. Joseph, for the plaintiff.—We rely upon section 23 of the Copyright Act, 1842, which provides remedies in cases of unlawfully printing books without the consent of the registered proprietor of the copyright. We ask for an injunction, damages for the tortious conversion of those sold, and delivery up of the books in the defendant's hands. Section 26 of the Act, which limited a time for the commencement of an action, has been repealed by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 2.

Renshaw, Q.C., and J. W. Baines, for the defendants.—We submit that section 23 is inconsistent with section 15, under which the remedy is a special action on the case, and that all these remedies cannot be pursued at once in respect of the same copy, they are not cumulative.

They referred to Pike v. Nicholas, 18 W. R. 321, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 251; Colburn v. Simms, 2 Hare 543; Delfe v. Delamotte, 3 K. & J. 581, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 19.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is strange that in the year 1897 I should be called upon for the first time to say what is the meaning of section 23 of the Copyright Act, 1842, and whether the remedy given by that section is inconsistent with the remedy given by section 15 of the same Act. There does not appear, however, to be any decision upon the question. Two points have been raised. The first is that as section 15 gives the proprietor a special action on the case, that is the remedy which he is intended to pursue, except so far as his remedies at law are not interfered with, and that, therefore, the 23rd section, which gives certain rights of action, must be construed as meaning something entirely different; that the offender under section 23 is a different person from the offender under section 15—in other words, that section 15 contemplates a person who has "unlawfully printed or imported," while section 23 contemplates a person who is the accidental possessor of an infringing book, so as to give a right of action against that accidental possessor independently of his being otherwise a wrongdoer. This certainly is a possible view, but the language of the two sections is not so clear as to compel me to adopt it.

There are, no doubt, in section 15 words which are not to be found in section 23, but I cannot suggest why those two sections should not have been put into one, or why they should be separated, and I do not say that because under the 15th section the plaintiff has a special action on the case, therefore he cannot sue under section 23. Then the second point is this: Under section 23 the "registered proprietor shall" in respect of pirated books "after demand thereof in writing be entitled to sue for and recover the same, or damages for the detention thereof, in an action of detinue from any party who shall detain the same, or to sue for and recover damages for the conversion thereof in an action of trover." That provides an alternative remedy. It was argued on behalf of the defendant that if the plaintiff sued under that section he must sue either in detinue or in trover, he could not sue in both. I do not think that is so; it would be an extremely narrow interpretation of the Act to hold that the proprietor of the copyright in a book, knowing that a man had a certain number of copies in his hands and that he had sold other copies, could not sue that person in detinue for the copies detained, and also in trover for the copies converted to his own use. This seems plain from the Act itself, and I do not see why the plaintiff should not have these two remedies and sue in detinue for those copies detained by the defendant and in trover in respect of the copies sold by him and converted to his own use. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff has these two remedies under section 23, in addition to a special action on the case under section 15, and I think he may be said to have been exercising his right to an action on the case in bringing these proceedings in the Chancery Division. The plaintiff is, in my opinion, entitled to an injunction, delivery up of all copies in the defendants' possession as in an action of detinue, and damages for the copies sold as in an action of trover.

URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL OF HANDSWORTH v. DERRINGTON AND BOTTELEY. (a.)

Local government — Drain — "Sewer" — New street — Street taken over by local authority — "Frontager" — Drains constructed by "frontager" — Liability for expense of sewering street — Omission to serve notice "to sewer" on one frontager — Condition precedent — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 13, 15, 18, 150, 257, 268.

Where a "street" was vested in the local authority, and there were drains — some of which drained more than one house — existing under the street and leading into public sewers in other streets, and the local authority had served the usual notices under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, on the owners of houses, as frontagers to the street, to sewer, &c., the street, but in so doing had omitted to serve one frontager with such notice; and the local authority, on non-compliance with the notice by the frontagers, had proceeded to do the work themselves, and their surveyor had, under the same section of the Act, apportioned the expense among the frontagers, and, the apportionment having been objected to, the parties had gone to arbitration thereon, and an award had duly been made apportioning the payments among the frontagers:

In an action by the local authority to recover the apportioned amounts from the frontagers, Held, (1) that the words "respective owners and occupiers" in section 150 mean "all and every one of" the owners and occupiers; that service of notice to sewer on all such owners or occupiers is a condition precedent to enforcing the Act, and consequently failure to serve notice on a single occupier is a failure to comply with the requirements of the section; but held, also (on the facts), that the frontagers should have raised the objection previously — e.g., before the arbitrators — and it was too late to take it now; (2) on the facts, that the road was not sewered to the satisfaction of the local authority, and that the authority, therefore, were not liable under section 15 for maintenance, alteration, &c., of the sewers; and, further, that a street could not be considered to be sewered when all that had been done was to lay a series of drains draining some of the houses on one side in one direction and the houses on the other side in another direction, these drains not forming parts of one system of sewering.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants Josiah Derrington and James Botteley, the leaseholder and mortgagee respectively of premises in Putney-road, Handsworth, for a declaration, under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, that the proper proportion of expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in executing works of street improvement in Putney-road, Handsworth, payable by the defendants as frontagers to the street, was a charge upon the premises in the street of which the defendants were respectively leaseholder and mortgagee, and that such proportion of the expenses might be raised by the sale of the premises and paid to the plaintiffs.

It appeared that Putney-road was originally laid out in 1875, and that the premises in question consisted of nine houses, of which the first defendant was leaseholder under a lease for ninety-nine years from the 31st of August, 1893.

On the 16th of February, 1894, the plaintiffs served him, along with the other frontagers, with the usual notice, under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to sewer, &c., the street. This notice was not complied with, and thereupon the plaintiffs did the work themselves, and their surveyor apportioned, under the same section, the defendants' share of the expense at £162 7s. 2d., and served notice for payment. This being objected to the parties went to arbitration, under the Act, on the apportionment.

And on the 9th of October, 1896, an award was made fixing the defendants' share at £158 11s. 8d. Notice to pay that sum was served by the plaintiffs on the 26th of October, 1896, and the sum not being paid the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action on the 3rd of February, 1897.

It appeared, and was admitted by the plaintiffs, that at the time the notices to "sewer, &c.," were served the various houses or groups of houses were served by drains draining more than one house and running in different directions into the public sewers laid in other streets, and it was also admitted that they had omitted to serve with a notice to sewer, &c., one of the frontagers, who consequently was not charged.

The main points raised by the defence were: First, that at the time the "notices to sewer" were served the street was already sewered; and that on the facts the local authority must be taken to have been "satisfied"; second, that the requirements of section 150 of the statute had not been complied with inasmuch as the local authority had omitted to serve notice to sewer on one of the frontagers; third, that the defendants were not liable for the expenses of sewering the road at the places where it was intersected by cross-roads and where, consequently, there could be no frontagers.

Section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides, sub-section 1, for the vesting of "sewers made by any person for his own profit," &c., in the local authority.

Section 15 provides that "every local authority shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act."

Section 18 provides for the enlargement, alteration, and discontinuance of sewers by the local authority.

Section 150 provides that "where any street within any urban district (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large), or the carriageway, footway, or any other part of such street, is not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, and made good, or is not lighted to the satisfaction of the urban authority, such authority may, by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts thereof as may require to be sewered," &c., "require them to sewer," &c., "the same within a time to be specified in such notice"; and the section further provides that "if such notice is not complied with, the urban authority may, if they think fit, execute the works," &c.; and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as is settled by the surveyor of the urban authority, or (in case of dispute) by arbitration in manner provided by this Act; or the urban authority may by order declare the expenses so incurred to be private improvement expenses.

Section 257 provides that "Where any local authority have incurred expenses for the repayment whereof the owners of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable under this Act, or by any agreement with the local authority, such expenses may be recovered, together with interest at a rate not exceeding five pounds per centum per annum, from the date of service of a demand for the same till payment thereof, from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred. In all summary proceedings by a local authority for the recovery of expenses incurred by them in works of private improvement, the time within which such proceedings may be taken shall be reckoned from the date of service of notice of demand."

The section also provides that "Where such expenses have been settled and apportioned by the surveyor of the local authority as payable by such owner, such apportionment shall be binding and conclusive on such owner, unless within three months from service of notice on him by the local authority or their surveyor of the amount settled by the surveyor to be due from such owner, he shall, by written notice, dispute the same."

Section 268 provides that "Where any person deems himself aggrieved by the decision of the local authority in any case in which the local authority are empowered to recover in a summary manner any expenses incurred by them, or to declare such expenses to be private improvement expenses, he may, within twenty-one days after notice of such decision, address a memorial to the Local Government Board, stating the grounds of his complaint, and shall deliver a copy thereof to the local authority; the Local Government Board may make such order in the matter as to the said board may seem equitable, and the order so made shall be binding and conclusive on all parties.

Warrington, Q.C., and Hugo Young, for the plaintiffs.—The local authority can bring an action under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, notwithstanding the fact that there are already private sewers under the road. Putney-road was not, at the time of the issue of the notices, sewered as a whole, and even assuming that it was then sewered as a whole, it was not sewered to the satisfaction of the local authority: Handsworth Local Board v. Taylor, 69 L. T. Rep. 798. Our next point is that though it is true we omitted to serve a notice on one of the frontagers, the objection on that ground should have been taken before the arbitrator, and it is too late for the defendants to raise it now. Moreover, the defendants were not in fact injured by our omission inasmuch as they were not required to pay more on that account. And in the third place we say that objection as to expenses being increased by not taking into account the width of the cross-roads, should also have been taken within twenty-one days of notice to pay under section 268 of the Public Health Act, 1875: Sandgate Local Board v. Keene, [1892] 1 Q. B. 831, 40 W. R. Dig. 131; Cook v. Ipswich Local Board, 19 W. R. 1079, L. R. 6 Q. B. 451; Ex parte Wake, 11 Q. B. D. 291, 31 W. R. Dig. 99; Wake v. Mayor, &c., of Sheffield, 12 Q. B. D. 142, 32 W. R. Dig. 123; Walthamstow Local Board v. Staines, [1891] 2 Ch. 606, 40 W. R. Dig. 131.

Renshaw, Q.C., and C. F. Vachell, for the defendants.—The sewers drain more than one house, and are not made for profit. Consequently they are vested in the local authority under sections 13, 15, and 18 of the Act of 1875, and the authority are compelled to maintain or alter them at their own expense under sections 15 and 18: Fulham District Board v. Goodwin, 1 Ex. D. 400, 25 W. R. Dig. 156; Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board, 35 W. R. 578, 36 ib. 50, 18 Q. B. D. 577, 20 ib. 63; Ferrand v. Hallas Land and Building Co., 41 W. R. 580, [1893] 2 Q. B. 135; and Travis v. Utley, 42 W. R. 461, [1894] 1 Q. B. 233. As to the non-service of notice on one of the frontagers, service on all the frontagers is made a condition precedent by section 150 of the Act. Service on the "respective owners," &c., means service on each and every one of them. The plaintiffs have therefore failed to comply with the requirements of the Act. Then as to the expenses being increased by the cross-roads of which the plaintiffs themselves must be taken to be the frontagers: Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co., 23 W. R. 634, L. R. 10 Q. B. 203.

KEKEWICH, J.—The main, and, as it seems to me, the only, question of substance to be decided is whether, when the local authority issued the notices under which the Putney-road was sewered, and that work was done, that road (Putney-road) must be regarded, or must not be regarded, as having been sewered to the satisfaction of the urban authority within the meaning of the 150th section of the Act. That they were not satisfied is perfectly clear. We have a report made to them by those to whom they entrusted the duty of inspecting and reporting, and we have the report adopted by the authority. We have the minute to that effect put in evidence, and there can be no question about it, they were not satisfied as a matter of fact. But the point made against them is that it is of no avail for them to say they were not satisfied as a matter of fact, because, as a matter of law, they were satisfied; that is to say, they must be taken to have been satisfied, notwithstanding that they were not satisfied. There is no question, of course, of fraud or of any impropriety at all. It all depends upon the proper construction of the Act and the application of the authorities which have been decided on the different sections. I will take it that this street was vested in the local board, and that therefore Mr. Renshaw's argument proceeds on a right basis. I will take it that there were sewers under the street for the drainage of particular houses and sets of houses; but it does not seem to follow that the street was sewered. What I apprehend is meant by a street being sewered is that it is sewered as a street—as a certain space devoted to traffic with an interval between the houses, and as comprising, of course, the houses on either side. I think it would be wrong to say that a street is sewered when all that you have is a series of sewers draining some of the houses on one side in one direction and the houses on the other side in another direction not forming parts of one system.

That seems to me necessary when you remember that a street, in the sense in which I have mentioned it (which I apprehend to be the proper meaning of a street), is not a thing which comes into existence all at once. It grows, and though it may be complete as a street, as an entity at one particular time, yet it is altered, modified, and enlarged by the addition of new houses.

Therefore, if it were left to me, if it were a matter for me, to say whether the street was properly sewered or not, on the evidence I should say it was not. Though I have thought it well to say so much, that is not the question. The question is whether it was sewered to the satisfaction of the local authority. According to the authorities, and I have two under my eyes which have been quoted, that of the Fulham Board v. Goodwin, and Bonella v. Twickenham Board of Health, the local authority must make up its mind once for all whether a street is sufficiently sewered or not, and it must do that within a reasonable time. Perhaps it is not quite accurate to say that the local board must make up its mind; but when once it has determined that a street is sufficiently sewered, then from that time forward the powers under discussion in this case come to an end. They must then repair those sewers, keep them in order, and maintain them at their own expense—that is to say, out of their general funds. They can no longer cast the burden on the frontagers, and, more than that, if they have been in possession of the street for a reasonable time, and have done nothing, it must be taken, according to the law as laid down by Lord Esher in Bonella v. Twickenham Board of Health, that they have determined that it is sufficiently sewered, even though, as a matter of fact, they have never come to any such determination at all. That, if I may venture to say so, seems to be common sense, and to be a fair application of the rules of life to such matters. What was done here? From time to time, no doubt, these gentlemen who had built houses fronting towards Putney-road, or who had purchased houses built by others, were anxious to know what they were to do as regards drainage, and they were told from time to time by the representative of the local authority what was necessary for them to do, how they could get rid of their drainage; and is is quite possible that the representative of the local authority may have assured them, and with perfect honesty and propriety, that if they drained in that way they would never be troubled again.

But of course he had no authority to make such a representation on behalf of the local authority, and they must have accepted that for what it was worth. There was no statement even by him, still less by the local authority, that the road was sufficiently sewered —that they were content with the sewering of the road. Far from it, the very application which they made, the very advice that was given them, the very things which they did, all pointed to there being no sewer. It was to be independent sewering for the particular purposes of particular houses. There was no sewering of the street as a whole. It seems to me therefore that, remembering that this street was in the meantime growing—no doubt it had been in existence for some years—the local authority had not exhausted the time allowed them (for it must be an elastic one), to be judged according to the circumstances, for determination whether the street was sufficiently sewered. As I have already mentioned, they certainly never came to it in fact. On the contrary, when first the matter is brought before them, they are clearly of opinion that it is not sufficiently sewered, and they take proceedings on that footing. It seems to me that they were strictly right, and that they acted within the provisions of statute.

Then there is another point which deserves consideration in itself, because much has been said about it. The 150th section of the Act provides that "when the local authority are satisfied that a road has not been sufficiently sewered, they may by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises adjoining, fronting, or abutting on such part thereof as may be required to be sewered," &c. —that is a condition precedent. I can see no possible answer to that argument—it seems to me plain on the language of the Act. The result is that to begin with I agree with Mr. Vachell's argument that respective owners and occupiers must mean all and every one of them. If they did not do that—i.e., serve the notice on every one of the frontagers—they have no basis to start upon. There is a technical objection to their proceeding from the first, a purely technical objection, though, of course, having substance behind it, because the object is that all should determine whether the work should be done; and more than that, if the work is not done by the owners and occupiers, then the local authority shall do the work and recover the proper proportion from all—that is to say, recover from each his proper proportion, and not throw on any one a part of that which ought to be thrown on the others or any of them. The matter, no doubt, from that point of view is one of some importance. They are bound to do that, and it seems to me that they will equally fail to discharge their duty—that is to say, will equally fail to make a basis for further proceedings, if they omit one owner or half-a-dozen or 50 or 75 per cent. In either case they omit to do that which they are bound to do. It is an objection to their proceedings—if I may go back to olden times—"a plea in bar," which might have been raised, I have no doubt, by the defendant. But is he at liberty to raise it now? He has gone forward. I say nothing about the 268th section because I am not sure that an appeal could have been raised under that, though if it could I think that the possibility of such an appeal would be an objection now. But, apart from that, he has thought fit, or has been advised to challenge the charge made by the local authority. That is to say, he has thought fit to challenge the amount which they seek to charge upon him. Now, the amount to be charged upon him is necessarily an apportioned amount—that is to say, in proportion to his frontage, and singularly enough a serious question was raised before the arbitrators in this case. That is to say, the arbitrators assessed the frontage differently from that which the surveyor of the local authority had assessed it at, and that question, no doubt, has itself arisen in this case, and might arise in others.

The whole question of how much ought to be charged was before the arbitrators, and the whole question of the distribution of the proportion among several frontagers. It was perfectly competent for this gentleman to say before the arbitrators, I am not to pay this proportion which you desire to throw upon me, because you have omitted so many yards belonging to a gentleman who has or has not been served, but who is not included in your apportionment, the result being that you have charged me too much, and I must reduce the amount. That was an argument which he might have put forward at that time. And if they had said, We have not served him, we have not addressed our notice to him, therefore we cannot recover against him, and so we must recover a greater proportion against you and the others to whom we have addressed the notice, he would have been entitled to say, "That is bad in law," and by some means or other, by compelling a statement of a case, he could no doubt have brought that within the ordinary jurisdiction of the court, and the matter could be set right. I take it that it is too late now for him to say that the proportion has not been properly ascertained; it is all a matter of proportion. I think it is too late to raise this question, which, though of substance, is technical, strictly technical; that is to say, it goes to the basis of their operations in the first instance. They were bound to prove this in order to show that they could charge anything. It was for him to challenge that at an earlier period. I think it would be entirely wrong to allow him now to say, "This is all wrong; this local authority have been acting outside their jurisdiction from beginning to end." It is not only that they cannot charge this sum, but they cannot charge anything. I think that disposes of that point.

As regards the other points, I do not propose to deal with them separately. It seems to me that they are all disposed of by one observation, that either by an appeal under the 268th section, or by bringing the matter before the arbitrators, those points were open before and are closed by the award. The award is conclusive—conclusive, of course, only as regards such matters as might properly be within the arbitrators' jurisdiction; but all these matters might have been raised before them.

I have dealt with one question of substance, and the other which, though important, I do not regard at this stage as a question of substance. The other points, I think, do not deserve any more than that general observation.

Declaration, that the plaintiffs have a charge on the property for the sum mentioned, together with interest at 4 per cent.

In re THOMAS EDWARD BRINSMEAD & CO. (LIMITED). TOMLIN'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Conditional application for shares—Repudiation—Opposing winding up petition—Void contract.

A conditional applicant for shares in a company before allotment, to whom shares are allotted, may repudiate his shares if the conditions specified in his application are not fulfilled, as there is no consensus ad idem, and therefore there is no contract between the company and the applicant.

This right of repudiation is not taken away by his appearance on a petition to wind up the company as a contributory opposing such a petition.

This was an application by Tomlin that his name might be struck off the list of contributories of the above-named company.

On the 24th of July, 1896, he had applied for shares in the company in the following form:

"Form of Application for Shares. — Thomas Edward Brinsmead & Sons (Limited).—To the directors of Thomas Edward Brinsmead & Sons (Limited), 94, Cannon-street, London, E.C.—Gentlemen [Having paid to your bankers the sum of £———, being a deposit of 10s. per share payable on application for ———shares of £5 each in] Thomas Edward Brinsmead & Sons (Limited), I request you to allot me five hundred pounds in [that number of] one hundred shares, and I agree to accept the same, or any smaller number that may be allotted to me, upon the terms and conditions of the prospectus and memorandum and articles of association of the company. I request you to place my name on the register of members in respect of the shares so allotted to me, and I undertake to pay the further instalments upon such allotted shares as and when the same become due, provided the total number of shares are applied for, and I undertake to pay in full on allotment. — Ordinary signature, ————.—Name (in full), George William Flowers Tomlin. — Address, Dudley-street, Leighton Bazard. — Description, No occupation.—Date, 24th July, 1896.—If you desire to pay in full on allotment sign the following:—I desire to pay in full on allotment. This form is to be filled up, cut out, and forwarded, together with cheque or cash for the amount payable on application to the bankers, &c., or to the secretary at the offices of the company, 94, Cannon-street, London, E.C."

The application was made upon one of the usual printed forms, but Tomlin altered it by striking out the portions which are above enclosed in square brackets, and by adding the words which above are printed in italics. He did not sign at all at the end of the words "I desire," &c, and he never paid any money to the company. The company shortly afterwards went to allotment, but all the shares in it were not applied for, and only about 58,000 (including those applied for by Tomlin) out of a larger number were allotted. Tomlin did not receive notice of allotment. Shortly afterwards, finding that something was wrong with the company, on the 17th of August, 1896, he served the company with notice of motion under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register by removing his name therefrom on the ground of misrepresentation in the prospectus. Before this motion came on for hearing a petition for winding up the company was presented. Tomlin appeared as a contributory and opposed the petition, and on the winding-up order being made appealed against it with others. This appeal was, however, dismissed.

He now applied to have his name struck off the list of contributories in the winding up.

Norman Craig, for Tomlin.—The condition on which we applied for shares—viz., that all should be allotted—was not fulfilled. There was therefore no contract between us. We had also given notice that we repudiated our shares before the winding up commenced. This was notice that we intended to repudiate, and our appearance on the winding up does not qualify this: Foulkes v. Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Co., 1 Cab. & Ell. 156.

Hon. F. Russell, for the official receiver.—Tomlin has waived his right to repudiate his contract to take shares. After bringing an action to do so, he comes to the court and obtains a hearing as a shareholder; he cannot now shift his ground and say that he is not and never has been a shareholder, and rely on his notice to repudiate: Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association (Limited), Ex parte Edwards, 64 L. T. Rep. 561, 39 W. R. Dig. 44; Reid v. London and Staffordshire Fire Insurance Co., 32 W. R. 94, 53 L. J. Ch. 351.

Norman Craig, in reply.—Reid v. London and Staffordshire Fire Insurance Co. is distinguishable, for Tomlin never withdrew his notice. Ex parte Edwards is in my favour.

WRIGHT, J.—The case has been concisely and ably argued, and I think that no point has been overlooked. The applicant in July, 1896, applied for shares, altering the printed form of application by inserting a proviso which must, I think, be taken to be general in effect and to affect the whole of the previous words. It was, therefore, a conditional application for shares. Next day, when they went to allotment, the whole of the shares were not allotted. The shares applied for by the applicant were allotted to him, but no notice of allotment was given to him, and he has never paid the company anything in respect of the shares. He discovered that there was something wrong with the company, but whether he knew that the total amount of shares was not allotted or based his objection on another ground is not apparent. In August, 1896, he served notice of motion under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register on the ground that he had applied for the shares on the faith of misrepresentations in the company's prospectus, and not on the ground of non-performance of the condition on which he applied. The motion by consent stood over to abide the result of some test cases, and in due course the test motions would have come on. But the motions were cut short by the presentation of a petition to wind up the company. The applicant cannot, therefore, be said to have been in default prior to the hearing of the winding-up petition. But he gave notice of his intention to appear as a contributory at that hearing and oppose the petition. There was, however, nothing in that amounting to a deliberate election to be a shareholder if he was not already one, or to alter the applicant's position. He also appeared at the hearing and opposed, and was a party to the appeal from the decision, but he never voted at any meeting of shareholders. There was no completed contract at first between the applicant and the company—that is, prior to notice (if any) of the fact of allotment being communicated to him in some way—because the application was subject to a condition which was never complied with, and there is no evidence apart from his appearance in court of any waiver of that condition. On the motion before North, J., he adopted the position of a shareholder with a voidable contract. I must therefore hold that the applicant did not intend to render himself liable for the shares; throughout he was endeavouring to obtain relief from liability. When he gave his notice of motion he probably did not know that he could escape on the ground of non-compliance with the condition. When he found that he had a stronger case he took up the position that he was not a shareholder at all. In my judgment he has done nothing to estop himself from denying that he was a shareholder; indeed, I do not see what else he could have done, and in my judgment he is entitled to have his name taken off the list of contributories. It is unfortunate that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Foulkes v. Quartz Hill Co. was not fully reported, as it is a very important one; but I doubt whether the court meant to lay down the rule so absolutely as is stated in the note to the report. I do not think that note goes so far as the note in Mr. Palmer's book.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND THE CITY OF LONDON BREWERY CO. (a.)

Local government—London County Council—New street — Improvement charges — "Initial valuation" — Licensed premises—Evidence of takings and payments —Value of the tying covenant—"Trade interest"— London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. cxxx.).

In estimating the "initial value" of licensed premises under the London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Act, 1895, the arbitrator must not take into consideration the takings and payments, nor any tying covenant, as elements of the value of the site, nor must he take into consideration the takings and payments as evidence of value of the site and buildings, and such evidence should not be admitted even for the purpose of testing the evidence of witnesses.

In the case of a tying covenant in a lease whereof less than twenty-one years are unexpired, the value of the site and buildings must be treated as the same whether the covenant is considered or not, though the benefit of it may be differently apportioned between the lessor and lessee.

In estimating the value of the owner's estate and interest in the site and building, the tying covenant should be taken into consideration, as it is not a trade interest within section 36.

This was a special case stated by an arbitrator appointed by the Local Government Board on a question arising under the clause dealing with "improvement charges," commonly known as the "betterment" clause, in the London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Act, 1895. By that Act the London County Council was authorized to make a new street on the south side of the River Thames as an approach to the Tower Bridge, and for that purpose to take certain lands compulsorily. The arbitrator was appointed to make an "initial valuation" under that Act in respect of two licensed premises, one a tied house known as the "Old Rose," and the other the "Raven and Sun," which was not a tied house. The City of London Brewery Co. were the freeholders of the premises, both of which were situated within the "improvement area." The "Old Rose" was subject to a lease, of which less than twenty-one years was unexpired, granted by the company to one W. Clements, which lease reserved, besides an annual rental, the right to the exclusive supply by the company of the malt liquors consumed in the house. In the case of the "Raven and Sun" the premises were under a lease for an unexpired term exceeding twenty-one years without any tying covenant.

When the arbitrator was making the initial valuation the question was raised whether he was to take into consideration the takings and payments, and also whether, as regards the "Rose" inn, and in view of the words "excluding from each such valuation any trade interest" contained in section 36 of the Act, the value of the covenant tying the premises was to be taken into account. By an order made by Pollock, B., upon an originating summons of the 7th of July, 1896, the arbitrator was ordered to make his valuation in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division. On the 1st of November, 1897, the court considered the award and it was ordered that it be remitted for amendment. The questions then left by the arbitrator for the opinion of the court were as follow:

As regards the "Old Rose."

1. Whether, according to the true construction of the said Act, evidence of the takings and payments of the said public-houses was admissible.

2. Whether (the "Old Rose" being let on a lease whereof 19 years are unexpired at a rental of £100 per annum, subject to the ordinary covenant tying the purchase of malt liquors to the lessors), in arriving at the value of the lessors' interest, the value of such covenant is to be excluded.

With respect to the "Raven and Sun."

1. Whether, according to the true construction of the said Act, evidence of the takings and payments of the said public-house was admissible.

2. Whether, in arriving at the value of the lessee's interest, all value due to the capacity to tie must be excluded.

As regards both houses the arbitrator then found certain alternative values.

The court having on the 23rd of November again remitted the award to the arbitrator and directed him to state certain particulars and find certain further alternative values, he further awarded and declared as follows:

As to the "Old Rose."

Question 1.—The value of the land without buildings and without regard to takings or payments, but having regard to the fact that the land has a licence attached to it, is £3,400.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Question 2.—The value of the land and buildings without regard to the takings or payments, and treating the premises as if in the possession of an owner who is free to tie or not to tie, but having regard to the fact that the premises have a licence attached to them, is £8,620.

Question 3.—The value of the owner's estate and interest in the land and buildings without regard to to the takings or payments, but subject to the existing tenancies—viz., a lease whereof nineteen years are unexpired at a rental of £100 per annum, containing the ordinary covenant tying the purchasers of malt liquors to the lessors—i.e., the same as in No. 2, is £6,620.

As to the "Raven and Sun."

These premises belong to James Vipan Vipan, as freeholder, subject to a lease to Reid's Brewery Co. (Limited) for a term of ninety years from the 29th of September, 1895, at an agreed apportioned rental of £90 per annum, without any covenant tying any trade, the value of the freeholder's interest was mutually agreed by the claimant's valuers and the London County Council at £2,500.

Question 1.—The value of the land without buildings and without regard to takings or payments, but having regard to the fact that the land has a licence attached to it, is £2,995.

Of this sum the value of the freeholder's interest is £2,500, and the value of Reid's interest is £495. These sums take into account the fact that Reid's premises are free and the rent which they pay.

Question 2.—The value of the land and buildings without regard to the takings or payments, and treating the premises as if in the possession of an owner who is free to tie or not to tie, but having regard to the fact that the premises have a licence attached to them, is £8,931. Of this sum, the value of the freeholder's interest is £2,500, and the value of Reid's interest is £6,431.

Question 3.—The value of the owner's estate and interest in the land and buildings and without regard to the takings or payments, but subject to the effect of the tenancy of the occupier, who, I now understand, is the brewer's manager and not a yearly tenant, such tenancy being, in my opinion, of no effect—i.e., the same as in No. 2, is £8,931. Of this sum the value of the freeholder's interest is £2,500, and the value of Reid's interest is £6,431.

By the London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. cxxx.), it is provided as follows:

Section 36, sub-section 2: "All lands within the improvement area, but which shall not be purchased and taken by the council under the powers of this Act, shall be liable to have an improvement charge placed on such lands . . . in respect or in consideration of any substantial and permanent increase in value which it is clearly shown has been derived from the improvement by this Act authorized."

By sub-section 1 "lands" is defined as extending to "messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments."

Sub-section 3 provides that the council shall make a specification of all the lands upon which they propose to place a charge, and shall give notice to each owner, lessee, or occupier of any such lands within the improvement area, and thereupon any such owner, lessee, or occupier may apply to the Local Government Board to appoint some independent person to make a valuation of such lands, which valuation is to be called the "initial valuation."

The sub-section then goes on to provide as follows: "In making such valuation the valuer shall separately distinguish and assess in each case the value of the land apart from that of any existing buildings thereon, and shall also value the land and buildings as a whole, and shall not take into consideration any increased value accruing or supposed to accrue to such land or buildings from or in consequence of the improvement, but shall only take into consideration the value independently of the improvement and as if the improvement had not been contemplated."

"The valuer shall also separately value the interest of the owner of any such lands and the interest of every lessee of any such lands for a term having not less than twenty-one years unexpired at the date of the valuation (excluding from each such valuation any trade or interest), and shall not take into consideration any increased value accruing or supposed to accrue to such lands from or in consequence of the improvement, but shall only take into consideration the value of the said lands independently of the improvement and as if the improvement had not been contemplated."

Bosanquet, Q.C. (Cababé with him), for the brewery company, who appealed.—The value of the covenant tying the house should not be excluded. In the event of the county council purchasing the house under the provisions of the Act it is of importance to the company that the value of that covenant should be included, as it would raise the value of the house. On the other hand, in the event of the company retaining the premises, it was equally desirable that the value of the covenant should be included, as that would raise the amount of the "initial valuation," and in that way the increase in the value on which the improvement charge might be made would be kept down.

Hon. A. Lyttelton appeared for the London County Council.—The covenant ought not to be included. It does not increase the market value of the house. In actions brought for compensation under the Lands Clauses Acts such a covenant is always treated as a trade interest. Further, the valuation ought to be made without regard to the takings and payments. The Legislature never intended that it should be necessary to deal with the question of the trade profits in each individual case. If that were so the expense of the whole inquiry, the total cost of which has to be borne by the London County Council, would be enormous. The basis of assessment in all rating cases is the market value of the income.

Counsel cited the following cases: Dodds v. Assessment Committee of the Poor Law Union of South Shields, 43 W. R. 532, [1895] 2 Q. B. 133; Alison v. The Churchwardens, &c., of Monkwearmouth, 23 L. J. M. C. 177; Sunderland Overseers v. Sunderland Union, 13 W. R. 943, 34 L. J. M. C. 121.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26.—WRIGHT, J.—The arbitrator here has furnished us with an amendment to his award to which there is only one objection; it is this, he has not expressly stated that he has left out the trade interests. However, we assume that that is so. [Counsel assented to this, and the learned judge then read the following judgment:] The matter stands in this way. By an Act which was passed in 1895, called the London County Council (Tower Bridge Southern Approach) Act (58 & 59 Vict. c. cxxx.), the London County Council were empowered to make certain street improvements. Section 36 of the Act recites this: "And whereas the improvement will be effected out of public funds charged over the whole county, and will or may substantially and permanently increase in value lands in the neighbourhood of the improvement which will not be acquired for the purpose thereof, and it is reasonable that provision should be made under which, in respect or in consideration of such increased value, a charge should be placed on such lands." Then it proceeds to make a provision for the ascertainment of the area which will receive permanent benefit from the improvement, what is popularly called "betterment" purposes, and for the estimation of the increase of value which will accrue to each separate property in that area, and for the assessment on the several properties of an annual charge representing such increase of value. The provisions for these purposes comprise four distinct operations. The council, by sub-section 3, are to make a specification of the properties which, in their judgment, will be so increased in value. Then, by the same sub-section, a valuer appointed by the Local Government Board is to make what is called an "initial valuation" of each property, after hearing interested parties. Then, by sub-section 4, the council are to make an assessment showing, in the case of each property, the amount of enhancement of its market value which, in the judgment of the council, will accrue from the improvement and the amount of redeemable annual charge which is to be imposed in respect thereof, being about one and a-half per cent. on the estimated enhancement. Lastly, an arbitrator appointed by the Local Government Board is to determine any objections to any of the above-mentioned matters, and also the incidence of the charge as between the parties having various interests in any property. Among the provisions relating to the assessment of enhancements of value is one, sub-section 9, providing that the owner of any property assessed may alone, or in concurrence with termors for twenty-one years unexpired, if dissatisfied with the assessment, require the council to purchase his estate and interests in the property at the value specified in the "initial valuation," and therefore the council must either purchase as required or abandon the proposed charge on that property.

The questions for decision in the present case arise in relation, not to the specification or to the assessment by the council, or to the final arbitration, but solely to the "initial valuation" of the properties. In making that valuation the valuer is firstly to distinguish the assessment of value of the site apart from that of any existing buildings thereon. He is, secondly, to value the site and buildings as a whole, without reference to the intended improvements. He is, thirdly, to separately "value" the interest of the owner of the site and buildings, and "the interest" of any lessee thereof for twenty-one years unexpired, excluding from each such valuation any trade interest, which expression we understand to refer to goodwill, expectation of profit, and any other similar matters, and to estimates based on takings and payments, and in doing so he "shall only take into consideration the value of the said site and buildings without reference to the intended improvement."

In the present case—that is, the "Old Rose" public-house—the premises are used as a public-house. There is not a lease for twenty-one years, but there is a shorter lease with the common tying covenant. In valuing the site apart from the buildings on it the valuer has, with the assent of the county council, taken into consideration the fact that the premises are licensed as a public-house, and no question arises on that point, though it would seem that this fact, if admitted at all, as an element of value in the first or second parts of the valuation, should be considered as an element of the value of the site and buildings, rather than of the site alone. On that basis he has made alternative valuations of the site dependent on the two questions whether the takings and payments of the public-house, and the fact that it is "tied" are elements of the value of the site or of the site and buildings. It seems to us plain that neither of these can be considered in valuing the site "apart from any existing buildings thereon."

In the next part of the valuation—namely, that of the site and buildings "as a whole," the same two questions arise. As regards the takings and payments we think that these cannot be treated as elements of value of the land and buildings, that is as in themselves evidence of value, and that evidence of them should not be admitted even for the purpose of testing the evidence of witnesses. In the case of Dodds v. The Assessment Committee of South Shields, 43 W. R. 532, [1895] 2 Q. B. 133, it was so held with reference to questions of rating, and we think that the principle of that decision, although partly based on practice, is applicable to the present case. The admission of such evidence must tend to induce a consideration of trade value instead of the market value of the land and buildings. As regards the "tying" covenant we think that the valuation of the site and buildings must in effect be the same as if that covenant were considered. The real question is, as it seems to us, what is the market value of the premises fit for a public-house considered apart from any particular distribution of the interest in it—that is to say, considered as an unqualified freehold. If, indeed, the owner held subject to a covenant not to use the premises as a public-house a different question would arise. But as things are, the property must be valued as that of a person who is in all respects a beneficial owner. The fact that the house is "tied" has not increased its value, but only amounts to this, that the owner has not parted with that part of its value which consists of the power to tie. The value of the premises is presumably the same either way.

If the owner chooses to tie, he may get less rent, but more benefit in other ways. If he does not tie, he may get more rent, but less of other benefits. The enhancement of the value of the premises which will result from the improvement will be the same, whether the premises are tied or not, though the benefit of it may be differently apportioned between lessor and lessee, and the charge is intended to be proportioned to the total enhancement of value.

The third part of the valuation appears to be introduced for the purpose of sub-section 9, and although it seems, primâ facie, to be required only where there is a lessee for at least twenty-one years, yet, in order to give full effect to sub-section 9, it seems necessary to construe the provision for this third part of the valuation as requiring in every case a valuation of the owner's interests. The only alternative would be to treat the owner as interested to the extent of the whole valuation. This would not work any injustice apart from sub-section 9, because the incidence of the charge will be apportioned by the arbitrator under sub-section 17; but it would work grave injustice under sub-section 9, because the council would be compelled either to pay for much more than what the owner's real interest might be, or to abandon the charge altogether.

Then it only remains to determine whether, in the present case, the fact that the house is tied ought to be considered in this third part of the valuation. We think that it ought, in the same manner as in the valuation of the site and buildings, though not for the same reasons. This part of the valuation is a valuation, not of the site and buildings, but of the owner's interest in them, and anything not being "a trade interest" ought to be considered which affects the quantum of that interest. It is not so much that the covenant is to be valued as that the owner's interest has not been diminished by the alienation of the power to tie. If he had leased the house without tying it his interest would have been less unless he got a compensating rent.

The effect of the whole, as we understand the matter, will be that if the owner requires the council, under sub-section 9, to take his interest, and they do not abandon the charge upon his property, they will have to pay him the value of his actual interests in the premises, and the charge will continue and be apportioned between the council and the lessees, just as if the council had always been the owner, and as if the existing leases had been held from them.

We have so far dealt with the case of the premises described as the "Old Rose." In the case of the the "Raven and Sun" similar questions arise, with this exception, that the premises are under a lease for an unexpired term exceeding twenty-one years without any tying covenant. This circumstance will not, in our opinion, of itself affect the first or second parts of the valuation, though it may or may not be material to be considered as tending to show that the rent is or is not a fair criterion of value. But it may be material in the third part of the valuation. If the owner gets a rent different from the rent which he could get if the house were tied, and if that difference fairly represents the value to the lessee of his freedom from such a covenant, then the existence or non-existence of such a covenant would seem to be immaterial. Otherwise the value of the interest of one or the other party would be increased or diminished, as the case may be.

The valuation will therefore stand as a valuation according to the last tables in each case.

"THE THRUNSCOE." (a.)

Appeal from county court having admiralty jurisdiction —Breach of contract—Bill of lading—Damage to cargo by heat—Exemption—"Any other accidents of the seas"—Closing of ventilators during bad weather.

The owners of a steamship on board of which cargo is shipped under a bill of lading containing the following exemption: "Fire at sea, accidents from machinery, boilers, steam, or any other accidents of the seas," are not, if the steamship be seaworthy and the cargo properly stowed, liable for damage to the cargo caused during the voyage by heat proceeding from the bulkheads surrounding the engine and boiler space at a time when the ventilators provided for sufficiently ventilating such space had necessarily to be closed for the safety of the steamship.

This was an appeal from the Admiralty side of the county court of Gloucestershire, holden at Bristol.

By the decree appealed from the judge of the court below (His Honour Judge Austin) had pronounced judgment for the defendants with costs in an action of damage to cargo or breach of agreement under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869. The action was instituted on behalf of Messrs. Spillers & Bakers (Limited), the owners of a cargo of grain laden on board the steamship Thrunscoe, against Messrs. Bennett & Co., the owners of The Thrunscoe, to recover the sum of £61 9s. 6d. in respect of damage caused to a cargo of oats and maize shipped on board The Thrunscoe on a voyage from Baltimore to Avonmouth Dock, and consigned to the plaintiffs.

The judgment of the court below, as transmitted to the registrar of this court, was as follows:

His Honour Judge Austin.—In this case the short point which I have to consider is whether or not the damage to the maize and oats which is sought to be recovered in this action is damage referable to what are commonly called perils of the sea, or whether or not it is referable to either unseaworthiness of the ship or defect in stowage.

Now, the story is a very short one; and, indeed, with regard to most of the facts there is hardly any controversy at all. The Thrunscoe sailed from Baltimore, being a new ship, and encountered an exceptionally heavy storm, which lasted for about seven days, during which time the ventilators had all to be closed. She had on board a cargo of maize and oats, and when she arrived at Avonmouth it was found that the cargo in No. 2 lower hold had been very seriously damaged in the way I will describe presently. The cargo in No. 3 hold had been slightly damaged; the cargo in No. 2 'tween decks slightly damaged; and, again, there was a certain amount of damage in the 'thwartships bunker. I have no doubt that the damage which the plaintiffs seek to recover here is damage which is the result of what has been called roasting or baking, as distinguished from ordinary heating of a cargo where that cargo has either got wetted by salt water, or has been shipped in a damp state and has fermented. It is damage by roasting and baking which has proceeded from heat generated in the engine space. Mr. Bailhache says, conceding that, he is entitled to a verdict. In my opinion he is not. He says he is entitled to a verdict for two reasons. He says he has Mr. Kilburn in this dilemma; either the ship was not reasonably fit for the voyage across the Atlantic, or, if she was reasonably fit, there was negligence in the stowage. If he had brought substantive evidence to show that this method of construction, which existed in the case of The Thrunscoe, which is admittedly the most modern, was improper in any way or lacking in anything which a careful shipbuilder would put into a ship, or if he had shown that precious cargoes could not be carried in The Thrunscoe under ordinary circumstances without injury in the way of baking, I should be inclined to be with him on the ground of seaworthiness. I entirely agree that the shipowner must provide a ship reasonably fit for the carriage of the goods for the particular voyage. In my opinion the evidence goes to show that the shipowner did perform that obligation in this particular case. In my opinion there was no default in stowage—no negligence by way of improper stowage. Mr. Bailhache hardly pressed that when he was cross-examining or examining the witnesses, and he put it upon me in argument as being one of the horns of the dilemma which one has to face in this case. In my opinion there was no evidence which I could seriously consider of improper stowage here. In my opinion that which happened was the result of the heat generated in the engine space being detained, so to speak, and kept down below by the closing of the ventilators for a period, which no reasonable man could be expected to contemplate even in January crossing the Atlantic.

It appears from the evidence that the ventilators were closed for a period of seven days, during which time heat generated in the engine space which ordinarily would have got through the many ventilators which were present. Mr. Bailhache hardly cross-examined as to the number of ventilators. It was asserted, and scarcely denied, that there were many ventilators and efficient ones if they were able to be opened. For seven days they were all stopped up. The heat went on increasing and getting worse and worse in No. 2 lower hold, where the main damage took place, and never had a chance, so to speak, of getting away from the grain. In my opinion, that was the direct cause of the injury—the direct cause of this again being the closing of the ventilators, which was the direct result of perils of the sea through which the ship was going. Those on board the ship were bound to do something to prevent the ventilators being a source of danger to the ship. They were bound to close them and keep them closed for an inordinate time in consequence of the inordinate and extraordinary perils of the seas. For this reason I have come to the conclusion that, so far as No. 2 lower hold is concerned, the shipowner is not liable. I feel a certain amount of difficulty in deciding as to his liability or non-liability with regard to the other damaged portions of the cargo. It is true that in the upper portions of the cargo there which were contained in the 'tween decks and thwartship bunker there was a certain amount of baking which extended for a very short space from the bulkhead. Below in No. 2 hold the baking went a very long way; there was more difficulty of ventilation down below than there was up above according to the evidence. It seems to me that it is more reasonable to attribute the baking in the upper portions of the cargo—that is to say, in the 'tween decks and the 'thwartship bunker—to the want of ventilation, which was, as I have said, the result of a peril of the sea, than to attribute it to unseaworthiness or bad stowage. In the result, though there has been a payment into court, I find the defendants are not liable for any portion of the damages at all, and there must be a verdict for the defendants with costs, and an order will be made for the payment out to the defendants of the moneys paid into court. I give leave to appeal if leave is necessary.

The appeal was heard by a Divisional Court of the Admiralty.

JEUNE, P.—The findings of fact of the learned county court judge are conclusive in this case. He found that the damage in question was caused by heat surrounding the engine and boiler space, that the ship was fit to carry the cargo on this voyage, and that the damage was not the result of improper stowage, but was the result of the closing of the ventilators during the period of seven days in a storm of exceptional severity and duration; that the ship was provided with sufficient ventilators to carry off the heat from the bulkheads, but all the ventilators were necessarily closed during the storm for the safety of the step. It appears, therefore, that the learned judge has found, and I see no reason to doubt the correctness of the finding, that the ship was seaworthy, that the stowage was proper; and, thirdly, that it was the exceptional character of the storm which caused the ventilators to be closed. With regard to the principal damage—that is, to the cargo in No. 2 hold, it was quite clear that the air which should circulate between the wooden sheathing and the bulkhead and so prevent the heat of the engines reaching the cargo was stopped by reason of the ventilators being closed, and that that was due to the necessity imposed by the severity of the storm. Under these circumstances, dealing with that part of the cargo alone, it appears to me the severity of the weather was a proximate cause of that damage because the close of the ventilators was due to that cause. Then it is said, and that is the only part of the case which does not appear to me to be quite clear upon the finding of the learned judge of the court below—that, in two other parts of the ship—namely, in the 'thwartship bunker and No. 3 hold, there was direct contact of the grain with the bulkhead, and the bulkhead being heated produced the damage; but the true effect of this finding appears to be that these two causes of the damage in these two cases was the same as the cause in the case of the cargo in No. 2 hold, and that the comparative little damage that was done in those two case would not have occurred if the ventilation of the ship could have been kept in its normal condition. In that finding I concur. For these reasons I think the judgment of the learned county court judge is right.

BARNES, J.—It has not been clear to me during the arguments whether this was an appeal upon fact or upon law, but assuming it to be an appeal upon both grounds, the first question is whether the findings of the learned county court judge upon the facts are wrong.

Now, these findings are set out in the record and the learned President has read them. After looking into the evidence it appears to me that there is no ground for holding that the decision of the learned county court judge upon the facts is erroneous. I think that that finding is in accordance with the weight of the evidence, and it results from the finding that the ship was a ship fit to carry the cargo in question and that there was no improper stowage. Counsel for the appellants have, however, contended that, assuming the findings of fact to be correct, the damage which occurred in the case is not, as a matter of law, within the exceptions in the bill of lading. The exceptions in the bill of lading include "fire at sea or on shore, accidents from machinery, boilers, steam, or any other accidents of the seas." It is to be borne in mind that the contract is for the carriage of goods in a steamship and that the exceptions relate to a contract of carriage of goods on a steamship.

The judge of the court below has found, after stating that the ship was fit to carry the cargo and that the cargo was properly stowed, that the damage was caused by heat proceeding from the bulkheads surrounding the engine and boiler space, and that this damage was the result of closing the ventilators during a period of seven days in a storm of exceptional severity and duration. He has found that the ship was provided with sufficient ventilators to carry off the heat but that they were necessarily closed for the safety of the ship. The ship being a fit ship to carry the cargo and the cargo being properly stowed, it is difficult to see what more the shipowner could do. The findings of the county court judge mean that in the circumstances the vessel met with such extraordinary weather that the servants of the shipowner were compelled to close the ventilators for a period which nobody could reasonably contemplate, and that that practically prevented the heat which is generated in the usual course of the voyage of a steamship from getting away, and that therefore the severity of the weather was the direct cause of the damage which occurred. In my judgment when once the meaning of this finding is realized it becomes clear that this damage was the direct result of the accidents of the seas. I therefore agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

COOKE v. STEVENS. (a.)

Executor—Acting before probate—Delay in proving will—Recovering outstanding assets—Wilful default.

A testator died in 1882, and his will was proved in 1889. A policy of insurance on the testator's life could not be got in until probate was obtained, and meanwhile interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum was paid upon a debt of the testator.

Held (affirming North, J., 45 W. R. 284, [1897] 1 Ch. 422), that the delay in proving the will and getting in the money due upon the policy did not amount to wilful default, and that, consequently, the ordinary accounts against the executors ought only to be taken.

Appeal of the plaintiff from the decision of North, J. (reported 45 W. R. 284, [1897] 1 Ch. 422).

Gardner Christopher Stevens made his will on the 12th of February, 1880, and appointed Charles Frederick Stevens, Matthew Sallitt Emerson, and John Sewell executors.

The testator died on the 23rd of December, 1882, and the will was proved by C. F. Stevens alone on the 15th of October, 1889. The testator was entitled to a policy of £676 in the Scottish Widows' Assurance Office, which became payable on the 21st of March, 1883. This sum was paid on the 18th of November, 1889, with £45 1s. 4d. interest at the rate of 1 per cent. from the 21st of March, 1883, to the 21st of November, 1889.

The policy was mortgaged to the testator's bankers, Messrs. Gurney, as security, and was in their possession at the time of his death. Meanwhile interest at the rate of 5 per cent. was paid upon the mortgage debt due by the testator, and the difference in interest thus paid and received was £157 14s. 8d.

Emerson was a solicitor, and denied that he had acted as an executor; but he had acted as solicitor for Stevens, who subsequently proved the will, with regard to certain actions against the estate of the testator. There was no appeal on this point, North, J., having found that Emerson had acted as an executor.

All the three executors named in the will wrote a letter to the Scottish Widows' Assurance Society on the 28th of July, 1883, requesting that the policy-moneys might be paid to Messrs. Gurney, being creditors of the testator, but the society declined to make the payment until probate was taken out.

The action was brought by one of the residuary legatees, asking for an administration decree against Stevens and Emerson upon the footing of wilful default.

North, J., directed the ordinary accounts to be taken against both the defendant executors, but declined to make any order upon the footing of wilful default.

The residuary legatee appealed.

Butcher, Q.C., and Methold, for the appellant.—The delay on the part of the executors to take out probate for seven years and get in outstanding assets of the testator's estate clearly amounted to wilful default: Re Brogden, Billing v. Brogden, 37 W. R. 84, 38 Ch. D. 546. The same principle applies to executors as to trustees, in getting in the trust estate. See also Seaman v. Everad, 2 Lev. 39; Hall v. Hallett, 1 Cox 134. Even though no capital is lost, they are liable for the loss of interest resulting to the estate through their default.

Swinfen, Eady, Q.C., and Christopher James, for the respondents, used the same arguments as in the court below.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 9.—LINDLEY, M.R.—In this case a residuary legatee has brought an action against his testator's executors seeking not only the ordinary accounts of their receipts and payments, but also an account against them on the footing of wilful default. So far as the plaintiff seeks to charge them with wilful default the action has been dismissed with costs, and from this decision the plaintiff has appealed. The testator's assets got in by the executors are said not to be sufficient to pay his debts. Hence the importance of the case to the plaintiff. Two acts of wilful default are relied upon and have to be considered. The first is that the executors omitted to get in a debt alleged to have been due to the testator at his death from a person named Clarke. The facts as to this are complicated, and the pleadings are somewhat embarrassing. But having regard to the mode in which this part of the case was dealt with in the court below, it would be unjust to the defendants to treat the pleadings as admitting that there was such a debt, and so far as evidence goes, no such debt was proved either before North, J., or before us.

The next act of wilful default charged, was the omission on the part of the executors to enable a secured creditor of the testator to realize his security sooner than he did. The consequence of this omission was that the testator's estate had been diminished by the amount of interest which would have been saved if the security had been realized sooner. The security was a policy for £676 on the testator's life; he had deposited it with other documents of value with his bankers, and at his death there was due to them on those securities £1,700 odd. The policy was pledged for much more than it was worth. If the executors had in their hands assets sufficient to pay the debts of the deceased, including the debt due to the bankers, the executors ought to have paid the bankers off; and if, instead of doing this, they kept assets in their hands and allowed interest to run up against the estate, and ultimately had to pay more than they would have had to pay if they had not delayed paying the bankers the amount due to them, the executors would have been guilty of a devastavit, and would be disallowed the interest thus unnecessarily paid by them. The policy was not assigned to the bankers, and they could not give a valid receipt for the policy moneys without the concurrence of the executors. Moreover, the insurance office which had to pay the policy would not pay the bankers, even with the concurrence of the executors, until the testator's will had been proved. For some reason or other the executors did not wish to prove it, and although eventually one of them did prove the will, the other has not proved it yet. As soon as the will was proved the bankers, or, rather, a person to whom they had assigned their debt and their policy, obtained the policy-moneys, with the assistance of the executor who had proved, and the debt was reduced by the amount received from the insurance office. It must not be overlooked that, although the executors' accounts have not yet been certified, they have been fully investigated, and there is no proof even now that the executors did wrong in not paying off the bankers and so reducing the policy and getting in the asset which it represented. In the absence, however, of such evidence I am unable to see how a case of wilful default can be established. If debts are paid in the wrong order to the detriment of the creditor the executor is of course answerable. The payment would be disallowed in taking the account of the receipts and payments. But the payment of debts even in a wrong order is not a wrong entitling a legatee to relief, nor does such payment amount to wilful default; and it is wilful default which we have to consider here.

It is urged that it is the duty of an executor to prevent any loss to his testator's estate which it is in his power to prevent. But this proposition is far too wide, as is shown inter alia by Turner v. Turner, 1 Jac. & W. 39, in which it was held that an executor's right of paying one creditor before another justified him as against a legatee in paying even a simple contract debt not bearing interest in preference to a specialty debt bearing interest, although the estate was diminished by the additional interest which had ultimately to be borne. A wrongful payment is one thing, and can be set right by disallowing it when the executor brings in his account. But if it is sought to charge him with loss attributable to some other breach of duty, call it wilful default or by any other name, such breach of duty must be proved, and if no sufficient proof or even primâ facie evidence of it is given, it is not right to insert in the judgment any declaration of liability, or even an inquiry as to liability based upon such supposed breach of duty. In the present case no evidence of any such breach of duty has been given, and the attempt to charge the executors with more than they have received has failed. Whether any payment, by which the executors seek to discharge themselves, ought or ought not to be disallowed must be decided hereafter. That question is not before us now. This appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

I have preferred to base my judgment on the above ground rather than to investigate the question whether executors who delay proving their testator's will can be rendered liable for losses which they could have avoided if they had proved it earlier. In the present case the will has been proved by one of the defendants, and the court, therefore, has the probate before it. The probate shows that both defendants are appointed executors by the will, and it is proved that both of them have accepted the office of executor by acting in the administration of the testator's estate. Under these circumstances I fail to see upon what principle they can derive any benefit from delaying to obtain probate. It appears to me that, having accepted office, they ought to be treated as executors as from that time, and not simply as executors de son tort, as their counsel contended. It is unnecessary, however, to pursue this inquiry.

CHITTY, L.J.—North, J., has dismissed the action so far as it claims relief on the footing of wilful default, and has made against both the defendants Stevens and Emerson as executors, the common decree under which they have to account for assets received. The will was not proved until 1889, nearly seven years after the testator's death, when probate was obtained by Stevens alone. The probate shows that Emerson also was appointed executor. North, J., has held that Emerson accepted the office by intermeddling with the assets in 1883. There is no appeal from this part of the judgment.

The statement of claim raised several cases of devastavit or of wilful default against the executors; but the appeal is confined to two.

The first is the case of Clarke, an alleged debtor, which may be disposed of in a few words. The plaintiff, who is one of several residuary legatees, failed to prove that there was any debt owing by Clarke. Proof of the debt is the foundation of a wilful default decree. When the debt is proved the burden is thrown on the executor to show why he did not get it in (Styles v. Guy, 1 Mac. & G. 422, and In re Brogden, Billing v. Brogden). I am satisfied by the judge's notes and the statements of counsel that, although the £4,000 promissory notes given by Clarke to the testator were mentioned, the only substantial contest before North, J., was confined to the £395. The evidence put in consisting of the agreement and the valuation coupled with the admission that notes for £4,000 only were taken and the fact that Clarke was in court, and could have been called by the plaintiff, all went to show that the £395 was not owing at the testator's death. The inference was that that sum had been paid or satisfied in the testator's lifetime.

The other case relates to the policy for £676 which became payable in March, 1883. This policy was mortgaged by the testator with other securities for an amount far exceeding the sum recoverable under the policy. The mortgage, which was held by the testator's bankers, was effected by a deposit of the policy and a memorandum. As there was no assignment of the policy within the Policies of Insurance Act, 1867, the bankers could not sue the insurance office. The right of action at law remained vested in the executors. But inasmuch as the policy was equitably mortgaged for an amount in excess of its value, the executors, assuming they had proved the will, could not have sued for or recovered the policy moneys or any part of them; they were not entitled to receive the moneys without the consent of the mortgagees, and there is no evidence or even suggestion that the mortgagees would have consented to the receipt of the moneys by the executors. The only proceedings which they could have taken against the bankers or their assignee Mann was an action to redeem, in which they might have joined the insurance office as defendants. The result appears to be this: the executors could not be charged under what is termed a wilful default decree, Under such a decree the executors are charged with what they have received or might have received but for their wilful default or neglect.

But the case does not rest here. If on the facts proved a case of devastavit by negligence is established other than what is technically termed wilful default, the court ought to make the proper declaration against the executors. The loss alleged is the difference between the interest allowed by the insurance office and the interest which the mortgage debt carried, a difference of 4 per cent. The charge made by the plaintiff's pleading is not merely for wilful default, it is also for a devastavit. I pause for a moment to say that on taking the common form account of their receipts, executors can properly be, and are often, charged with a devastavit arising on the accounts themselves. On taking the account they stand charged with their receipts; and if they seek to discharge themselves by unlawful payments their discharge is disallowed. Further, if on taking the accounts it appears that the executors have improperly retained balances in their own hands, they are liable to be charged interest on the balances, although no such charge is raised on the pleadings. For this purpose an additional inquiry is generally directed. The charge of interest, when it is made by the court, rests upon the foundation of a devastavit.

Where a charge of the nature now under consideration is made by the pleadings, the general rule is that it ought to be disposed of at the trial (see Smith v. Armitage, 32 W. R. 88, 24 Ch. D. 727). But the rule is not universal, and there may be, and are, cases where it would be proper to direct an inquiry. The plaintiff's counsel on this appeal ask for a declaration of liability, or, in the alternative, for an inquiry. Now, in this case there is the fact that an order for administration against Stevens alone had been made at the instance of another residuary legatee. The accounts had been taken, and were ready for the chief clerk's certificate; but no certificate had been made. North, J., stayed all further proceedings under that order, with liberty to adopt the proceedings under it in this action. It is plain that the numerous charges in the plaintiff's pleadings in this action are in great measure founded upon a knowledge of the accounts in the former action.

The charge against the executors resolves itself into a charge that they were answerable to the plaintiff and the other residuary legatees for loss arising from their negligence in not paying off sooner than they did the interest-bearing debt secured by the mortgage. This charge does not appear to me to rest upon the question whether it was their duty to have proved the will sooner than they did. I will assume that they cannot set up their delay in proving the will as a defence, and that they stand in the same position as if they had both proved the will in 1883, when by intermeddling they accepted the office. But to make good the proposition that the executors are liable for not paying off the mortgage, or in other words for not redeeming it, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the executors had assets which they were bound to apply in redemption of the mortgage. I say "bound to apply" advisedly, because here there comes in the right of an executor to prefer one creditor to another of the same degree at any time before a decree for administration is made by a court of equity. Some few years ago an attempt was made to interfere with this right by appointing a receiver, but it is now established that a receiver ought not to be appointed merely for the purpose of depriving the executor of his right of preference. It suffices to refer on this point to Stirling, J.'s, decision In re Wells, Moloney v. Brooke, 39 W. R. 139, 45 Ch. D. 569, where the authorities are cited and dealt with. Where an executor has assets in his hands which he ought to apply in payment of an interest-bearing debt he is liable for the loss to the estate occasioned by his unjustifiable neglect and delay in paying the debt (see Seaman v. Dee, Administrator of Everad, 2 Lev. 30). But he is not liable for loss accruing to the estate by reason of his paying, in exercise of his right to prefer, a non-interest-bearing debt before an interest-bearing debt. This is established by Turner v. Turner, and by Robinson v. Cumming, 2 Atk. 409, where the executor's claim for fifteen years' interest on his own interest-bearing debt was allowed. The plaintiff has not proved or attempted to prove that the executors had at any time before the actual payment of the mortgage debt assets in hand sufficient for its payment, much less that they had assets which they were bound so to apply. There is not even an allegation to any such effect in the plaintiff's statement of claim.

For these reasons I think that no declaration of the executor's liability ought to be made, and on the facts that no sufficient ground has been shown for granting an inquiry.

It will be observed that I have not rested my judgment on any supposed duty of the executors to obtain probate. It may be that their delay in obtaining probate would not afford any defence to a charge of wilful default or of negligence, for which otherwise they were accountable. My opinion is that it would not. It is plain that the mortgagees being creditors, and any of the residuary legatees, could have cited them to take or refuse probate. It would seem that this is the only remedy against executors for not taking out probate.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The first question to be decided in this case is whether Stevens, the executor who has proved, can be made responsible to the estate for the interest which has been retained by the equitable mortgagee of a policy of assurance on the life of the testator, in respect of that period during which the mortgagee was unable to get the policy moneys from the office by reason of the neglect of the executor to obtain probate, and thus put himself in a position to give a proper receipt for the policy moneys. If the executor is responsible it must be either in respect of loss of assets received, or which, but for his wilful default, he might have received, or because he has been guilty of such mismanagement in the administration as to make him liable to make good the loss occasioned thereby. Now as to wilful default, accounts are not taken on this footing unless there has been a loss of assets received or assets which might have been received, and there is some difficulty in saying that the executor either received or might have received these policy moneys. He clearly could, under no circumstances, have ever received the policy moneys except subject to the rights of the mortgagee, and never could have claimed as against the mortgagee to have paid over to him one shilling of the policy moneys until the whole mortgage debt and interest had been paid; and inasmuch as the receipt by the mortgagee of the whole policy moneys would have left a large portion of the mortgage debt unpaid (that is to say, the portion which was only paid many years later, when certain promissory notes payable seven years after date, which formed part of the security moneys, were realized), it follows that there were in respect of these policy moneys no assets which the executor received or might have received but for his wilful default. It is true that he gave a receipt to the office for the policy moneys, but the policy, although legal assets, was subject to the lien of the equitable mortgagee, and he was as much entitled to receive the amount secured to him from the insurance company as if he had had an assignment; and if the executor had refused to concur in the receipt to the office, a court of equity would have ordered payment to the creditor (Glaholm v. Rowntree, 6 A. & E. 710). This disposes of the case so far as it claims to have the accounts taken on the footing of wilful default.

The next question is whether the executor could be charged on the taking of a common account with the interest which became payable on the unreduced debt during the period of delay in obtaining probate. Now, the only mode in which this could be worked out is by charging the executor with the full amount of the policy moneys as a legal asset received, and allowing him against this, only the principal and interest on so much of the debt as would have remained if the policy moneys had been received at the time when they might have been received if the executor had not delayed to obtain probate, and by disallowing him the interest on that part of the debt which might have been paid off, but was not paid off by reason of the executor's delay in obtaining probate. This is rather like the case of disallowing the executor sums paid for interest accruing in a case where, having assets sufficient to pay a debt carrying onerous interest, he neglects to pay off the debts and subjects the estate to interest for which it would not have been liable if he had made proper use of the assets. But it is obvious that there is this material difference, that in the one case the executor has the assets in hand and fails to apply them, while in the other he has no assets in hand; and, according to my understanding of the taking of a common account, such an account only relates to assets actually received. It seems, therefore, that in the present case the executor cannot be charged with this interest either on the taking of an account on the footing of wilful default or on the taking of a common account. If this reasoning is correct the only mode in which the executor can be charged is by an action in the nature of an action for damages for negligence in administration.

I shall deal next with that question, but before doing so I wish to observe that if he would be liable in such an action I am not sure that his liability might not be enforced by directing an enquiry in the course of taking the common account without any substantial action for negligence. As to the liability of the executor to an action, it is stated generally in Williams on Executors that an executor is liable as on a devastavit not only for loss arising by a direct abuse of the assets by spending or consuming them, but also for waste by such acts of negligence and wrong administration as will disappoint the claimants on the assets; and it would seem from the case of Hall v. Hallett that this liability may include a loss arising to the estate by reason of the estate having to bear charges which it would not have had to bear but for the culpable negligence of the executor. I may observe here that none of the forms employed at law for charging an executor as on a devastavit seem to be so framed as to include a claim for damages for negligent administration, all the forms being framed in terms applicable only to the loss of assets received or which might have been received; but assuming that there is no liability which could be enforced at law he might still be made liable by an action or bill as it used to be called in equity to make good the loss to the estate arising from his negligent administration—as seems to have been done in Hall v. Hallett. On the whole I think that such an action would lie; but the plaintiff would have to establish both the negligence and the damage resulting to the estate thereby; and I am not satisfied that either the negligence or the damage has been established in the present case. First, as to the negligence, I think no action would lie for neglect to take out probate. No such action appears ever to have been brought, and I think that the plaintiff's only remedy is by citing the executor in the Probate Division. The negligence, whether you regard it as negligence to take out probate, or as negligence in not tendering the office an official receipt, was not negligence of any duty arising from the trust accepted by him by intermeddling; and the negligence to take probate was mere negligence to obtain legal proof of the office, the acceptance of which he was by intermeddling estopped from denying. He was always willing to give such receipt as he could, independently of probate. Secondly, as to the damage I am not satisfied that there could have been any surplus on the realization by the mortgagee of his securities, and I doubt whether such damage would not have been too remote even if proved. The damage resulted not only from the executors not taking probate and tendering an official receipt, but also from the fact that no one else interested chose to take out administration, as any person interested might have done, by taking the proper steps in the Probate Division. Taking the view which I do, it is unnecessary to consider whether the fact that Stevens has now proved increases his liability; but there is a great deal of authority to show that the liability of a named executor who has not proved, but has intermeddled, is limited to those assets which he has received: Read v. Truelove, Ambl. 417; Lowry v. Fulton, 9 Sim. 104; Williams on Executors. Such an executor is not an executor de son tort, but in this respect his liability seems to be limited in the same way: Rogers v. Frank, 1 Y. & J. 409.

SAUNDERS v. GORE. (a.)

Settlement—Construction—Appointment of stock sufficient to raise net sum—Succession duty.

The donee of a power of appointment under a settlement appointed so much of the stock, &c., as should be sufficient to raise "the net sum of £2,000" to an object of the power.

Held, that the appointee was entitled to receive the full sum of £2,000 free from succession duty.

Decison of Stirling, J. (45 W. R. 456, [1897] 1 Ch. 888), reversed.

Appeal of the plaintiff from Stirling, J. (reported 45 W. R. 456, [1897] 1 Ch. 888).

By marriage settlement certain funds were settled, in the events which happened, upon trust for the wife (Ellen Anne Saunders) for life, and after her decease upon the children of the marriage as she should by deed or will appoint. In exercise of the power of appointment she appointed (inter alia) "that so much of the stock, funds, shares, and securities now held by the present trustees of the said indenture of settlement upon and subject to the trusts thereof as shall be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000 shall, subject to the life interest therein of the said Ellen Anne Saunders henceforth belong and be vested in Edward George Saunders, and be held in trust for him, the said Edward George Saunders, his executors, administrators, and assigns."

The question raised on summons before Stirling, J., was whether the appointee was entitled to receive the sum appointed to him free from succession duty.

Stirling, J., following Banks v. Braithwaite, 32 L. J. Ch. 35, held that the appointee took subject to the payment of succession duty by him.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Medd, for the appellant—The true reading of the appointment is "clear of expenses and of the duty. Stirling, J., was misled by Banks v. Braithwaite, which is inconsistent with Lord Langdale's decision in Harper v. Morley, 2 Jur. 653. There is no distinction between the words "clear" and "net": In re Currie, 36 W. R. 752.

They also referred to Wilks v. Groom, 4 W. R. 691, 2 Jur. (N. S.) 798; and Peareth v. Marriott, 31 W. R. 68, 22 Ch. D. 182.

Godefroi, for another subsequent appointee, added as a defendant, in the same interest.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The question in this case turns upon the construction of a deed appointing a certain fund, which was the subject of the trusts of a marriage settlement. In the events which have happened those funds were vested in trustees upon trust for Mrs. Saunders for her life, and, subject to her life interest, upon such trusts for the children of the marriage as she should by deed or will appoint; she made various appointments, three of which were in the same form, and I will deal with one of them. The appointment runs thus: [His lordship read the appointment as above set out, and continued:] Now, the question is what is the effect of the expression "the net sum of £2,000" in that particular document. The controversy relates to duties which are somewhat heavy, and the learned judge in the court below has construed this appointment in this way. He says ([1897] 1 Ch., p. 892): "Applying that reasoning," the reasoning of Kindersley, V.C., in Banks v. Braithwaite, "to the present case, what is given here is not the net sum of £2,000, but so much of the stock as will be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000, and when that is ascertained by the proper calculation, as the Vice-Chancellor says, that particular sum of stock is to belong to the appointee. In my opinion the present case falls within the decision of Banks v. Braithwaite (which I will refer to presently), and the appointment does not carry with it the succession duty, but the appointee takes subject thereto." With reference to that, I confess it appears to me that what is given to Mr. Edward Saunders in this case is the net sum of £2,000 in stock. Though, of course, I can see it in words, I cannot follow in this will the distinction between the measure of the sum and the sum itself. We are discussing simply a question of amount, and, bearing that in mind, it appears to me that the true meaning and true intent of this is that this is an appointment of a net sum of £2,000 in a particular form. If that is the true construction, how can it be held that any expenses are to come out of this net sum of £2,000, whether you call it one kind of expense or another kind of expense? The net sum which is here given is not to be subject to deduction. That is as I understand it. There were other appointments in the same form, and then the last appointment (which I will call the residuary appointment) appears to have been subject to certain preceding appointments. That is how I read it apart from all authority, and I confess I cannot regard it as a gift of so much stock as would be sufficient to raise the sum of £2,000 to be given to Edward without seeing that the intention is to give him that net amount. If I could arrive at any other conclusion—that it was a gift of so much of what is called the measure of the £2,000 and that the net sum was not to be given to him—the case might be different.

But I may say at once this is not the least like instructions to a broker. You have to look at the document and the object of the document; it has nothing to do with what you are to do with the net sum when you have got it. Here is a gift by appointment by a mother to her son, and the question is, What has she given? I am not going through the authorities, but with reference to the case which was so much pressed upon Stirling, J. (Banks v. Braithwaite), and in deference to which he gave this decision, I confess I should not there have construed that document as Kindersley, V.C., did. The document was: A testator gave the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust to set apart £10,000 Consols and pay the dividends to his sister for life, and after her decease to retain so much of the said sum as should be sufficient to realize the clear yearly income of £150, and he directed the trustees to pay the dividends and other income of the stock so directed to be retained by them, to his nephew. I should have read that as a gift of a clear yearly income of £150 to the nephew. However, I see the difference between that case and this, because there there was a difficulty in working out the principle which I should have endeavoured to apply to it with regard to certain rates and duties and so on. Here we are not embarrassed by that at all. This is a simple appointment to Edward George Saunders of this sum. It appears to me, on the true construction of this document, that the case of Banks v. Braithwaite and others like it, does not apply. Of course I see a difference between a legacy and an appointed fund. There is a rule about legacies that the costs come out of residue unless the contrary is expressed. As to a legacy, it is a little easier, because when you get the word "clear" or "net," there is nothing it can be applied to except the duties, and the expenses come out of the residue. That reasoning does not apply to an appointed fund. When you ask me what the meaning of "clear" or "net" is when applied to an appointed fund, I think, primâ facie, it means what it says—clear of everything. There may be reasons for not giving effect to it; there may be contests, there may be difficulties about various rates and duties, and all sorts of things. Here there is no difficulty at all. I cannot see any justification for saying that the net sum here means clear of the expense of raising it, but subject to something else. I think that is clear.

I think, therefore, the appeal must be allowed. The costs must come out of the last-appointed fund.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. It is a question of the construction of a deed of appointment under a special power. With regard to legacies the authorities have settled that where a legacy is given to one person so that only one rate of duty is payable, if the legacy given is of a clear sum of money the legatee takes free of duty. It is sufficient to refer to Haynes v. Haynes, 1 W. R. 204, 3 De G. M. & G. 590, for that proposition. There is undoubtedly some distinction between a legacy and a portion of a fund subject to a power of appointment. A legatee bears none of the expense of raising his legacy; that all falls on the general estate; and the legatee is entitled, where it is a legacy of £1,000, to his £1,000. In order to free him from the legacy duty, however, there must be words which show the intention, and the word which has been relied on here is "clear." I can make no distinction between "net sum" and "clear sum." In the case of an appointment where there are no words of expression to the contrary, all the appointees have to bear rateably, according to the general rule, the expenses of the trustees in regard to their administration of the fund, including the distribution. It might be said that the word "clear" or the word "net" in this instrument refers to those expenses only. I think it would be a very narrow construction. That is not the construction that was adopted by Kay, J., in In re Currie, 36 W. R. 752. There was there an appointment under a general power of appointment of so much of the trust funds as should be of the clear value of £1,000, and he held, and I agree with his reasoning, that that was an appointment of a sum of £1,000 clear of all the trustees' expenses, and clear also of the legacy or succession duty. I should say there is no distinction between legacy and succession duty in a case such as the present. That being so I refer to the words which the appointor has used. The appointment is not of a sum of money to be raised by the trustees by sale, it is an appointment of a portion of the trust funds. The trust funds, according to the statements agreed at the bar, were invested in ordinary trust investments and were liable to be changed from time to time under a power to vary securities. It is a portion of the trust fund thus invested that the appointor disposes of by one operation only. You are to ascertain (by reading the words) what the portion is, and that portion is itself given to the appointee.

Now, it appears to me on the true reading of this will that in ascertaining what portion is appointed you must, in accordance with the language used by the appointor, clear the portion from all charges, including succession duty—"so much of the stocks, &c., as shall be sufficient to raise the net sum of £2,000." That net sum of £2,000 is to be arrived at by excluding from the £2,000 the trustee's expenses and I think also succession duty. The case is not the same as that by which Stirling, J., considered himself bound—namely, Banks v. Braithwaite. Observations have already been made by the Master of the Rolls on that case, and I must confess that I myself should have arrived on the construction of that will at a different conclusion. The fund there of consols was set apart for one purpose only—namely, for the benefit of the annuitant, and subject to that the fund that was to be retained in consols was to go to the residuary legatee. The direction was to retain a sum of consols sufficient to realize the clear yearly income of £150, and then the trustees were directed to pay the dividends on that sum to the annuitant in the manner mentioned in the will. I think the whole object of the testator there was to provide a clear yearly income of £150 for the benefit of the annuitant. I understand the reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor; but I think it is too fine, if I may say so, to make it applicable to that case. Of course, the consols may have been converted and the rate of interest payable on the consols might by Act of Parliament have been subsequently reduced. It is, as I have said, a question of construction, and I think that the case is not governed by Banks v. Braithwaite, whatever may be said of that case, and that the true construction is that this appointed portion of the trust funds was clear of all charges and that we could not confine the word "net" merely to the expenses of the trustees.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question arises on the construction of words appearing in a particular appointment. The Master of the Rolls and Chitty, L.J., have already expressed very clear views as to what ought to be the construction of these words in this particular appointment. I cannot say that I myself am by any means as clear as they are as to what is the proper construction, but having regard to the fact that this is merely a question of the construction of the particular words in a particular document, I am not prepared to differ from that construction, merely because I hesitate about that which to them seems clear. However, I do wish to say a few words as to the difficulty that occurs to my mind in the construction of this document. The words are these. [His lordship read the appointment, and continued:] Now, the question to my mind to be answered is this: Ought the word "net" there to be annexed to the gift, or to what I agree is precisely the same thing, the measure of the gift; or ought it to be annexed to the raising of the sum? Is the word "net" to be treated as qualifying the quantity of stock with which the trustees were to deal, or is it to be read here as annexed to the gift to Edward George Saunders? Various authorities have been cited, but it seems to me that in this case, as indeed in every case, it is a dangerous thing to lay down any general rule as to the meaning of words of this sort. You must look always at the whole document, and ascertain what the meaning of the words is when you have taken the whole document into consideration. It is not safe to say there are authorities which decide that a "clear gift" means, in the case of a legacy, a gift clear of legacy duty.

No doubt very often, perhaps generally, in wills where there is a legacy given by such words, such would be the meaning of the word "clear," because there is nothing else which the gift in the nature of things can be clear of, and unless you give that meaning to the word "clear" you give no meaning to it at all. But even in the case of a legacy it is not quite true to say that it is universally so; for I take it that if you have got a legacy and the word "clear" used, it might very well be that you might find in the nature of the gift something to indicate that the word was not meant there to import clear of legacy duty, as, for instance, if the gift in question was an annuity given to a series of annuitants in succession. But in the present case the question arises at an earlier stage. The question, to my mind, is precisely the question which Kindersley, V.C., propounded to himself in the case of Banks v. Braithwaite, and which Stirling, J., propounded to himself in the present case—that is, is the word "net" here to be annexed to the gift, or is it to be annexed simply to the duty which the trustees had to perform? Is it here to be construed merely as qualifying the subject-matter with which the trustees were to deal as distinguished from the quantum of the gift? One can quite understand that very often you may get a collocation of words which would make it plain that the word "net" or "clear" is meant to qualify the gift—is meant to be annexed to the gift—as in a case where you have the two words "raise" and "pay" placed in immediate collocation. If the will or appointment says you are to raise and pay the clear sum of so much, I think it would be plain in such a case that this quality of "clear of deduction" is to apply not only to the sum to be raised, but also to the sum to be handed over or given to the donee. In the present case you have not got any words as clear as that, because so far as the English grammar is concerned the word "net" seems to me to be limited in its application to the sum to be raised, or rather to the amount of consols to be handed over, and not, as far as grammatical collocation is concerned, to apply to the amount which is to be transferred. Having said this because I have a very strong feeling as to the danger of deciding the meaning of particular words in a particular document by laying down any rule of universal application, I prefer to say that so far as my judgment is concerned I concur in the decision of the court, because I am not prepared to say that, having regard to the words of this particular document, the construction which the Master of the Rolls and Chitty, L.J., think is the right construction is not the right construction. These documents are very generally drawn by professional men, but, of course, occasionally they are drawn by laymen, and I do think that it is always a dangerous thing to conclude the construction of words in a particular document which may be under consideration by decisions that have been arrived at on similar words in other cases.

Chan. Div. } Stirling, J. } July 28, 29; Aug. 3; Nov. 17.

STOKES v. PRANCE. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Mortgage—Breach of trust—Fiduciary relationship—Guarantee.

A sum of £6,000 was advanced jointly on the security of a mortgage by the trustees of a will and a firm of solicitors. The investment was a breach of trust on the part of the trustees, and the solicitors, who were their legal advisers, failed to advise them that this was the case. The mortgage was taken in the names of one of the firm of solicitors and one of the trustees, and a memorandum was executed by the mortgagees to the effect that £3,000 belonged to the trustees and £3,000, the residue of the £6,000, to the solicitors. The solicitors also gave the trustees a guarantee of the sufficiency of the security. The solicitors subsequently went bankrupt, and an action was brought by the trustees claiming to be paid their £3,000 out of the mortgage security in priority to the solicitors or to any persons claiming under them.

Held, that the trustees were not entitled to any priority upon the construction of either the memorandum or the guarantee; that the investment by the trustees was a breach of trust on the part of the trustees; and that the solicitors, by failing to advise their clients that this was so, were guilty of a breach of trust towards them. Though the law imposes considerable disabilities on solicitors in dealing with their clients, yet, in the present instance, the solicitors were not seeking any benefit which was not in contemplation at the time of the transaction, and their only breach of duty was that they permitted their clients to invest trust money on insufficient security. Under these circumstances, though the solicitors might be answerable in damages, the clients were not entitled to any priority of payment out of the solicitors' security.

The object of this action was to obtain a declaration that the trustees of the will of Hester Stokes, deceased (of whom the plaintiffs were two, the third being one of the defendants, Frederick Pace Webb), were entitled to be paid a sum of £3,000 and interest thereon out of a mortgage debt of £6,000 and the securities for the same, in priority to all other persons claiming to be interested in the mortgage debt and securities; and to have the security realized and the proceeds applied in accordance with the declaration sought.

The mortgage in question bore date the 25th of March, 1864, and was made between John Ball, the mortgagor, of the one part, and John Bailey, the mortgagee, of the other part; and thereby two freehold farms in the parish of Uffculme, in the county of Devon, were conveyed by the mortgagor to the mortgagee in fee to secure the repayment of a sum of £6,000 with interest thereon at the rate of four-and-one-eighth per cent.

Both the mortgagor and the mortgagee died before December, 1876; and by a deed dated the 30th of December, 1876, the mortgage debt and security was transferred to the defendants Courtenay Connell Prance and Frederick Pace Webb as joint tenants in consideration of the payment by them of the sum of £6,000, stated to belong to the defendants Prance and Webb on a joint account. In reality the £6,000 was advanced as to £3,000 by the then trustees of the will of Hester Stokes—viz., Josiah Yeomans Robins, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, and Frederick Pace Webb, out of funds belonging to them as such trustees; and as to the remaining £3,000 by the firm of New, Prance, & Garrard (consisting of Herbert New, Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard), then carrying on business as solicitors and money scriveners at Evesham, out of their partnership assets.

Messrs. New, Prance, & Garrard acted on the occasion of this transfer as the solicitors of the Stokes trustees. Upon this occasion the following two documents, dated respectively the 1st and the 2nd of January, 1877, were executed:

"Memorandum. And we the undersigned, Courtenay Connell Prance, of Hatherley Court, Cheltenham, in the county of Gloucester, esquire; and Frederick Pace Webb, of Evesham, in the county of Worcester, civil engineer, do hereby ask and declare that the principal sum of £6,000, intended to be secured to us upon two estates situate in the parish of Uffculme, in the county of Devon, by virtue of an indenture of transfer of mortgage dated the 30th day of December, 1876, and expressed to be made between John Frederick Bailey and Benjamin Tyler Bailey of the first part, John Anstey Ball of the second part, and us, the said undersigned Courtenay Connell Prance and Frederick Pace Webb, of the third part, although expressed to be lent and advanced out of moneys belonging to us on a joint account, yet in truth and in fact the same belongs to the following persons and in the following proportions—that is to say, the sum of £3,000, part of the principal sum of £6,000, belongs to and is the proper money of Josiah Yeomans Robins, of Myrton House, near Warwick, esquire, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, of the county of Gloucester, banker, and myself, the said Frederick Pace Webb, as trustees of the will of the late Mrs. Hester Stokes, deceased. And the remaining sum of £3,000, the residue of the said principal sum of £6,000, belongs to and is the proper moneys of Herbert New, of Evesham, aforesaid, gentleman, myself, the said Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard, of Evesham, as aforesaid, gentleman. And we, the said Courtenay Connell Prance and Frederick Pace Webb do hereby severally declare that our names shall stand in the said indenture of mortgage as to the sum of £3,000, part of the said sum of £6,000, and the interest henceforth to become due for the same to the extent and after the rate of £4 per centum per annum, in trust for the said Josiah Yeomans Robins, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, and Frederick Pace Webb. And as to the further sum of £3,000 (residue of the said sum of £6,000) and the residue of the interest to become due and payable under the same indenture, in trust for the said Herbert New, Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard, and it is hereby agreed that the said indenture of mortgage and the deeds and documents connected with the said security shall remain in the custody and possession of the Gloucestershire Banking Co. at their branch at Evesham for the respective benefit and advantage of the trustees or trustee for the time being of the estate of the said Hester Stokes, deceased, and of the said Herbert New, Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard, or any person or persons claiming through, under, or in trust for them to the extent or in accordance with the terms of the present memorandum.

"Fred. P. Webb."

"Memorandum. Whereas by an indenture dated the 30th day of December, 1876, and made between John Frederick Bailey, gentleman, and Benjamin Tyler Bailey, wine and spirit merchant, of the first part; John Anstey Ball, yeoman, of the second part; and Courtenay Connell Prance, of Hatherley

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court, Cheltenham, esquire, and Frederick Pace Webb, of Evesham, civil engineer, of the third part. In consideration of the sum of £6,000 therein expressed to be lent and advanced to the said Courtenay Connell Prance and Frederick Pace Webb, out of moneys belonging to them on a joint account to or for the use or at the request of the said John Anstey Ball, certain farms, lands, and hereditaments situate at Uffculme, in the county of Devon, therein particularly described, were granted and conveyed unto and to the use of the said Courtenay Connell Prance and Frederick Pace Webb, their heirs and assigns, for ever. But, nevertheless, by way of mortgage only and for securing the payment by the said John Anstey Ball unto the said Courtenay Connell Prance and Frederick Pace Webb, their executors, administrators, or assigns, of the said sum of £6,000 and interest for the same after the rate of £4 2s. 6d. per centum per annum. And whereas the said sum of £6,000, although expressed to be advanced by the said Courtenay Connell Prance and Frederick Pace Webb out of moneys belonging to them on a joint account, yet in truth and in fact the same belongs as to the sum of £3,000 part thereof, to Josiah Yeomans Robins, of Myrton House, near Warwick, esquire, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, of the city of Gloucester, banker, and the said Frederick Pace Webb as trustees of the will of the late Mrs. Hester Stokes, deceased; and as to the further sum of £3,000, the residue of the said sum of £6,000, to Herbert New, of Evesham, aforesaid, gentleman, the said Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard, of Evesham, aforesaid, gentleman. And whereas the said Josiah Yeomans Robins, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, and Frederick Pace Webb advanced the said sum of £3,000 so belonging to them as aforesaid upon the recommendation of the said Herbert New, Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard, and upon the understanding that they would guarantee the sufficiency of the same security and the punctual payment of the interest thereof in manner hereafter appearing. And whereas the said Josiah Yeomans Robins, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, and Frederick Pace Webb have agreed to allow the said Herbert New, Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard to receive the interest from time to time to become due upon the said entire sum of £6,000 after the reserved rate of £4 2s. 6d. per cent. per annum, and to accept interest upon the said sum of £3,000 so due to them as aforesaid after the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, in consideration of the guarantee hereinafter contained. Now, these presents witness that in consideration of the premises they the said Herbert New, Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard do hereby guarantee unto the said Josiah Yeomans Robins, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, and Frederick Pace Webb the goodness and sufficiency of the aforesaid security for the said sum of £3,000, and the due and regular payment to them by even and general half-yearly payments of the interest to become due thereon after the reduced rate of £4 per cent. per annum. And, further, they do hereby also guarantee unto them, the said Josiah Yeomans Robins, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, and Frederick Pace Webb, the repayment of the said principal sum of £3,000, with all interest due thereon at any time upon receiving two calendar months' previous notice requiring payment thereof. And the said Josiah Yeomans Robins, Frederick Charles Jewsbury, and Frederick Pace Webb do hereby agree to the terms and conditions of the aforesaid guarantee, and to accept interest upon the said sum of £3,000 so due to them as aforesaid after the rate of £4 per cent. per annum; in consideration of the said Herbert New, Courtenay Connell Prance, and George Henry Garrard guaranteeing the principal and the punctual payment of the interest.

"Dated the 2nd day of January, 1877.

"(Signed) New, Prance, & Garrard.

"Frederick Pace Webb."

The subsequent history of the case was this:

In 1880 Messrs. New, Prance, & Garrard transferred their £3,000 and interest at 4 per cent. to Messrs. Jewsbury and New and Mrs. E. Smith, the executors and trustees of the will of Henry Smith, and a declaration was executed by Prance and Webb and a guarantee given by New, Prance, & Garrard in favour of Smith's trustees similar to the documents of the 1st and 2nd of January, 1877, in favour of the Stokes trustees. In both cases the consideration for the guaranty was the difference between four and four-and-one-eighth per cent. in the interest paid.

In October, 1886, the former Stokes trustees retired, and the plaintiff, A. A. Stokes, and Garrard were appointed trustees in their place, and the property was vested in the plaintiff and the defendant Webb. Jewsbury also retired from the Smiths' trust, and Prance was appointed in his place. Mr. Smith died about this time. A memorandum was drawn up in this month declaring that the £6,000 belonged as to £3,000 to Webb, Stokes, and Garrard, and as to the other £3,000 to New and Prance, the trustees of Smith, in almost identical terms with that of the 1st of January, 1877, except that the deeds were to remain in the custody of the trustees instead of being deposited with the Gloucester Banking Co. On this occasion the firm of New, Prance, & Garrard again acted as solicitors for the trustees.

On the 22nd of December, 1891, part of the sum of £3,000 was paid off by the Smith trustees. The said £3,000 was then made up as to £1,630 advanced by the defendant Mrs. Valentine (then Smith), and as to £1,370 advanced by New, Prance, & Garrard. By the indenture of that date made between Prance and Webb of the first part, New, Prance, & Garrard of the second part, and Mrs. Smith and Mr. Kilvert of the third part, this sum of £3,000 was treated as if New, Prance, & Garrard were the owners thereof, and then followed the declaration, "It is hereby agreed and declared that the said C. C. Prance and F. P. Webb shall continue and stand seized of and interested in the said messuages, farms, lands, and hereditaments comprised in and appointed, granted, released, and conveyed by the hereinbefore-recited indenture of mortgage and transfer, and possessed of the powers of the sale and other powers in the same indenture contained, for the protection, benefit, and advantage of the parties who now are or hereafter shall be interested in the said two moieties of £3,000 and £3,000 pari passu without any priority or preference other than the priority guaranteed by the said New, Prance, & Garrard to the transferees by these presents in respect of the said sum of £1,630 and the interest thereon over the said balance of £1,370 and the interest thereon." On the 28th of November, 1893, New, the senior partner in the firm, died. And on the 22nd of January, 1894, New, Prance, & Garrard were adjudicated bankrupts and the defendant West was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy. On the 24th of July, 1894, the plaintiff Whitfield was appointed a trustee of the will of Hester Stokes in the place of Garrard. The persons now interested therefore in the £6,000 which was still due and owing were Prance and Webb, the plaintiffs, the trustees of Hester Stokes, to the extent of £3,000; the defendants Valentine and Kilvert to the extent of £1,630; and the defendant West, as trustee in bankruptcy of the firm of New, Prance, & Garrard, to the extent of the residue of the £3,000. The mortgage had not been realized, but it was admitted by all parties to be insufficient for the security of £6,000.

M. S. Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Eastwick, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to the relief claimed: In re Moore, Moore v. Johnson, 33 W. R. 447; In re Foster, Lloyd v. Carr, 39 W. R. 31, 45 Ch. D. 629. These cases show that there must be apportionment between principal and interest. Webb v. Jonas, 36 W. R. 666, 39 Ch. D. 660, and In re Massingberd's Settlement, 63 L. T. Rep. 296. 39 W. R. Dig. 242, show that to invest on a contributory mortgage in such a case as this is a breach of trust. As against New, Prance, & Garrard and all persons claiming under them we are entitled to pay ourselves first out of this fund, which must be taken as a mortgage security. A solicitor will not be allowed by the court to take any benefit to himself to the prejudice of the trust estate for a transaction which was a breach of trust and which he himself advised: Segrave v. Kirwan, Beatt. 157. That was a case of a counsel in a fiduciary relation. See also, Bulkley v. Wilford, 8 Bli. N. S. 111, 2 Cl. & F. 102; Horan v. McMahon, 17 L. R. Ir. 641, 35 W. R. Dig. 71; In re Birt, Birt v. Burt, 31 W. R. 334, 22 Ch. D. 604. Assuming that the position of a solicitor precludes one from receiving any benefit—In re Snell, 25 W. R. 823, 6 Ch. D. 105—so that they cannot set up a claim against their own clients, it may be said that they did not know what was being done. It must be taken, however, that they did not inform the trustees: Donaldson v. Haldane, 7 Cl. & F. 762. But apart from the fiduciary relation they cannot, having given a guarantee, say that the funds are insufficient: Burton Real Property, 7th ed., p. 190. It is a breach of the obligation: Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604; Wolverhampton, &c., Railway v. London and North-Western Railway Co., L. R. 16 Eq. 433, 22 W. R. Dig. 118. It is a primary principle of specific performance: Piggott v. Stratton, 8 W. R. 13, 1 De G. F. & J. 33. It will be suggested that the document of the 22nd of December, 1891, contained a declaration that the property was held in equal shares by the persons entitled to the £6,000. If that is sought to be relied on it would be attempting to obtain a title from a trustee through a breach of trust: Priddy v. Rose, 3 Mer. 86; Roxburghe v. Cox, 30 W. R. 74, 17 Ch. D. 520; Harpman v. Shacklock, 30 W. R. 49, 19 Ch. D. 207.

W. C. Dauney, for the defendant Webb.

W. C. Prance, for the defendant Prance.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Badcock, for defendants Valentine and Kilvert, submitted there was no case for priority. As to a solicitor not being allowed to get any benefit, the cases are confined to those of fiduciary relations: Segrave v. Kirwan. Here the solicitors never got anything out of it. In Bulkley v. Wilford the solicitor got the testator's property by reason of his neglect of duty. Horan v. McMahon is to the same effect. In re Snell, In re Birt, and Donaldson v. Haldane are also distinguished. As to the guaranty we rely on Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman, 39 W. R. 433, [1891] 2 Ch. 416, which was a case of affirmative covenant, and the claim was absolutely unsustainable.

J. R. Brooke, for the defendant West, substantially adopted this argument. He cited Baker v. Palmer, 2 Ch. 540; Mara v. Browne, 44 W. R. 330, [1896] 1 Ch. 199.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., in reply.—Mara v. Browne is not like the present case.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 17.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts as above, and continued: The plaintiffs' claim to priority in respect of the £3,000 to which they and the defendant Webb are entitled is based on three grounds—first, the memoranda of the 1st of January, 1877, and the 8th of October, 1886; second, the guarantee of the 2nd of January, 1877; and thirdly, on considerations arising out of the fiduciary relationship which existed between New, Prance, & Garrard and the Stokes trustees.

First, as to the memoranda of the 1st of January, 1877, and the 8th of October, 1886. It is said that these documents, when properly construed, create a priority in respect of the plaintiffs' £3,000 over the other portion of the total mortgage debt of £6,000, by reason of the use of the word "residue." It may be admitted that these documents do not contain all the clauses introduced into such instruments by the most cautious of conveyancers, and are not so explicit as the document of the 22nd of December, 1891, executed in favour of Mrs. Smith and Mr. Kilvert; but still I cannot bring myself to think that the meaning of them is open to serious doubt. It is thereby declared that the £6,000 "belongs to the following persons and in the following proportions," that is to say, the sum of £3,000, part of the said principal sum of £6,000, belongs to and is the property of the Stokes trustees, "and the remaining sum of £3,000, the residue of the said principal sum of £6,000, belongs to and is the property of" New, Prance, & Garrard. "Residue" there means the arithmetical remainder after deducting £3,000 from £6,000, and it would be entirely inconsistent with the use of the word "proportion" to read the clause as declaring that the first-mentioned £3,000 belonged to the Stokes trustees, and that subject thereto the balance of the £6,000 belonged to New, Prance, & Garrard. The like meaning is plainly attributable to the word "residue" in the declaration of trust as regards the principal. There may be a little more difficulty as to the meaning of the word "residue" when used with reference to the interest, but it seems to me to be used in the same sense as that already mentioned—viz., the arithmetical remainder after deducting from the amount of interest on £6,000 at 4⅛ per cent., the amount of interest on £3,000 at 4 per cent. This mode of expression appears to me to have been adopted from the desire to preserve to the firm of New, Prance, & Garrard the one-eighth per cent. which constituted the consideration for the guarantee. It cannot fairly be read as giving any priority.

Secondly, as to the guarantee of the 2nd of January, 1877. That document contains a guarantee by New, Prance, & Garrard of the goodness and sufficiency of the security; and it is said that, having given such a guarantee, neither they nor anyone claiming under them can put forward any demand which would result in rendering the security bad and insufficient, or any arrangement whereby they themselves would profit. The answer is that no such claim is made. The plaintiffs' security is one-half of the mortgage debt of £6,000 and the securities for it. To that half the defendants who claim under New, Prance, & Garrard assert no title, they merely seek the benefit of the other half of the mortgage debt and securities which is not comprised in the plaintiffs' security at all. The guarantee does not purport to charge the plaintiffs' £3,000 on any property of New, Prance, & Garrard; it is simply a personal contract by the firm, on which the plaintiffs will no doubt be entitled to prove in the bankruptcy, but which does not give the plaintiffs any rights against from the specific property now in question.

Thirdly, on this point the argument is that the investment of £3,000 on the security of the 30th of December, 1876, was a breach of trust, that Messrs. New, Prance, & Garrard advised this breach of trust, and that they and all persons claiming under them are precluded from taking any benefit to themselves from the transaction to the prejudice of the trust estate.

Unquestionably Messrs. New, Prance, & Garrard advised the investment; according to the recital in the memorandum of the 2nd of January, 1877, the Stokes trustees advanced the £3,000 upon their recommendation. They were the legal advisers of the trustees in the matter; and as such it was their duty to see that the security was adequate in point of value and in point of form. That duty, in my judgment, they failed to discharge.

As regards the value, according to the rule of the court then and now in force, there ought to have been a margin of one-third over and above the sum advanced; that is to say, as the total advance was £6,000 the value of the mortgaged property ought to have been £9,000. Mr. Prance, indeed, in his evidence, appeared to be of opinion that such a rule did not exist in 1876; if at that time his view of the law was such as he seemed desirous of having it supposed to be, one can only say that casts some reflection on his qualification to advise trustees on such a matter. It is not suggested that any valuation was made previously to the advance. Mr. Prance said: "I must have told Jewsbury and Robins that it was a satisfactory security, and they accepted the security on my recommendation." The property was purchased by the original mortgagor in 1864 for £6,900. Mr. Prance says it was a bargain at that price and was really worth more; he says that if Ball had had t, it would have been worth £9,000 in spite of the times. But that was mere speculation. It was put up for sale in 1878; it was expected to realize £7,500, but a small part only was sold at the price of £530. In 1885 it was valued by the defendant Webb at £6,370. In 1890 it was again put up for sale, the reserve being £7,000, but was not sold. There is no evidence to satisfy me that the mortgaged property was in 1876 or at any other time of a value at all approaching £9,000. In arriving at that conclusion I lay no stress on the guarantee given by Messrs. New, Prance, & Garrard which might seem to suggest the existence of doubt on the part of someone as to the value of the security. I am willing to accept Mr. Prance's explanation that the giving of it was in accordance with the common practice of the office.

The form of the security is not more satisfactory. The trust security ought to have been taken in the names of the trustees: In re Massingberd's Settlement. Here the legal title was vested in two persons, one of whom was an entire stranger to the Stokes trust.

In my opinion the investment was on both grounds a breach of trust. I also think that in omitting to advise the trustees this was so, Messrs. New, Prance, & Garrard were guilty of a breach of duty to the Stokes trustees, their clients. For this, but for their bankruptcy, they might be answerable in damages to their clients, and proof may possibly be admissible in the bankruptcy; but under ordinary circumstances they would not have been responsible to the cestui que trust as for a breach of trust: see Barnes v. Addy, 22 W. R. 505, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 244.

It is said, however, that the law prevents them from taking any benefit from their own security to the disadvantage of their own clients, the Stokes trustees. Undoubtedly the law imposes considerable disabilities on solicitors in their dealings with clients. Thus, if a solicitor employed to prepare a legal instrument so frames it that he obtains (even indirectly) a benefit under it, a court of equity will not permit him to retain it unless he can show that he clearly and distinctly pointed out to the client that the advantage actually gained might result from the transaction; and this holds good whether the instrument was or was not designed to produce such a consequence, or whether the solicitor was or was not aware of the true legal effect of the instrument: see Segrave v. Kirwan, Beatt. 157; Bulkley v. Wilford, 8 Bli. N. S. 111, 2 Cl. & Fin. 102; Horan v. Macmahon, 17 L. R. Ir. 641. In such cases the solicitor is treated as trustee of any interest he may acquire under the instrument for the persons on whom it would have devolved if the instrument had not been executed. Again, a solicitor taking for value a security from his own client cannot take advantage of any unusual provisions introduced into it unless he can establish that he gave the client such advice as would have come from an independent solicitor: see Cockburn v. Edwards, 30 W. R. 446, 18 Ch. D. 449. There are also cases which show that a solicitor will not be allowed to assert independent rights of his own in a way inconsistent with a duty undertaken to the client. Thus, in Re Birt the defendant in an administration action and legal personal representative of the testator, was one of the firm of solicitors who acted for the plaintiff. After the plaintiff had obtained an order for a receiver, but before the receiver had perfected his security, the defendant received assets. It was held that he could not, as against the plaintiff, assert the right of retainer which he otherwise would have had. Against these decisions there is not a word to be said; but in each of them the solicitor was claiming in some shape or form a benefit or advantage as against the client which that client never intended to confer.

The argument on behalf of the plaintiffs in the present case invites me to go much further than any previous decision. The transaction contemplated in 1876 was the advance of £6,000 in two sums of £3,000 each—one by the Stokes trustees, the other by their solicitors—on a security in respect of which, as it seems to me, they were to stand on a footing of equality. The instruments by which the transaction was carried into effect are apt for the purpose, and contain no unusual provisions, certainly none to the disadvantage of the trustees. The benefit acquired by the solicitors is one which was within the contemplation of all parties at the time; and nothing could be urged against the solicitors if, unfortunately, the clients had not been trustees, and had not been involved in a breach of trust. Still that is not, in my opinion, a sufficient ground for declaring the solicitors to be trustees, either in whole or in part, of the £3,000 advanced by themselves or of the security they bargained for on the occasion. There is no breach of duty on their part in acquiring or setting up such a security; their default lies in permitting the clients to advance money on the security which the clients actually got. For that the solicitors, as I have said, may be answerable to their clients in damages, but it does not, in my judgment, authorize me to declare the clients entitled to be paid out of the security in priority to those who now represent the solicitors.

In re INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY OF AUCTIONEERS AND VALUERS.
BAILLIE'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Contributory—Removal of name—Fraud—Mistake as to identity of company—Contract in writing.

Where a person is fraudulently induced to take shares in a company by reason of the misrepresentation that it is another company of very similar name, there is no contract at all, and he is entitled to have his name removed from the list of contributories in the winding up, though he has taken no steps to repudiate his shares before the company was wound up.

Cundy v. Lindsay, 26 W. R. 406, 3 App. Cas. 459, followed.

This was a summons by Baillie that his name might be removed from the list of contributories of the above-named company. The company was unlimited, and was originally incorporated under the name of the Institute of Auctioneers and Valuers, but that name was changed in consequence of proceedings taken by the Auctioneers' Institute of the United Kingdom, both societies having their addresses in Chancery-lane. Previous to November, 1895, Baillie had applied to the Auctioneers' Institute with a view of becoming a fellow of that society. In November, 1895, one of the officers of the liquidating society called on him and asked him if he still cared to join the Institute and showed him the prospectus of the International Society. Baillie enquired if this was "the Auctioneers' Institute," and being told that it was he consented to join and took shares in the International society. He had before this enquired if the liability was limited and had been informed that it was. When the share certificates were sent to him he saw that the word "limited" was not added to the name of the society (it being, in fact, a company with unlimited liability), he returned the certificates pointing this out, and stating that if it was an unlimited company he would resign, but the certificates were returned to him with the word "limited" written in in manuscript with a letter stating that the word had been left out by a printer's error, and also stating that the Institute had been in existence for many years. On the faith of these statements Baillie retained his membership of the society.

A winding-up order was made against the company on the 7th of December, 1896, and Baillie was included in the list of contributories. He thereupon took out this summons.

Heber Hart, for the applicant.—Here there never was a contract; the whole transaction is void: Buckley, 7th ed., p. 136. If a man is induced by misrepresentations, it does not matter if the name is correct if he is deceived: Cundy v. Lindsay. If A. contracts with B. under the impression that he is C. there is no contract: Boulton v. Jones, 2 H. & N. 564.

Clauson, for the official receiver and liquidator.—The contract was in writing, and therefore Cundy v. Lindsay does not apply. The company's name was on the top of the forms it is now too late for Baillie to say that he was deceived. The law as to repudiation is summed up in In re Scottish Petroleum Co., 31 W. R. 846, 23 Ch. D. 413.

Hart, in reply.—The principal in In re Scottish Petroleum Co. is not applicable to a case like this: McNiell's case, 18 W. R. 1102, L. R. 10 10 Eq. 503.

Dec. 3.—WRIGHT, J.—[His lordship first stated the facts of the case, and continued:] The question is whether Baillie is to be allowed to repudiate these shares. This case seems to be similar to Cundy v. Lindsay, 26 W. R. 406, 3 App. Cas. 459; the circumstances show that this contract was void ab initio, not one which was voidable on account of the misrepresentations made to him—in other words, that there was no contract at all. When Baillie applied he thought that he was applying for and getting shares in the old Auctioneers' Institute, and those who were acting for the liquidating company knew that he thought so, and deliberately deceived him. That being so, he is entitled to the relief he claims. But it has been argued that the observations in Cundy v. Lindsay do not apply here, as there it was a verbal contract, and here, the contract being in writing, it is not possible for Baillie to deny it. But in Cundy v. Lindsay there appeared to have been a so-called contract in writing, but whether that was so or not, the principle of the case applies, and here there was no contract in writing because there was no contract at all. The applicant is therefore entitled to the relief which he claims.

In re PIXTON AND TONG'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Devise of real estate upon trust to trustees, their heirs and assigns—Power of sale to the "trustees for the time being" under a will—Executors of surviving trustee—Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 30.

A testator devised his real estate to certain trustees, their heirs and assigns, upon certain trusts, and the will contained a power of sale of real estate exercisable "by the trustees for the time being" under the will.

Held, that the power of sale was exercisable by the executors of the last surviving trustee.

This was a summons in the Manchester District Registry by certain purchasers under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for a declaration that the respondents, the vendors, were not entitled to convey in fee the hereditaments comprised in the contract of sale.

Two objections were taken by the purchasers, but only one of them calls for a report.

The facts of the case were as follows:

William Hampson, of Breightmet Hall, Breightmet, in the county of Lancaster, by his will dated 19th of June, 1850, subject to the payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, devised all his real estate unto and to the use of his wife and his daughter Mary and his sons William Richard Hamer, John, and Daniel, their heirs and assigns, upon trust to permit his wife during her life to have the use and enjoyment of his freehold messuage, wherein he resided at Breightmet aforesaid, with the garden and appurtenances, and subject thereto in trust for all his children in equal shares. And after certain other provisions the will continued: "I declare that the trustees for the time being under this my will shall have power to sell all or any part or parts of my said real estate and any share and shares therein."

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator appointed his said trustees to be executrixes and executors of his will.

The testator died the 12th of October, 1851, and his will was duly proved by his widow and his son William.

The testator left ten children, all of whom attained the age of twenty-one years.

The widow died the 5th of May, 1869; the daughter Mary died the 6th of March, 1878; William died the 12th of July, 1884; John died the 15th of April, 1880; and Daniel on the 3rd of September, 1889.

Richard Hamer Hampson, who died the 13th of May, 1892, by his will appointed the respondents John Sutcliffe Pixton and Edward Boutflower his executors, who, after his decease, duly proved his will and acted as trustees of the will of William Hampson.

On the 26th of February, 1897, the respondents entered into a contract with the applicants for the sale of certain hereditaments forming part of the real estate of William Hampson.

The applicants objected that as the respondents were not trustees of the William Hampson, they could not exercise the power of sale.

A. E. Milne, for the applicants.—The will contains a power, not a trust, for sale exercisable only by the trustees for the time being thereof. A power for sale differs from a trust for sale, and section 30 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, will not enable the executors of the last surviving trustee to convey. That section applies only in cases where formerly the heir could have conveyed: In re Ingleby, 13 L. R. Ir. 326; Cunningham v. Frayling, 39 W. R. 469, [1891] 2 Ch. 567.

Stewart Smith, for the respondents.—The will contains a devise of the testator's real estate to the trustees, their heirs and assigns. Before the Conveyancing Act the heir of the surviving trustee would have held the property as a trustee. The executors of the last surviving trustee are in the place of the heir under section 30 of the Conveyancing Act.

He referred to Dart's Vendors and Purchasers of Real Estates, 5th ed., p. 608; In re Rumney and Smith, 45 W. R. 678, [1897] 2 Ch. 351. [In the course of the argument Byrne, J., referred to Morton v. Hallett, 28 W. R. 895, 15 Ch. D. 143; Osborne to Rowlett, 28 W. R. 365, 13 Ch. D. 774.]

Byrne, J.—I am of opinion that under section 30 of the Conveyancing Act the power of sale is exercisable by the respondents as personal representatives of the last surviving trustee of the will of William Hampson. Declaration accordingly.

Q. B. Div.
(Hawkins and Channell, JJ.) Dec. 9.

Knowles & Sons (Limited) (Appellants) v. Sinclair (Respondent). (a.)

Weights and measures—Coal—Sale—Ticket—"Correct weight"—Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), s. 22, sub-sections 1 and 2.

Section 22 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, provides that, where coal exceeding two-hundredweight is conveyed for delivery on sale in a vehicle not belonging to the purchaser, the "correct weight" of the vehicle and of the coal shall be inserted in the ticket which is to be given by the seller to the purchaser.

Held, that the "correct weight" means the correct weight as previously ascertained at the place from which the coal is brought, and not the weight at the time of the delivery of the coal.

Case stated by justices for the county of Lancaster.

The appellants are colliery proprietors, and the respondent is an inspector of weights and measures.

An information was laid by the respondent against the appellants under section 22, sub-section 2, of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, for having inserted in the ticket required by the Act to be given by the seller of coal to the purchaser a false statement of the weight of the vehicle, contrary to the provisions of that sub-section. The information was in the first instance laid under section 22, sub-section 1, for not having caused the tare weight of the vehicle to be marked thereon, but at the hearing the summons was amended into a summons under sub-section 2, and the conviction was under sub-section 2.

A police-constable, an assistant to the inspector, proved that he met the appellant's cart loaded with coal, and that he followed it to a house and there saw the coal delivered, and a ticket at the same time delivered to the purchaser of the coal by the appellants' carter, which ticket showed the appellants' horse and cart to weigh 29 cwts.; that he then took the horse and cart to the weighing machine at the railway station, and there caused them to be weighed, when the weight was shown to be 28 cwts., 3 qrs., or a difference of 28 lbs. (in favour of the purchaser) between the weight shown upon the ticket and that registered by the machine at the station; and that the cart was not weighed apart from the horse.

There was no dispute as to facts, which were taken as above stated.

It was contended for the appellants that they had not committed any offence under sub-section 2 of section 22, as the difference between the weight shown on the ticket and that registered by the machine, was to be accounted for by the weight of the horse varying.

The justices convicted the appellants of an offence under section 22, sub-section 2, and imposed a fine of 20s. and 10s. 6d. costs.

The question for the court was whether the justices were right in so convicting the appellants.

The Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21) enacts: Section 21. (1) "Where any quantity of coal exceeding two hundredweight is delivered by means of any vehicle to a purchaser, the seller of the coal shall therewith deliver, or cause to be delivered, or to be sent by post or otherwise, to the purchaser or to his servant, before any part of the coal is unloaded, a ticket or note according to the form in the third schedule to this Act, or according to a form to the like effect."

Section 22. (1) "Where any quantity of coal exceeding two hundredweight is conveyed for delivery on sale in a vehicle in bulk, the seller of the coal shall, unless the vehicle is provided by the purchaser, cause the weight of the vehicle, as well as of the coal contained therein, to be previously ascertained by a weighing instrument stamped by the inspector of weights and measures, and being on or near to the place from which the coal is brought, and shall from time to time cause the tare weight of the vehicle to be marked thereon in such manner as the local authority approve"; (2) "In any such case the seller of the coal shall insert, or cause to be inserted in the ticket required by this Act to be given by him a statement of the correct weight of the vehicle, or of the vehicle and the animal drawing it, where both are weighed together with the load, as well as of the correct weight of the coal contained in the vehicle."

Then section 27 provides that the seller or purchaser may require that the coal, or the vehicle used for the carriage of the coal in bulk, may be weighed or re-weighed, with the proviso that where the weighing or re-weighing has been at the instance of the purchaser, the purchaser shall pay the costs of the re-weighing if the results be found correct; and the form of the ticket in the schedule provides that the weight of the coal and vehicle, the tare weight of the vehicle, and the net weight of the coal delivered, shall be given in the ticket.

T. W. Chitty, for the appellants.—In the first place it cannot be said to be an offence within the Act to give too much coal, as the appellants did in this case. The Act was intended to protect the purchaser, and there can be no offence within the Act unless the purchaser is defrauded; it was not intended to make the seller liable to penalties for giving too much coal. In the second place there is no evidence here that an incorrect weight was inserted in the ticket. What has to be inserted in the ticket is the statement of the "correct weight," under sub-section 2 of section 22, and the "correct weight" is the weight which has been ascertained previous to the cart going out with the coal, as required by sub-section 1 of section 22. The "correct weight," therefore, which is to be inserted in the ticket is the weight which is correct at the time the cart is sent out, and not the weight which is correct at the time of delivery to the purchaser. If the purchaser is not satisfied with this statement in the ticket, then he can, by section 27, require a re-weighing. There was no evidence that the weights in the ticket were incorrect at the time the cart was sent out, and therefore this conviction cannot be supported.

Lorhais, for the respondent.—The weight to be a "correct weight" must be a weight which is correct at the time the coal is delivered to the purchaser. It is not enough that the weight should be correct at the time the vehicle is sent out; it must be correct at the time when the ticket is delivered to the purchaser—that is, when the coal is delivered to him.

HAWKINS, J.—I think that this conviction ought to be quashed. [His lordship read section 21, sub-section 1, section 22, sub-section 1, and the form of the ticket given in the third schedule.] Reading these two sections together it is clear to my mind that the ticket is to be delivered containing the particulars which are required by the form of ticket in the third schedule to be prepared and sent out by post, or, at the option of the seller, delivered to the carman to be handed over by him to the purchaser before any part of the coal is delivered. The weighing and the amount of the weighing which is to be included in that ticket, and the particulars of it, are to be ascertained by a weighing-machine stamped by the inspector near to the place from which the coal is brought. That is the obligation cast upon the seller, and I entertain no doubt that the object of the Legislature in those two sections was that the weighing of the coal should take place practically at the place from which the coal came, and that the ticket with these two weights inserted therein should be sent to the purchaser in order that he might have them before him at the time the coal is delivered. I am satisfied it was never contemplated that there should be a ticket of that sort sent in the morning and another ticket delivered in the afternoon. I think the ticket that is to be delivered is that mentioned in section 21 as the result of the weighing in section 22; and there is no proof that the ticket was erroneous in any respect at the time it was made out. I think that all the preliminaries that are required by the statute to be gone through before the coal was delivered were regularly carried out. A ticket was sent; a weight was put upon it, and there is no suggestion that the coal was not actually weighed; and it would be a strong thing for us to say that there is proof that the weights as recorded upon the ticket were false when there is not a particle of evidence to suggest that. I am of opinion that there was no evidence at all to support this conviction, and upon that ground the conviction ought to be quashed.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is clear, for the reasons stated, that the magistrates were wrong in convicting. The enactment is that the seller shall weigh both the coal and the vehicle and the horse, and that he shall do so beforehand; then that he shall send the particulars of the previous weighing, at which the purchaser is not present, to the purchaser Then the purchaser gets his coal, and then he uses his own judgment whether it is worth while to exercise the right which he has under section 27, of having the coal re-weighed. If he gets the coal re-weighed and if the re-weighing goes against him then he has to pay the costs. If the "correct weight" does not mean the correct weight as ascertained at that previous weighing, then I think it would follow that it would not be an offence if the incorrectness were in favour of the purchaser and against the seller. I think the "correct weight" means the correct weight as ascertained at the place where the weighing has to take place before the delivery is made. I think, therefore, that this conviction is bad, and the simplest course is to quash it instead of incurring further expense about this 28lbs. of coal over-delivered.

BAGLEY (Appellant) v. BUTCHER AND ANOTHER (Respondents). (a.)

Election law—Registration—Occupiers' list of voters—Qualification described as "dwelling-house joint"—Sufficiency of—Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), ss. 3, 6, 27—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 3), ss. 2, 5.

In Division I. of the occupiers' list of voters in a county, the description of a voter's qualification was entered as "dwelling-house joint." A notice of objection that the voter's qualification was "expressly forbidden by law" had been duly given. The voter had not made either a new claim or a statutory declaration to amend the entry. The qualifying property was in fact a dwelling-house inhabited by the voter jointly with others, the annual value of which was more than sufficient to give £10 a year to each occupant.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (reversing the revising barrister), that the objection should be disallowed, as the description of the qualification was sufficient to describe an occupation qualification.

Townshend v. St. Marylebone Overseers, 20 W. R. 148, L. R. 7 C. P. 143, followed and approved.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the Eastern Division of the county of Wilts.

The names of the first five persons in the schedule hereto appeared as voters on Division I. of the occupiers' list of voters for the parish of Preshute, and the names of the last two persons in the schedule appeared as voters on Division I. of the occupiers' list for the parish of Pewsey.

In each instance in the third column the nature of the qualification was stated to be "dwelling-house joint."

All the seven persons had been duly objected to, the wording of the objection being "that the nature of your qualification is expressly forbidden by law."

In support of the objection it was contended that "dwelling-house joint" was bad in law under the terms of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 3—extended to counties by 48 & 49 Vict. c. 3, s. 2—at the end of which section it is enacted: "Provided that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling-house." Also that in the absence of a new claim, to amend the entry in the overseers' list, or of a statutory declaration under section 24 of 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, no amendment of the third column could be made.

No amending claim had been made, nor was there any statutory declaration, nor was the revising barrister asked to make any amendment.

Against the objection it was contended that "dwelling-house joint" was a good description in law of the qualification, and the cases of Townshend v. St. Marylebone Overseers, 20 W. R. 148, L. R. 7 C. P. 143, and Druitt v. Gossling 58 L. J. Q. B. 109, Fox & Smith Reg. Cas. 123, 37 W. R. Dig. 76, were relied on, and also the Registration Order, 1895, schedule 2, paragraph 8 (ii.) and paragraph 7.

In each instance the dwelling-house was used only as a residence, and was of more than sufficient value to give £10 a year annual value to each joint occupier.

The revising barrister decided that the objection was good in each instance, and he accordingly expunged the names of the seven persons in the schedule from Division I. of the occupiers' list of voters.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the revising barrister was right or wrong in his decision. If he was right the register was to remain as revised by him; if he was wrong, the names scheduled were to be restored to the register.

The schedule was as follows:

Parish of Preshute—Occupiers' List—Division I.

1. Hussey, Christopher—Clatford—Dwelling-house joint—Clatford House.
2. Hussey, John—Clatford—Dwelling-house joint—Clatford House.
3. Hussey, William—Clatford—Dwelling-house joint—Clatford House.
4. Taylor, Alexander—Manton Down—Dwelling-house joint—Manton House.
5. Taylor, Thomas—Manton Down—Dwelling-house joint—Manton House.

Parish of Pewsey—Occupiers' List—Division I.

6. Dixon, Charles—Pewsey—Dwelling-house joint Southcott.
7. Dixon, Henry—Pewsey—Dwelling-house joint—Southcott.

W. Graham, for the appellant.—The only objection taken here was that the qualification "dwelling-house joint" was forbidden by law. No other objection was taken, and none other can be taken now. In dealing with this objection it is necessary to refer back to the Reform Act, 1832. Section 27 of that Act gave the borough franchise to occupiers, whether as owners or tenants of any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building of the annual value of £10; and section 29 contained provisions as to joint occupiers of any such premises in a borough, and gave the borough franchise to any such joint occupiers in case the value of the premises was such as to give a sum not less than £10 to every such occupier when divided amongst them. So the law stood until 1867, when the Representation of the People Act, 1867, in section 3, gave the household franchise in boroughs to "every inhabitant occupier, as owner or tenant, of any dwelling-house within the borough"; but subject to the proviso at the end of the section, "that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling-house"; and section 6 gave the occupation franchise in counties to occupiers of £12 rateable value, which has been reduced to £10 by section 5 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884. Section 27 of the Act of 1867 dealt with joint occupation in counties, providing that where premises were in the joint occupation of several persons and the aggregate value was such as, if divided amongst them, would, as to value, give each a vote, then each should have a vote, subject to this proviso that not more than two persons, being such joint occupiers, should be registered unless they came within the classes mentioned in the proviso. Then the Act of 1884 provided, in section 2, for a uniform household franchise in boroughs and counties, and established for both counties and boroughs the same household qualification; and section 5 assimilated the occupation qualification in counties and boroughs, providing that "every man occupying any land or tenement in a county or borough of a clear yearly value of not less than £10" should be entitled to be registered. The point raised in this case was raised and decided in the cases of Townshend v. St. Marylebone Overseers, and Druitt v. Gossling. In Townshend's case, decided in 1871, where the qualification of a person on the list of voters for a borough was described as "dwelling-house," and the voter proved such a joint occupation of a dwelling-house as amounted to a qualification in respect of a "house" under sections 27 and 29 of the Act of 1832, it was held (Brett, J., dissenting) that the qualification was sufficient. [He was stopped.]

Lewis Thomas, for the respondent.—The qualification stated in the schedule is "dwelling-house joint," and it is found as a fact that the house in each case was used as a residence only. By section 20 of the Act of 1832 there was (amongst other qualifications in counties), the qualification of occupation as a tenant of any lands or tenements of a rental of £50 a year; and that remained the qualification for occupiers with value until 1867. By section 6 of the Act of 1867 this qualification was reduced to £12 rateable value, and by section 3 a new qualification as to boroughs was introduced—namely, a household franchise to every "inhabitant occupier, as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house," and that section contains the proviso that "no man shall under the section be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling-house." Under the Act of 1867 there were thus two occupation qualifications, the £12 occupation of "lands or tenements" in a county, and the household qualification in boroughs. The Act of 1884 created a uniform occupation franchise in counties and boroughs. Section 2 of that Act in addition extended the household franchise to counties, and section 5 extended the £12 occupation franchise to boroughs, reducing the value from £12 to £10. So that from and after 1884 we have the two distinct occupation qualifications in both counties and boroughs—namely, the £10 occupation qualification for occupiers of any land or tenement in either county or borough, and the household qualification for every inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house in either county or borough. These two qualifications are absolutely distinct from each other; for one a certain value is required, but for the other no value whatever is required. The claim in the present case is in respect of a dwelling-house—that is, it is a claim under section 3 of the Act of 1867 for the dwelling-house or household franchise, and being a claim under that section it comes within the proviso forbidding joint occupiers of a dwelling-house to claim. Therefore the claim "dwelling-house joint" is a claim expressly forbidden by law. Townshend v. St. Marylebone is a different case from the present, as the claim there was not in respect of a "dwelling-house joint," but was a claim good on the face of it; whereas here the claim is bad on the face of it. I admit that if the claim had been in the form "house and land joint," or "house and garden joint," it would have been good: Druitt v. Gossling.

He also referred to the Registration Order, 1895, schedule 2, paragraphs 7 (ii), and 8 (ii.); Rogers, vol. 1., p. 642. And Lord Russell, C.J., referred to paragraph 19 (4) of that Order; ib. 646.

W. Graham, in reply, referred to Bradley v. Baylis, 30 W. R. at p. 830, 8 Q. B. D. at p. 231.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—We have here to deal with the point presented to us as it is presented to us, and we cannot consider objections which might have been taken before the revising barrister, but which were not taken. The short point in the case is this: There is an entry on the occupiers' list disclosing the qualification of persons on that list as "dwelling-house joint," and the question is whether we are bound to treat that as a claim for the household franchise, in which case it would be bad, or whether we may treat it as a claim for the occupation franchise. It seems to me that the question is settled by authority—namely, the decision in Townshend v. St. Marylebone—which covers, and covers completely, this case; and that decision is supported by the later case of Druitt v. Gossling. Then, in the case cited by Mr. Graham of Bradley v. Baylis, Lord Esher, who dissented from the other members of the court which decided the case of Townshend v. St. Marylebone, considered the decision in that case as bearing the meaning placed upon it by us, that where there is a qualification stated which may in fact be supported under the Act of 1832, the mere fact that the word "dwelling-house" is used, whether with or without the word joint, will not prevent the claim being a good claim for a qualification other than the household franchise. Darling, J., has called my attention to the case of Ford v. Boon (20 W. R. 251, L. R. 7 C. P. 150), where the case of Townshend v. St. Marylebone was again referred to by Brett, J., who there says (L. R. 7 C. P., at p. 156): "As to the main point, I must confess that, but for the decision of this court in Townshend v. St. Marylebone, I should have considerable doubt. . . . There the claimant, whose qualification was as joint occupier of a house of the value of more than £20 a year, described his qualification as 'dwelling-house.' Under that he might clearly have shown a qualification as an inhabitant occupier under the Representation of the People Act, 1867; and the decision of the court, as I understand it, was, not that 'dwelling-house' did not sufficiently describe the qualification under that Act, but assuming that it did, it also described a qualification under the old Reform Act, and might therefore be applied to that qualification."

It has been conceded in this case for the respondent that a very slight variation of the description would have been enough; if, for instance, the description had been "house and land," or "house and garden," that would have been sufficient. That being the case the point really does not seem to me to be one of substance, and it seems to be in fact decided by the cases I have referred to. I ought to say that, even if we dissented from the decision in the case of Townshend v. St. Marylebone, we should feel bound to follow it, but we do not dissent from it. In our judgment the decision of the revising barrister was wrong, and ought to be reversed.

THE QUEEN v. WILLIAM JONES. (a.)

Criminal law—False pretences—Obtaining credit by fraud—Obtaining food at a restaurant without having money to pay—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 13.

The prisoner was convicted on an indictment containing two counts, the first charging him with obtaining food and wine by means of a false pretence that he was then able to pay, and possessed sufficient money to pay, for what he ordered; the second charging him, under section 13 of the Debtors Act, 1869, with obtaining credit by means of fraud. It was proved that the prisoner entered a restaurant and ordered food and wine, which he consumed, and that he had no money or other means of paying for the articles so ordered and consumed by him. No statement was made by him and no inquiry was made of him at the time of his ordering the articles as to his ability to pay for them.

Held, that the count for obtaining the articles by false pretences could not be supported, but that he was rightly convicted of obtaining credit by fraud.

Case stated by the Recorder of the City of Worcester.

The prisoner was tried at the City of Worcester Quarter Sessions, held on the 21st of October, 1897, on an indictment which contained two counts. The offence charged in the first count was that on a specified occasion the prisoner did falsely pretend to one Julia Crump that he was then able to pay, and possessed sufficient money to pay, for a plate of cold meat and a pint of sherry, which he requested the said Julia Crump to supply to him, by means of which false pretences he unlawfully obtained from the said Julia Crump certain quantities of mutton, bread, and sherry with intent to defraud.

The second count was under section 13 of the Debtors Act, 1869, the offence charged being that on the same occasion the prisoner, being a person without means, incurred a debt and liability to William Crump amounting to the sum of four shillings in the purchase of the articles of food already mentioned, and with intent to cheat in incurring the said debt and liability of four shillings unlawfully and fraudulently obtained from William Crump credit for the said debt and liability of four shillings by means of fraud.

The material evidence in support of the charge was as follows: Julia Crump stated that her husband William Crump kept a restaurant in Worcester, and that on the 30th of June prisoner came to the restaurant. He asked for some soup and witness replied that she had not got any ready. Prisoner then said, "What have you got?" and witness replied, "Some cold lamb." Prisoner said "he would have the cold lamb and half a pint of sherry," and then went upstairs to the dining room where the lamb and sherry was supplied to him; there was some bread on the table. Ten minutes later, on the witness going upstairs, she found the lamb eaten and the sherry drunk. Prisoner then asked for, and was supplied with, another half pint of sherry. A quarter of an hour afterwards prisoner asked for his bill, which amounted to 4s., and was handed to him; he said nothing. Presently witness went up again and prisoner then said he had not got any money except one halfpenny and would like to see Mr. Crump, who was then sent up. Witness further stated that generally customers paid immediately after they had finished their meal, and that she would not have supplied the prisoner with the wine and food if she had known he was not able to pay for it, though customers who were known were sometimes allowed to pay afterwards.

In cross-examination Mrs. Crump stated that the prisoner was shabbily dressed and that she served him the same as any other customer and made no inquiries about him as she sometimes did. The witness also stated that if an intending customer looked as if he were unable to pay she would make some inquiries about him before supplying food.

William Crump stated that when he was called upstairs by his wife the prisoner said he had no money beyond a halfpenny, and could not pay, but was expecting goods soon. Witness replied that prisoner had no right to come in without any money, and that he would not have allowed him to do so had he noticed before he went upstairs, as from his appearance witness judged he was not fit to be trusted.

The prisoner was immediately arrested.

As regards the first count, the recorder directed the jury that before they could convict the prisoner they must be satisfied (1) that he intended by his conduct to represent that he was of present ability to pay for the wine and food; (2) that he was aware of his want of ability to pay; (3) that the wine and food were supplied by Mrs. Crump in consequence of the false pretence made by the prisoner if it existed; and (4) that there was an intention on prisoner's part to defraud.

As regards the second count, he directed the jury that, before they could convict the prisoner, they must be satisfied that the prisoner was a person without means, and had, in incurring a debt or liability for the articles in question, fraudulently obtained credit from William Crump for 4s. with intent to cheat him of the same.

The jury found the prisoner guilty both on the first and second counts, and he was sentenced to three month's imprisonment with hard labour upon each count, such sentences to be concurrent.

The opinion of the court was requested as to whether the conviction upon both or either of the counts could be sustained. If it could be sustained on either of the counts the conviction was to be affirmed, if not it was to be quashed.

Harington, for the prisoner.—The conviction on the first count is bad for the reason that the prisoner did not by conduct or words hold himself out as able to pay for what he ordered. There was, therefore, no misrepresentation as to an existing fact, an essential element in the offence of obtaining goods by false pretences. The prisoner merely ordered the food, and his conduct at most amounted to no more than an implied promise to pay at some future date, and that is not sufficient to support the charge: Rex v. Goodhall, Russ. & Ry. 461; Reg. v. Burrows, 17 W. R. 682, 11 Cox C. C. 258. These cases are not inconsistent with Reg. v. Cooper, 25 W. R. 696, 2 Q. B. D. 510, or Reg. v. Gordon, 23 Q. B. D. 354, 37 W. R. Dig. 62.

As to the second count, the prisoner never obtained credit at all. There must always be some interval of time between the delivery of goods and the payment for them, and a transaction is not a credit transaction unless that is the intention of the parties: Reg. v. Slowly, 12 Cox C. C. 269, 21 W. R. Dig. 88; such an intention is negatived in this case by the evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Crump in the present case.

J. B. Matthews, for the prosecution.—There was evidence on which the jury might properly find that the prisoner obtained the food by false pretences; the prisoner's conduct was such as to imply a present ability to pay for what he ordered, and the case is similar to those in which the giving of a cheque by a person who has no account at the bank has been held to be a false pretence: Rex v. Jackson, 3 Camp. 370; Reg. v. Hazelton, 23 W. R. 139, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 134; Reg. v. Giles, 13 W. R. 327, Leigh & Cave 502. So also the sending of the half of a bank-note was held to amount to a representation that the sender had the other half in his possession, and not merely to a promise that he would send it in the future: Reg. v. Murphy, 13 Cox C. C. 298, 25 W. R. Dig. 89; Rex v. Crossley, 2 Moo. & R. 17. But even if there were no false pretence the prisoner was rightly convicted on the second count, for there was ample evidence that he obtained credit by fraud.

Harington, in reply, referred to Reg. v. Masterson, 2 Cox C. C. 100.

Rex v. Barnard, 7 C. & P. 784; Reg. v. Peters, 34 W. R. 399, 16 Q. B. D. 636; and Reg. v. Powell, 54 L. J. M. C. 26, 33 W. R. Dig 68, were also referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 27.—The judgment of the court (Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., WRIGHT, KENNEDY, DARLING, and CHANNELL, JJ.) was delivered by

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This case was reserved for our consideration by the recorder of Worcester. The prisoner was indicted in two counts; in the first he was charged under the Larceny Act, 1861, with obtaining goods by false pretences; in the second with having incurred a debt and obtained credit by fraud, an offence under the Debtors Act, 1869. The facts to which I shall presently refer are fully set out in the case, the questions were left to the jury, and upon the facts and the directions of the learned recorder the prisoner was convicted on both counts, and was sentenced to two periods of three months' imprisonment to run concurrently. The question for us is whether, taking the facts as stated coupled with the recorder's direction to the jury, the conviction can be sustained on both counts or on either—in other words, whether there was any evidence on which the jury could properly convict the prisoner.

The facts were shortly these: The prosecutor kept an eating-house, and on the 20th of June the prisoner went in and asked for some soup; he was told that there was none ready, and thereupon asked for some cold beef; he was told that there was none, but that he could have some cold lamb and salad, and this he accordingly ordered. He then ordered half a pint of sherry and went upstairs to have his meal, while there he rang the bell and ordered another half-pint of sherry. Subsequently he again rang the bell, and asked what there was to pay, and upon being told four shillings said that he had no means of paying, that he had no money and had (as was the fact) only a halfpenny on him. Such was the state of the facts; all that the prisoner did was to go into an eating-house, order food and refreshment and eat, but not pay for it; no question was put to him and no enquiry was made from him by the prosecutor as to his means, nor was any statement made by him as to whether he had means to pay. The question is whether this can be regarded as a state of things in which a jury would be justified in finding that the prisoner obtained consumable articles by false pretences. I do not desire to say anything which can weaken the authority of the decisions which say that there can be a false pretence by conduct—for example, the case of Rex v. Barnard, where a cap and gown were used by a man who had no right to wear them in order to convey the notion that he was a member of the university. Nor do I in any way dispute the authority of another class of case, where a man gives a cheque on a bank where he either has no account or has not sufficient means to meet the cheque, and must have known that he had not sufficient means. In the present case the prisoner did nothing beyond what I have already stated, no inquiry was made of him, and no statement was made by him. Under the circumstances I do not think that the case could properly be left to the jury on the first count; there was no evidence for the jury that the prisoner had obtained these articles by false pretences.

Now, it is provided by section 88 of the Larceny Act, 1861, that if upon the trial of any person indicted for the misdemeanour of obtaining goods by false pretences it is proved that he obtained them in such manner as to amount in law to larceny, he shall not by reason thereof be entitled to be acquitted of such misdemeanour; that is to say, if the facts show a larceny he is not to be acquitted of misdemeanour. But in the present case the prisoner did not commit larceny. In the circumstances of the case it is clear that the prosecutor parted not merely with the possession, but also with the property in his goods, and that he intended to do so, for the goods were intended for immediate consumption. The finding of the jury that the prisoner was guilty of obtaining goods by false pretences cannot, therefore, be supported on that ground, and the conviction on the first count is bad.

The second count is framed upon a different statute—upon section 13 of the Debtors Act, 1869—which provides that in certain cases a person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour: the first case being, if in incurring any debt or liability he has obtained credit under false pretences, or by means of any other fraud. There are three elements which have to be considered in the construction of that section. First, there must be the incurring of a debt or liability; secondly, there must be an obtaining of credit; and thirdly, there must be fraud. The conjunction of these three ingredients makes the offence. Now, there can be no doubt that the prisoner did incur a debt or liability; he ordered goods under circumstances which implied a promise to pay for them. Then did he obtain credit? I am of opinion that he did. The prosecutor might have said that he would not furnish him with the goods until he paid the price, or he might have insisted on payment in actual exchange for each article as it was supplied, but he did neither. He furnished the goods under circumstances which passed the possession and property in them, relying on the readiness and ability of the prisoner to pay. It does not seem to me to matter that the period of credit was a short period; he trusted the prisoner and parted with his goods without insisting on prepayment. I think, therefore, that credit was obtained. Thirdly, was there fraud? There was debt and there was credit, and I think there was ample evidence to justify the jury in arriving at the conclusion that the prisoner was guilty of fraud. He goes to an eating-house, where the ordinary custom is to pay directly after the goods have been consumed; he knows that such goods are supplied, not on personal knowledge, but on the understanding that the ordinary custom will be observed. The jury found that he had no intention of paying; he intended to cheat, and so the jury found. I think, therefore, that the conviction was right upon the second count, and that it must be affirmed.

Conviction quashed on first count and affirmed on second count.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L.JJ.) — Dec. 11.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. NEW YORK BREWERIES CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Inland revenue—Probate duty—Executor de son tort—Foreign will—Transfer of shares in English company to foreign executors—Liability of company.

A testator, the registered owner of shares and debentures in an English company, was domiciled and died in America. By his will, made according to American law, the shares and debentures passed to his executors. At the request of the executors the company transferred into their names two of the shares and one of the debentures, and paid them the dividends and interest due thereon. The executors, to the knowledge of the company, had not obtained, and did not intend to obtain, probate of the will in England.

Held, that the company had intermeddled with the estate of the deceased so as to constitute itself an executor de son tort, and had rendered itself liable to the payment of probate duty.

Judgment of Wills and Grantham, JJ. (45 W. R. 606), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Grantham, JJ.) on the hearing of an information by the Attorney-General (45 W. R. 606).

The information alleged that the defendant company had administered part of the estate of one Henry Clausen, deceased, in respect of whose estate no probate or letters of administration had been obtained in England, and had thereby, as executors de son tort, incurred liability for duty and penalties.

The defendant company was an English company incorporated under the Companies Acts, and was established for the purpose of acquiring two businesses which were being carried on in New York, in the United States of America.

Henry Clausen, a person domiciled in New York, was registered in the books of the company in London as the holder of 1,747 preference shares, 274 ordinary shares, and 220 debentures. There was not, and never had been, any register of shares or register of debentures of the company elsewhere than in London.

Henry Clausen died in December, 1893, having, by a will made according to the law of his domicil, appointed H. W. Schmidt and P. V. Stocky, both of New York, his executors. In January, 1894, letters testamentary of the estate of Henry Clausen were duly granted by the Surrogate's Court of the city and county of New York to the said H. W. Schmidt and P. V. Stocky.

The will of Henry Clausen was not proved in England, nor was administration or representation to his estate in any form granted or taken out in England.

At the request of the foreign executors the defendant company transferred in the books of the company in London one of the preference shares, one of the ordinary shares, and one of the debentures, standing in the name of the deceased, into the names of the executors. The defendant company also at the like request paid to the executors dividends on shares which had become due after the death of the deceased and interest on debentures which had become due before his death.

The defendant company, when they so transferred the shares and debenture and paid the dividends and interest, knew that the executors had not obtained probate in this country and did not intend to do so.

The Crown asked for a declaration that the defendant company was liable to pay such duty (including estate duty under section 5 of 52 Vict. c. 7) as would have been payable if probate or administration had been duly obtained in England in respect of the estate of Henry Clausen; and further, that the defendant company was liable to the penalties imposed by section 37 of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, and section 40 of 44 Vict. c. 12, for administering the said personal estate without obtaining probate or letters of administration.

The Divisional Court gave judgment for the defendants.

The Crown appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., with them), for the Crown.

Moulton, Q.C., Asquith, Q.C., Bremner, and Gore-Browne, for the defendants.

Dec. 11.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: This is a test case, and it is brought to determine whether an English company limited by shares and registered in England can, upon the death of a foreign shareholder, with impunity transfer into the names of his foreign executors shares and debentures standing in the name of the deceased shareholder in the books of the company, and pay to such executors the arrears of interest and dividends due thereon at the date of his death, without such executors taking out or being about to take out representation to the deceased in this country. That this is the real question which the parties wish to have decided will be seen from the letter of Messrs. Burn & Berridge, the solicitors of the defendant company, of the 10th of January, 1895, to the Comptroller of Inland Revenue. My brothers Wills and Grantham have held that the company can legally and with impunity do this, the case before them having been specially argued as to whether the defendant company by so doing would bring themselves within section 37 of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, and become liable to the penalties therein named. The case has been developed in this court into one very different from what it was in the court below, the Solicitor-General, who appeared for the Crown, now stating that he did not ask for penalties.

The material facts are as follows: The defendants are an English company limited by shares, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, having their registered office in the City of London, where the share and debenture registers are kept. They carry on the business of brewers in America. Henry Clausen was a share and debenture-holder in this company, and was registered as such in their books in London at the date of his death, which took place in America upon the 28th of December, 1893. He was an American citizen, resident and domiciled in that country, and left a will whereby he appointed two gentlemen of New York his executors, to whom letters testamentary of his estate were granted by the court in New York. Having obtained these letters testamentary, the American executors then requested the defendant company in England to pay to them the interest and dividends due to their testator at the date of his death upon his shares and debentures, and also to transfer into their names the shares and debentures standing in the name of the deceased in the defendants' share and debenture registers in London. The defendants well knew when this request was made that these executors had not taken out and did not intend to take out representation in this country to their testator, and that their object was to obtain, if possible, possession of the English assets of their testator without paying probate duty thereon. The defendants, with this knowledge, paid over the interest and dividends as requested to the foreign executors, who were then in America, and also transferred into their names in the registers in this country one preference and one ordinary share and one debenture, so as to raise the point whether this could be legally done with impunity.

For the main point intended to be raised it should be taken that the interest and dividends were paid to the foreign executors in this country. Now, first of all, what would have been the position of these foreign executors had they come over to this country and obtained from the defendant company in London payment of the interest and dividends due to their testator at the date of his death, and a transfer of the shares and debentures from his name into their names without having taken out or intending to take out representation in this country to their testator? I cannot doubt that, upon receipt in this country of their testator's English assets, they would have constituted themselves executors de son tort. They were not, and never intended to be, executors or administrators in this country of the deceased's assets here; but, on the contrary, intended never to be so, and yet they intermeddled, as executors, with the testator's goods and chattels in this country in such a way as to constitute themselves executors de son tort.

I see the point is stated thus in Williams on Executors, 9th ed., p. 1827: "It must be observed that if he"—that is, a foreign executor—"should collect the effects or debts of the deceased found or due in England, without taking out letters of administration here, he would thereby become liable as executor de son tort to the extent of the assets so received by him"; and in this I agree. That this would have been the position of the foreign executors in this case when they obtained the English assets of the deceased from the defendant company I do not doubt; and this is so, although they did not personally come to this country.

Now, these foreign executors being, as I think they were, executors de son tort, how can the defendant company, when called upon in a court of law, justify what they did at the request of the foreign executors in administering the English assets of the deceased? My brother Wills based his judgment upon the ground that, as an executor derives his power from the will, and can do many acts before taking out probate, and can even sue, which is undoubtedly true, the defendant company could therefore justify administering the English assets of the deceased, as the company had acted upon the request of the executors and had handed over to them the assets of their testator, although they had not at that time taken out probate. If the executors were English executors about to take out probate, this ordinarily would be so, but I must point out that when either an executor has to justify what he has done as executor, or another has to justify what he has done at the request of an executor, each must prove that the executor was in fact the executor of the deceased, and this can only be done by production of the probate, for, as Jervis, C.J., pithily put it in Johnson v. Warwick, 17 C. B. 516, 4 W. R. C. L. Dig. 168, at p. 522, when the will is proved the court has the legal optics through which to look at it, and that this was so was not in reality disputed at the bar.

My brother Wills says that what the company has done is simply to pay to the executors, who are persons entitled to receive it, money which belonged to them as executors, which had belonged to the testator, and which, upon his decease and upon his will coming into operation, became the property of the executors. But in the present case the American will as regards these English assets had no validity whatever in this country, nor had the American executors any right under it to receive the testator's assets here. Until they had taken out representation to their testator in this country they were pure strangers to the English assets. This American will, to the knowledge of all parties, was never to come into operation as a will in this country; the American executors were never to become executors in this country, it being the express intention of all parties that they should not. This is not the case, as put in argument, of a debtor of a testator paying a debt, due from him to that testator, to the executor named in his English will before that executor has proved the will; but it is a case in which the payment is made to a person who has no legal right to receive it, well knowing that that person would never become legally entitled to receive it. The judgment of Wigram, V.C., in Sharland v. Mildon, 5 Hare 469, and that of Wood, V.C., in Hill v. Curtis, 14 W. R. 125, L. R. 1 Eq. 90, in my opinion show that even if there was not such knowledge, the defendant company by what they did were executors de son tort.

It cannot be successfully contended that an executor de son tort is not liable to pay probate duty upon the assets of a testator which he has administered any less than he would have been liable if he had been a named executor in a will. Without being executor he has intermeddled with the deceased's estate as if he were executor so as to constitute himself executor de son tort; and as Wightman, J., in Paull v. Simpson, 9 Q. B. 365, says, a person who is an executor de son tort is executor generally. I find in Mr. Hanson's book on the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duty Acts, edition of 1870, p. 66, this passage: "Those who receive and administer the property of the deceased either as original or derivative executors . . . or as administrators of his effects or even as executors de son tort are the persons primarily liable to account for and pay the duty." Although this work is not an authority in a court of law, I have no doubt that that passage is correct. In my opinion, in the circumstances stated, the defendant company were executors de son tort, as also were the foreign executors. The defendants' case really comes to this, that one executor de son tort, when challenged in a court of law in this country to justify what he has done in relation to the administering of a deceased's estate, can do so if he can show that he has acted under the directions and at the request of another executor de son tort. This cannot be, and it is not surprising that no authority has been produced to support such a proposition.

The defendant company having constituted themselves executors de son tort, and thus become debtors to the Crown for probate duty, it is argued that, even if so, there is no way by which the Crown can obtain from the defendants the duty payable to it—that is, the duty payable upon the English assets of the testator administered by them. Elaborate arguments were addressed to us upon the question whether the defendant company were liable to the penalties imposed by section 37 of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, but that is not the point now sought to be determined, the Solicitor-General not asking for penalties. The question is whether by any proceedings by the Crown against the defendants they can be made to pay probate duty to the Crown.

In my judgment it is open to the Attorney-General to file an information against the defendant company asking that it may be declared that a debt arose and became payable to Her Majesty in respect of probate duty upon the amount of the English assets which were in this country at the date of the death of the deceased, and which the defendants have administered, and it is no answer to such an information to say that they were only executors de son tort. In this proceeding the defendant company will have to justify what they have done, and they cannot do so without producing probate or letters of administration with the will annexed or other representation taken out by the American executors in this country. It is true that the person liable to pay probate duty has to swear an affidavit and obtain a stamp of the requisite value to be affixed thereon, and by this means he is to pay the probate duty; but this is mere machinery by which the duty is to be paid. The person who is liable to pay probate duty and does not do so is a debtor to the Crown, and it is no answer for him to say his only liability is to swear an affidavit and procure a stamp. Even if this were an answer, which I think it is not, I do not see why the prayer of the information should not be framed to meet it. That proceedings by way of information to recover probate duty will lie is established by precedents, and even if not, I can see no valid reason against it.

In the year 1831 (tempore Sir James Scarlett, A.G.) I find an information to recover probate duty was filed in the case of Attorney-General v. Dimond, 1 C. & J. 356. In the year 1834 (tempore Sir John Campbell, A.G.), in the case of Attorney-General v. Hope, 1 C. M. & R. 530, like proceedings were had, and this case went to the House of Lords. Again, in 1859, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, when Attorney-General, filed an information for the same purpose: see Attorney- General v. Brunning, 7 W. R. 308, 4 H. & N. 94, and this case also went to the House of Lords, 8 W. R. 362, 8 H. L. Cas. 243. I cannot doubt that proceedings by way of information by the Attorney-General can be taken to recover unpaid probate duty.

What I have written above answers the real point raised in this case, in favour of the Crown—viz., that it is not lawful for the defendant company to do what they have done, and that they can be made liable to pay probate duty upon the assets which they have administered in this country. If it is to be taken that the interest and dividends in this case were paid in America, and not here, I think the same result follows, and the reason for this will be found in the judgments about to be delivered by my brothers Rigby and Collins.

It is unnecessary in the view I take of this case to decide whether the penalties imposed by section 37 of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, can be recovered. The Solicitor-General does not ask for them, but had I to decide thereon, I should agree—though I doubt whether it is open to me to disagree in this court—with the judgment of Giffard, L.J., in Fernandes' Executors case, 18 W. R. 411, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 314, which judgment has an important bearing upon this case in favour of the Crown. Nor have I to decide whether section 57 of the Crown Suits Act, 1865, or sections 39 and 40 of 44 & 45 Vict. c. 12, can in the circumstances of this case be resorted to.

For the above reasons in my judgment the Crown succeeds in this appeal, which must be allowed with costs here and below.

RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment: By English law, with which alone we are concerned in this case, probate duty is payable in respect of all assets of a deceased person, whether domiciled or resident within this country or not, which are within the meaning of the numerous decisions on this point locally situated in England. The authorities show that for this purpose the following are treated as local assets subject to probate duty: (a) Any choses in action which are incapable of being effectually transferred without some act being done in this country. This would include shares and debentures of a limited company incorporated in England, transfers or transmission of which must, as in the present case, be completed by entries in a register of members or a register of debenture-holders. (b) Any debts payable by debtors in this country, including incorporated companies which, as in the present case, are registered, managed, and controlled here. Dividends on shares in the case of the defendant company have to be declared by a general meeting of the company held here, or, as to interim dividends, by the board of directors acting here, and when declared can only be recovered as debts due from the company. Interest on debentures can only be recovered as a debt due from the company, and in the present case there are express provisions making the interest payable in London. There can be no doubt that, if representation to a deceased person were taken out in this country, the personal representative here would be chargeable with probate duty in respect of all these assets so far as the interest of the deceased extended. In the regular course the probate duty is chargeable as a stamp duty on the affidavit required from the person applying for probate or letters of administration. But if it were possible to evade the duty by omitting to take out representation to the deceased, the imposition of the duty would in many cases be a vain thing. Accordingly it is, upon authority, plain that the duty is payable by a person who takes upon himself to deal with assets, even though he do so as an executor de son tort only. Any person who may be entitled to administration here, including the representative in the country of the deceased's domicil, if he does not make himself personal representative here, becomes, on intermeddling with the assets here, executor de son tort, and chargeable as such with probate duty. Any person intermeddling with the assets under the direction of an executor de son tort whether he be a foreign representative or not, is himself chargeable as an executor de son tort. It makes no difference that the foreign representative is named as executor in the will by virtue of which he is made representative abroad. That will cannot be looked at or given in evidence until representation is taken out here, and the maxim De non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio will apply.

We are asked to decide here that the defendant company and other like companies may, without becoming liable to the Crown for probate duty, lawfully concur in transferring choses in action which cannot be effectually transferred without an act done here—viz., the shares and debentures of the deceased, and pay the dividends and interest of the shares and debentures to persons who cannot be recognized by our law as representatives of the deceased and on the hypothesis never intend to be representatives here. In my judgment the defendant company can do none of the things suggested without making themselves liable to the Crown for probate duty, a liability which may, independently of any question of penalties or special remedies given by the Crown Suits Act, be enforced by information against them. It is suggested that by paying the dividends and interest abroad the company may evade liability. Whether the payments be made abroad out of money transmitted for the purpose or out of money of the company which happens to be abroad makes, in my judgment, no difference. They are equally payable by the order and direction of the company; and the payment is the act of the company whereby a chose in action of the company locally situate here within the meaning of our law is dealt with so as to constitute the company executors de son tort.

It was further suggested that the courts in New York would enforce payment there of the full amount of the dividends and interest regardless of the fact that they are chargeable—and that the payment of them would make the company chargeable—with probate duty in England. I am very far from being satisfied that this would be so, but, if it were the case, however much it might be regretted, I do not think that we are bound, and I do not feel inclined, to decide that it would affect the Crown's right to duty. As this case is brought before the court for decision on a state of facts raised for the purpose of determining a general principle, it would be out of the question for the Crown to exact penalties, and no such claim has been made, though it has been argued that they would be payable, and the information which by agreement was substituted for a special case for the purpose of raising the general question is so framed as to raise the abstract question of penalties. It does not appear desirable to decide anything more than is necessary for determining the real point submitted to us; but without deciding any abstract question as to penalties I may say that for my part it would require very different grounds from any that have been brought before us to lead me to the conclusion that the decision of Giffard, L.J., in Fernandes' Executors case would not be applicable. I do not think it relevant to inquire whether, as between the executors named in the will and the defendant company the transfers and payments might not be valid and sufficient to relieve the company from liability. They could have no such effect as against the Crown or any other claimants entitled to payment out of the English assets. In conclusion I would add that, if the arguments of the defendant company were to prevail, I see no reason why foreign executors who did not wish to sue in this country should ever pay probate duty on assets here. They would only have to get someone here, to collect and transmit to them all the assets here, and there would be an end of the matter. Indeed, that appears to be the precise argument of the defendants in this case.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: I agree in the result of the judgments delivered, and without recapitulating the facts will shortly state my reasons. I think it cannot be doubted on the facts admitted that the defendant company have taken upon themselves to deal with the English assets of a deceased person. Indeed, subject to the question whether they ever took possession or not, Wills, J., in the court below, thought that they had done so. He says that if they took possession they certainly administered, because if they took possession they dealt with the property. By an act which could only be done by them in London, and without which no transfer would have been complete, they effected a change in the legal evidence of the title to a share and a debenture in the company by transferring them in the register into the names of the American executors. They also paid to the executors out of England, dividends on shares and interest on debentures, which latter, at all events, was by the terms of the debentures themselves payable in London. They did all this knowing that the persons to whom they so transferred and paid, though in fact named as executors in the will of the deceased in America, had no intention of taking out probate in this country, and they were willing to assist them as far as they could in avoiding the necessity of doing so. This appears to me clearly to amount to such an intermeddling with the English assets of the deceased as to constitute the defendant company an executor de son tort, unless the fact that these acts were done under the authority of the executors named in the American will can make a difference.

I agree that there is a broad distinction between acts done by or under the direction of a mere intruder not named in the will and acts done by or under the authority of a named executor. The latter taking title under the will is not, in fact, a tortfeasor, neither is anyone acting under him, and for certain purposes this distinction may be material. But if the acts of the persons who have dealt with the assets are challenged, as they now are by the Crown, and their rights have to be ascertained in a court of law before probate is taken out—and a fortiori if it was never intended to be taken out—there is no material difference between the position of the mere intruder and his agents, and the executor and his agents. They are each estopped by their acts, whether tortious or innocent, from denying that they are executors, and, as they cannot prove probate, they make themselves liable to probate duty in respect of the assets which they have administered. The distinction is pointed out by Montague Smith, J., in Sykes v. Sykes, 18 W. R. 551, L. R. 5 C. P. 113; see also Hill v. Curtis. It is immaterial in this view whether they are named in the will or not, as the court cannot be informed upon this fact except through the medium of probate. The headnote of Sykes v. Sykes is misleading. There Shaw had been manager of certain works which had been carried on by a deceased person. After her death he at the request of her executors, who had not proved her will, continued to manage the works and to deal with the property. Judgment was obtained against him as executor de son tort by a creditor of the deceased, and execution was levied on "the goods in his hands as executor to be administered." The executors afterwards took out probate and brought trover against the execution creditor and the sheriff, and it was held that they were entitled to judgment, as the agent of a rightful executor was not a tortfeasor in obeying the executor's orders. There, probate having been taken out before the executors' action, the court was able to see that they were executors, and as such capable of justifying the acts of Shaw, which, consequently, were not tortious; but the case is far from deciding that, had the executors not taken out probate before action, the acts of Shaw could have been treated as other than tortious. In contemplation of the court he must have been a wrongdoer if he could not prove that he had the authority of the executors.

If I am right in holding that the defendant company did intermeddle with the English assets of the testator by the acts above stated, the case of Fernandes' Executors, 18 W. R. 411, is exactly in point. There the deceased, who was domiciled in India, was a creditor of an English bank which carried on business in India. The company was wound up, and the deceased had proved his debt and received a dividend before his death. He died in India, and his will was proved there. The Indian assets of the bank had been remitted to the official liquidator in England. A final dividend became payable after the death of the creditor, and the Indian executors were desirous of receiving it without taking out probate in this country. The liquidator took the opinion of the court whether he would be justified in remitting the amount to India, or paying it to an attorney here for the executors. Giffard, L.J., overruling Lord Romilly, M.R., held that he could not do so, and expressed an opinion that the person who so received and administered the assets would be liable to a penalty under 55 Geo. 3, c. 184.

I agree with A. L. Smith, LJ., that, as the Crown are not claiming a penalty under the latter statute, the real question is whether the defendant company are liable to pay duty, and I have no doubt that an information would lie against them for not doing so. This point does not seem to have been argued in the court below. But I am further of opinion that the processes of transferring the title to the shares and debentures in the register from the deceased to the executors, and paying the interest and dividends, did involve a "taking possession" of these assets within the meaning of the statute. If the operation had been carried out in the ordinary way there must have been a physical taking possession of the documents of title, and even though this step was advisedly omitted in this case, I think there was a constructive taking possession involved in the alteration of the register and the payment of interest and dividends. The interest and dividends, as well as the shares and debentures, formed part of the estate of the deceased in England, being debts due from an English company and payable in England: Attorney-General v. Higgins, 2 H. & N. 339, 5 W. R. C. L. Dig. 227; Attorney-General v. Bouwens, 4 M. & W. 171; and Attorney-General v. Hope; and I think that the company cannot, by paying them in America, escape from the position of having appropriated in their hands, and therefore taken possession of, English assets of the deceased, when they paid these sums for interest and dividends.

In re PEVERIL GOLD MINES (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Articles of association—Winding up—Right of contributory to petition for—Limitations imposed by articles—Validity—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 79, 82.

It is not competent for a limited company to curtail by its articles of association the statutory right of any of its members to present a winding-up petition to the court.

Appeal from Byrne, J.

A shareholder in the above-named company holding 5,000 fully-paid shares presented a petition to the court for a winding-up order. It was admitted that he was entitled to present a petition but for clause 164 of the articles of association, and the question was whether he was estopped by that clause, as he had not fulfilled any of the conditions precedent.

Clause 164 was as follows: "No petition shall be presented or proceeded with by a member to wind up the company, except and unless (a) by consent in writing of not less than two of the then board, or (b) in pursuance or by permission of a resolution passed by a majority at a general meeting of the company, or (c) the petitioner or petitioners shall hold, or together hold, not less than one-fifth of the then issued capital of the company, upon which all calls shall have been paid."

The company and two shareholders, one holding twenty shares, on which 16s. 6d. had been paid, and the other holding 13,600 fully-paid shares (being £1 shares nominal value), moved the court to stay proceedings.

Section 79 of the Companies Act, 1862, is as follows: "A company under this Act may be wound up by the court, as hereinafter defined, under the following circumstances (that is to say): (1) Whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up by the court; (2) whenever the company does not commence its business within a year from its incorporation, or suspends its business for the space of a whole year; (3) whenever the members are reduced in number to less than seven; (4) whenever the company is unable to pay its debts; (5) whenever the court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up"; and section 82 is as follows: "Any application to the court for the winding up of a company under this Act shall be by petition; it may be presented by the company, or by any one or more creditor or creditors, contributory or contributories of the company, or by all or any of the above parties, together or separately."

Byrne, J., being of opinion that clause 164 was inconsistent with sections 79 and 82 of the Companies Act, 1862, refused to stay proceedings, and dismissed the motion.

The company and the two shareholders appealed.

Jenkins, Q.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the appellants.—Byrne, J., was not prepared to say that a given contributory might not make a bargain with the company that he would not present a petition; but he held that an article to that effect would be invalid. If an article is not invalidated, not made illegal, by the Companies Acts, one may expect to find it in the articles: Welton v. Saffery, 45 W. R. 508, [1897] A. C. 299. The question of the power of the corporation to do any particular thing does not arise here. A mere attempt to oust the jurisdiction of the court is invalid, in the same way as a mere covenant not to sue for money lent. [CHITTY, L.J.—The only mode of enforcing the rights of contributories inter se is by petition to the court.] An article which imposes certain conditions precedent is valid, provided that such conditions are not unreasonable: it is lawful to put some limitation on the right to petition, and this is a reasonable limitation. The articles are a contract between the members of the corporation inter se: Eley v. The Positive Government Security Life Assurance Co. (Limited), 24 W. R. 252, 1 Ex. D. 20; Browne v. La Trinidad, 36 W. R. 289, 37 Ch. D. 1. The general effect of articles of association is that any condition if reasonable may be inserted in the articles if it is not repugnant to the Companies Acts. The Act does not expressly or impliedly prevent a contributory from contracting himself out of section 82 by the articles; primâ facie he may contract himself out of any Act of Parliament. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not assent to your general proposition, that any partner or member of a company can so contract as to limit the rights of the other partners or members.] A contract by two, three, or four members of a company that they will not present a petition to wind up before the happening of a certain event is good and can be enforced. There is nothing to prevent a contributory contracting himself out of the section for good consideration. All the cases which are against us are cases of a company, as a company, releasing its rights.

They referred to Walker v. London Tramways Co., 28 W. R. 163, 12 Ch. D. 705; Hope v. International Financial Society, 25 W. R. 203, 4 Ch. Dig. 54; and Cotton v. Imperial and Foreign Agency and Investment Corporation, [1892] 3 Ch. 454, 41 W. R. Dig. 36.

Eve, Q.C., and Eustace Smith, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I will start with reading an extract from the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in Welton v. Saffery, 45 W. R. 508, at p. 515, [1897] A. C. 324: "These companies are the creature of statute, and by the statute to which they owe their being they must be bound, in regard to shareholders, as well as in regard to creditors, in all matters coming within the conditions of the memorandum of association. Shareholders in these companies require protection just as much as creditors, perhaps even more. Shareholders are not partners for all purposes; they have not all the rights of partners; they have practically no voice in the management of the concern; their security in a great measure depends on the directors adhering to the requirements of the Act." Anybody who is familiar with these Acts knows that these registered limited companies are formed on certain conditions, and are regulated and dissolved under certain conditions. The important sections of the Act of 1862 are sections 79 and 82. Section 79 deals with the circumstances under which a company may be dissolved by the court; and section 82 says who may apply to the court for a dissolution. I take it that any article which is contrary to these—which in substance says that a company was formed on the condition that its life should not cease in conformity with the statute—is an attempt to force upon the shareholders conditions which are at variance with the provisions of the Act. It is saying in effect that, notwithstanding the provisions of the Act, we shall not be dissolved; and that is a condition fundamentally at variance with the statutory obligations. It is no answer to say that such an article merely enables a contributory to waive his individual statutory rights.

I am not disposed to say that a bargain may not be made between the company and the contributories or creditors in certain circumstances, but a bargain such as this, that the company should not be terminated in the circumstances provided by the Act, would be contrary to the true principle of the statute.

Sections 14 to 16, and 161, are not in point. I regard the whole proceeding as contrary to the intention of the Act. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Chitty, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We are not concerned to consider whether a shareholder may contract not to present a petition to wind up the company, or whether the rights given to the shareholders by the Act may be varied, as, for instance, the rights given to dissentient shareholders by section 161 of the Act on the sale of the property of the company to another company. With regard to sections 79 and 82 of the Act of 1862, there is a condition annexed to the incorporation of a company that it may be wound up under certain prescribed conditions; and an article to the effect that the shareholders shall not present a petition cannot be valid. It was not disputed that an article which provided that no one, no creditor or contributory, should present a petition, or that the company itself should not, would not be good.

I think that the condition attached to the incorporation of a company is an essential one, and cannot be varied in the articles by the shareholders. The article in the present case puts a limitation on their rights; but if we held it valid we could not stop short of saying that an article of wider import would be valid.

Vaughan Williams, L.J.—I entirely agree, and have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Bartlett v. Mayfair Property Co (Limited). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Debentures—Charge on uncalled capital—Special resolution—Uncalled capital not capable of being called up except for winding up—Companies Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 76), s. 5.

If a limited company pass a special resolution in accordance with section 5 of the Companies Act, 1879, declaring that a certain portion of its uncalled capital shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of the company being wound up, and afterwards issues debentures charging all its property, including (inter alia) its uncalled capital, these debentures are not a first charge on such capital when it is called up in the winding up.

The Mayfair Property Co. was registered in August, 1892, with a capital of £50,000, in 5,000 shares of £10 each, and both the memorandum of association and the articles authorized the creation of a charge on the unpaid capital for the time being.

By a special resolution in accordance with section 5 of the Companies Act, 1879,* passed on the 21st of September, 1892, and confirmed on the 12th of October, 1892, it was declared, "That such portion of the company's capital as consists of £5 per share remaining uncalled upon all the ordinary shares of the company shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1879."

In June, 1894, the company issued first mortgage debentures for an aggregate of £50,000, purporting to be a charge on all its property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being.

On the 8th of August, 1896, the present action was commenced on behalf of all the debenture-holders, and a receiver was appointed on the 12th of August.

On the 8th of August, 1896, a compulsory winding-up order was made against the company. At this time only £5 per share remained uncalled, and the question was now raised whether the debentures were a first charge on £5 per share which had been called up by the official receiver and liquidator in the winding up.

R. F. Norton (Swinfen Eady, Q.C., with him).—The debenture-holders are creditors, and entitled, with other creditors, to be paid in the winding up according to their rights. There is nothing in section 5 of the Act of 1879 which says that the special resolution reserving uncalled capital may not be rescinded by another special resolution. But I do not need any repeal of the special resolution. Charging the debentures on the uncalled capital is only mortgaging it to creditors, and is still available for creditors in the winding up. In In re Pyle Works, 38 W. R. 674, 44 Ch. D. 534, it was decided that the charge was still valid, notwithstanding the fact of the capital being called up, so here, though the capital may not be called up till the winding up, yet it then becomes valid. The remarks of Lindley, L.J., in In re Pyle Works are only dicta. Lord Macnaghten's remarks in Newton v. Anglo-Australian Investment Co., 43 W. R. 401, [1895] A. C. 244, apply, for whenever a winding up has commenced the Act of 1879 no longer applies.

Farwell, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the official receiver.—Apart from the Act a company can alter any resolution for reserving its uncalled capital by another resolution: Malleson v. National Insurance and Guarantee Corporation, 42 W. R. 249, [1894] 1 Ch. 200; but not if made under section 5. Mortgagees are outside of the winding up altogether: In re David Lloyd & Co., 25 W. R. 872, 6 Ch. D. 339. The Act intends this capital to be a reserve.

Norton, in reply.—Malleson v. National Insurance, &c., Corporation is distinguishable. A mortgage is outside the winding up only for certain purposes—if the mortgage is of uncalled capital it would be within the liquidation.

(a.) Reported by C. W. Mead, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* The last portion of section 5 of the Companies Act, 1879, is as follows: "A limited company may by a special resolution declare that any portion of its capital which has not already been called up shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event and for the purpose of the company being wound up; and thereupon such portion of capital shall not be capable of being called up, except in the event of and for the purposes of the company being wound up."

WRIGHT, J.—The question which has to be decided in this case arises under the last paragraph of section 5 of the Companies Act, 1879. [His lordship then read the paragraph of the section in question.] The company, in 1892, passed a resolution reserving a certain portion of their uncalled capital as provided by the section. In 1894 debentures were issued in the ordinary form, but expressly extending to uncalled capital. The company being now in liquidation, the question arises whether the right of the mortgagees does extend so as to include this uncalled capital.

It seems to me, after looking at the language of the section, that one ought to come to the conclusion that the section means what it says, and that after the resolution was passed the company lay under a statutory disability to call up any of its uncalled capital for any other purpose than that of winding up. The object of the section is to reserve for the purposes of liquidation all the uncalled capital, and there seems here, fortunately, hardly any room for doubt. This view is fortified by the dictum—if it is not more than a dictum—of the present Master of the Rolls in In re Pyle Works. At first sight Lord Macnaghten's remarks in Newton v. Anglo-Australian Investment Co. seem to raise some difficulty about this, but when looked at carefully that case does not conflict with the other, as there the question raised was a different one altogether to this, and the subsidiary point discussed was as to the effect of one of the articles of association which did not deal with the winding up at all. There the article in question was a point of family arrangement between the company and its shareholders, not as in this case a matter of statutory enactment. There must therefore be a declaration that the capital not called up is not charged by the debentures.

Local government—Unsanitary area acquired under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 70)—Improvement scheme—Provisional order—Confirmatory Act—Valuation for compensation—Property in premises acquired—Reversioner—Right to sue—Costs—Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 70), ss. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 12, 20, 21.

Where property in an unhealthy district is compulsorily acquired by a local authority under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, persons interested therein retain all their legal rights in respect of the same until the provisional order made in respect thereof under section 8 of the Act has been confirmed by Act of Parliament under sub-section 6 of section 8.

Trial of action.

This was an action without pleadings, in which the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from building in Clare Market, Strand, opposite to his premises known as the Fishmongers' Arms in such a way as to damage his ancient lights; and he further claimed a mandatory order to compel them to pull down their new buildings, together with damages.

The plaintiff was the freeholder of premises situate in Clare Market and Holles-street, Strand, known as the Fishmongers' Arms, and by an indenture of lease dated the 2nd of March, 1868, he demised the same for a term of forty years from the 29th of September, 1867. The defendants in 1896 commenced to erect a handsome building on a site of vacant land in Clare Market to be used as printing works. In November, 1894, under the provisions of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 70), s. 4, a representation was made to the London County Council by the medical officer of health for the Strand district of the unhealthiness of the area within which the plaintiff's premises were situated, and his premises were included in such representation; and the county council thereupon prepared a scheme for dealing with the area under the Act, and under section 8 thereof presented a petition for a confirmatory order. An inquiry, after being duly advertised, was held at the Home Office in March, 1896. A provisional order under section 8 (sub-section 1) was made on the 20th of January, 1897, and a confirmatory Act of Parliament was passed on the 3rd of June, 1897. In the meantime, prior to the making of the provisional order, the plaintiff had issued his writ in the action, which bore date the 13th of October, 1896. Prior to the commencement of the action and to the passing of the Act, the defendants, without prejudice, made an offer for a settlement to the plaintiff, which, in his lordship's opinion, if made after the passing of the Act, would have been reasonable.

Evidence was called to show that the value of the plaintiff's reversion had not been damaged, but as a matter of fact improved, by the building operations of the defendants, and that the premises were unfit and not reasonably capable of being made fit for human habitation, so that the plaintiff's compensation was limited under section 21, sub-section 2 (c), of the Act to the value of the land and the materials of the buildings thereon.

Eve, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the plaintiff.—Having regard to the circumstances, the plaintiff does not press for any injunction. It is admitted on the other side that the plaintiff's lights are ancient lights, and that there has been interference in them. This being the case, the plaintiff is entitled to an inquiry as to the damages which he has sustained. They referred to section 21 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. The valuation of the premises will be based on the fair market value as estimated at the time of the drawing up of the scheme; and if, as is admitted, the premises have been damaged as to light, there will be less compensation payable. The onus of proof to the contrary is on the defendants.

Astbury, Q.C., and Frank Dodd, for the defendants.—The premises now practically belong to the county council, and the plaintiff as reversioner has no right to sue in respect of them. If it be too much to say that the premises are entirely the property of the council, at least the beneficial interest is in them. Certainly it is the duty of the council to take them over, and except as to his compensation the plaintiff has no interest in them. The Act existed at the date of the writ, and the writ was issued thirteen months after the preparation of the scheme. [They referred to sections 4, 5, 6 (sub-section 2), 7, 8, 12, 20, and 21 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890.] [Eve, Q.C., referred to section 8, sub-section 6.] [BYRNE, J.—Until the confirming Act is passed it is clear that the property does not pass.] Further, the plaintiff's premises were unfit for human habitation

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(section 21, sub-section (2)), and therefore in respect of any loss with regard to his lights he cannot get any compensation. But the plaintiff's premises have as a matter of fact suffered no damage; if anything, the erection of our buildings have made his reversion more valuable. The action is premature, as prior to compensation being fixed between the county council and the plaintiff, he cannot say what damage he has sustained. His compensation has yet to be fixed.

MacSwinney, in reply.—It has not been shown that the plaintiff's premises are unfit and not reasonably capable of being made fit for human habitation. In any event he is entitled to the costs of the action, as until the confirmatory Act was passed he did not lose his right to sue. If the court is of the opinion that he has not sustained any damage in respect to reversion he does not ask for an inquiry.

BYRNE, J.—In this case an action has been brought to restrain interference with ancient lights, for a mandatory injunction, and for damages. The action is brought by a reversioner, by whom has been granted a lease of the premises which expires in 1907. It is common ground that at the time when the action was brought he was entitled to sue, though it is not admitted that he was entitled to all the relief that he sought, because a mandatory injunction is part of it, and as to that no admission is made; but what is admitted is that the lights were ancient lights, that there was an interference with them, and that but for the defences that have been taken now at the trial the plaintiff would have been entitled to an inquiry as to damages. No question of an injunction is now raised at all. Now, the matter would, of course, be perfectly clear and obvious upon that, and an inquiry as to damages would have been granted but for the grounds taken by the defendants in the circumstances. The first of these grounds is that the plaintiff, being the owner in reversion, has no title to sue in respect of a house which has been declared unfit for human habitation, and which is to be taken over by the London County Council prior to the reversion falling into possession, and the plaintiff can only get such compensation as he will be entitled to receive under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. The second point taken by them is that, as events turned out, the plaintiff has not, in fact, been injured by the acts of the defendants, but the reversion has in fact been rendered more valuable. And, thirdly, the point was taken that prior to compensation being fixed as between the plaintiff and the London County Council he cannot prove damage, and that the action is premature.

Now, this property forms part of what has been found to be an unhealthy area within the meaning of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. That Act provides for a scheme, for a provisional order, and for an Act confirming it. I need not go on to state in detail the various steps that have been taken; but the confirming Act did not come into operation until the month of June, 1897, and up to that time even after the provisional order has been made, the provisional order is not of any validity unless and until it has been confirmed by Act of Parliament, as is provided in sub-section 6 of section 8 of the Act. Up to the time, therefore, of the confirming Act I am of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to continue the action, and that had the trial taken place before, he would have been entitled to an inquiry as to damages. Section 21, sub-section 1, of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, provides: "Wherever the compensation payable in respect of any lands or of any interests in any lands proposed to be taken compulsorily in pursuance of this part of the Act requires to be assessed"—and I pause to say that the property in this case does form part of the lands proposed to be taken compulsorily in pursuance of that part of the Act—"the estimate of the value of such lands or interests shall be based upon the fair market value as estimated at the time of the valuation being made of such lands, and of the several interests in such lands, due regard being had to the nature and then condition of the property and the duration of the buildings in their existing state and as to the state of repair thereof without any additional allowance in respect of the compulsory purchase of an area, or of any part of an area in respect of which an official representation has been made, or of any lands included in the scheme which in the opinion of the arbitrator have been so included as falling under the description of property which may be constituted an unhealthy area under this part of the Act."

It is argued on the part of the plaintiff, in order to show that he has suffered damage in respect of which he will not get compensation from the London County Council, that the true meaning of sub-section 1(a) is that "the estimate of the value of such lands or interests shall be based upon the fair market value as estimated at the time of the valuation being made of such lands" refers to a period anterior to the provisional order being obtained. It is said that, inasmuch as plans and estimates have to be furnished before such a provisional order can be obtained, the valuation here referred to is the valuation made as a groundwork of, or as a means of arriving at, the estimate in question. In the first place, I do not think that this construction seems a reasonable one, if the words will admit of another construction, because it would be directing the estimate as between the London County Council and the parties seeking compensation to be made upon the valuation of one of those parties only. Sub-section (b) provides that "in such estimate"—that is, the estimate as between those two parties—"any addition to or improvement of the property made after the date of publication in pursuance of this part of the Act shall not (unless such addition or improvement was necessary for the maintenance of the property in a proper state of repair) be included, nor in the case of any interest acquired after the said date shall any separate estimate of the value thereof be made so as to increase the amount of compensation to be paid for the lands." If the view suggested to be put upon sub-section (a) was the true one, it is a little difficult to see why sub-section (b) was required at all, because in making the estimate you would have based it upon the fair market value as at the previous date; therefore it would not have been necessary to say that you were not to take into consideration any addition or improvement made after the date of the publication of the advertisement.

Sub-section 2 of section 21 also, I may observe, bears out this view to some extent, because it provides that "on the occasion of assessing the compensation payable under any improvement scheme in respect of any house or premises situate within an unhealthy area, evidence shall be receivable by the arbitrator to prove" several different things; that evidence being, it is true, in reduction of price; but this is hardly what one would have expected to find if sub-section 1 (a) bore a construction other than what I have indicated.

Now I come to another point—namely, the point that the house is one that has been declared unfit for habitation. Having heard the evidence which has been brought before me on both sides, I am of opinion that it has not been proved at present before me that the house and premises are unfit, and not capable of being made fit, for human habitation. If that be the true view sub-section 2 of clause 2, section 21, which provides that the compensation shall be the value of the land and the materials of the buildings thereon has no application to the present case.

That so far on the one hand gets rid of the plaintiff's contention that he will not get due and proper compensation for his premises, and on the other hand disposes of the question as to whether it has been declared unfit for human habitation.

The second point taken by the defendants, and which they claim to have shown at the trial, is that the reversion of the plaintiff has not been damaged by their acts, but that, in fact, the reversion has been rendered more valuable. Now, without deciding the question whether the reversion has been rendered more valuable or not, which it is probably not necessary for me to decide, I have come to the conclusion that the reversion has not been damaged by the acts of the defendants. That, therefore, disentitles the plaintiff at the trial to an inquiry as to damages, inasmuch at it could have but a fruitless result.

I have said that, although I am not even now certain that technically the plaintiff would not be entitled to an inquiry at his own risk, no proceedings to be taken upon it until after the compensation payable shall have been ascertained; but I think that it would be idle to direct it, and I have not been asked to direct it in the event of my being of opinion that no damages up to the present time are shown; I mean it has not been even suggested to me that there is even a remote possibility that the London County Council, which has imposed upon it the duty of taking this house, would be likely to go to the Legislature in the course of the ensuing session and ask for another Act of Parliament to be passed to enable them not to take this particular house. I think therefore that it would be much too far-fetched and idle a thing to direct any inquiry of that sort.

Then, as to the next point, it was suggested that prior to the compensation being fixed as between the plaintiff and the county council, the plaintiff cannot prove damages, and the action is premature. I am against that defence upon this ground, that the action was not premature. The utmost that can be said is that the trial has been brought on at too premature a date, and that an application ought to have been made for the trial of the action to stand over until after the period to which I have referred.

Now, under these circumstances, what ought I to do with reference to the costs of the action up to and including the date of the trial? Up to the time of the passing of the Act in the month of June, 1897, I am of opinion that the plaintiff was clearly right and was entitled to go on with the action, and that he is not to be prejudiced because he refused an offer, which, as events have turned out, might not possibly have been an unreasonable one for him to have accepted after that date. He was not then in a position to accept, and he was entitled to say, that until the duty had been cast on the county council of paying this compensation, that he was entitled to go on with the action. Then how do matters stand after that? It did occur to me that it might have been reasonable on the part of the plaintiff to have written a letter after the Act was passed, that as events had now turned out, if the defendants would pay the costs of the action, he would not bring the matter to trial. But I do not say that it was incumbent upon him to do this. An offer had been made to him without prejudice, and it had been refused. No new offer was made after the period at which the defendants would have been entitled to say that the plaintiff was unreasonable in refusing it. I should also add that the plaintiff was entitled to bring his action to trial for the purpose of having the question of costs disposed of; and, under these circumstances, although by reason of events which happened long subsequently to the issue of the writ in this action, the plaintiff is not now in a position to ask for more than what would be a nominal and idle inquiry as to damages—which for that reason I do not direct, and which he, therefore, very properly does not ask for in the event of my being of that opinion—I think it only right that he should have his costs. There will, therefore, be no order, except that the defendants pay the costs of the action up to and including the trial.

WATSON (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) v. SANDIE & HULL. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Trade exercised within the United Kingdom—Foreigner resident abroad—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 42—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.

Provision merchants in America consigned goods for sale on commission to the respondents, commission merchants in England. The goods were invoiced in the name of the respondents, who sold the goods and received the proceeds, rendering an account to the merchants in America. The respondents, beyond their charges and commission, made no profit or gain out of the sales.

Held, that the merchants in America exercised a trade within the United Kingdom within Schedule D. of the Income Tax Act, 1853, s. 2, and that the respondents, their agents in England, were assessable to the income tax in respect of the profits arising therefrom.

Case stated by General Commissioners of Income Tax for the Division of Liverpool.

Two assessments for income tax were made upon the respondents—viz., £500 for the year ended the 5th of April, 1895, and £1,000 for the year ended the 5th of April, 1896. The assessments were made in respect of annual profits alleged to have arisen from a trade exercised within the United Kingdom by Messrs. Squire & Co., of Boston, U.S.A., whose agents the respondents were alleged to be.

Messrs. Squire & Co. were packers and provision merchants who owned or purchased live stock, which they converted into provisions in Boston. The provisions thus manufactured were for the most part consumed in America, but the surplus was exported by Messrs. Squire & Co. to this and other countries. The respondents were commission merchants. Messrs. Squire & Co. made consignments to them for sale, on commission, of lard and bacon, being a part of the surplus provisions exported by Messrs. Squire & Co. The respondents received no remuneration beyond the usual charges and commission. There was no agreement between Messrs. Squire & Co. and the respondents, and Messrs. Squire & Co. might at any time discontinue their consignments. With each consignment Messrs. Squire & Co. sent forward consignment notes, showing in detail the amount drawn against each lot of goods making up the consignment, and bills of lading with the draft attached. The respondents took up the drafts and realized the goods. Sometimes the draft exceeded the prices realized, and sometimes the prices realized exceeded the draft.

The risk of profit or loss rested with Messrs. Squire & Co. The respondents had full discretion as to the prices at which the goods were sold. They invoiced the goods in their own name, received the proceeds of sale, assumed all responsibility of payment by the purchasers, and from time to time rendered statements to Messrs. Squire & Co., showing full receipts and debiting the account with their charges and commission. They remitted to, or drew upon, Messrs. Squire & Co. for the credit or debit balance, as the case might be.

The income tax was claimed under the Income Tax Act, 1842, s. 41, and the Income Tax Act, 1853, s. 2, Schedule D.

The commissioners discharged the assessments.

The Crown appealed.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G. (Sir Robert Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins with him).—The case comes within the Income Tax Act, 1853, s. 2, Schedule D.: "For and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of her Majesty or not, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom." Erichsen v. Last, 30 W. R. 301, 8 Q. B. D. 414; Tischler v. Apthorpe, 33 W. R. 548, 52 L. T. Rep. 814; Pommery v. Apthorpe, 35 W. R. 307; Werle & Co. v. Colquhoun, 36 W. R. 613, 20 Q. B. D. 753; Grainger v. Gough, 44 W. R. 561, [1896] A. C. 325; Sully v. Attorney-General, 8 W. R. 472, 5 H. & N. 340.

A. T. Lawrence Q.C. (James Fox with him).—The decision of the commissioners is correct. The respondents were carrying on business in the United Kingdom on their own account, and not as agents for Messrs. Squire & Co.: Bank of Ireland v. Livingstone, 3 W. R. 573, 5 H. L. Cas. 389. The respondents bought the goods from Messrs. Squire & Co. at prices which were ultimately fixed by the sub-sales. The contracts between Messrs. Squire & Co. and the respondents, from which the profits arose, were made abroad. In sending over the goods Messrs. Squire & Co. made an offer which was accepted by the respondents taking up the bills of lading. No case has gone so far as it is contended this should go. In all the cases cited the merchant was ostensibly carrying on his business in the United Kingdom. [GRANTHAM, J.—Who is liable for the loss if the goods are lost in transitu?] Nobody, according to the facts as stated in the case. It would, no doubt, be a loss incident to the contract made by Squire & Co.

GRANTHAM, J.—In this case we are of opinion that Messrs. Squire & Co. do exercise a trade within the United Kingdom, and that, consequently, they are, through their agents, liable to be assessed.

The question is really dependent upon the way in which the case is stated, for it seems to me, and I think to my learned brother also, that Mr. Lawrence's contention cannot be permitted on the facts as stated in this case. Mr. Lawrence assumes, in his argument, that the property in the goods passed to the respondents when they arrived here. I think the property did not pass. The goods were only consigned by Squire & Co. to the order of the respondents, but they remained the goods of Squire & Co. The respondents were under no obligation until they had sold the goods and received the proceeds. Suppose that Squire & Co. had overdrawn on the value of the goods. Suppose the goods were worth £3,000, and Squire & Co. drew to the extent of £4,000, were the respondents bound to take the bill of lading under the payment of £4,000? I should say, certainly not. At any rate, if they were, they would not be liable to make up the loss. That is a fair way of testing the matter. If the goods became the goods of the respondents the moment they left America, the respondents must have taken them whatever their value was, and must have paid whatever draft had been granted upon them by the bankers in America. But I do not think that anybody would suggest for a moment that the respondents would be under such a liability as that.

A great many cases with reference to trade carried on in the United Kingdom have been cited, but none of them is so strong as the present one. In nearly all the wine cases the goods, the subject of the contracts, were either in France or Germany until the contract had been made. But in the present case the goods were in the United Kingdom before any dealing with regard to them took place, and it therefore cannot be denied that a trading on which profit and loss depended took place in regard to them in the United Kingdom.

It is true that they were invoiced ultimately in the name of the respondents, but until they were sold they seem to me to remain the property of Messrs. Squire & Co. That being so, there is a dealing with the goods in this country by a foreign principal through the intervention of an agent in the person of the respondents. Under those circumstances it seems to me that all the authorities which have been quoted confirm the view that we have arrived at. The case of Sully v. The Attorney-General, which is relied on, is very much in favour of this view, because it was there held that people buying goods here for the purpose of making a profit on them in America were not liable to pay income tax on the ground that the profit was not made here. That is exactly the converse of this case. The goods are either bought or manufactured in America, and are then sent here to be dealt with in the way that has been mentioned. For these reasons our judgment will be for the Crown.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the principles have been perfectly well settled by the numerous cases upon this subject, and the only question is the application of them to the facts of this case.

If Mr. Lawrence could have made out that the respondents purchased from Squire & Co. at a price to be ascertained by reference to the subsequent sub-sales, that might have raised a very difficult question as to whether there was any trade carried on by Squire & Co.; but the only thing he has got to support that contention is that the ultimate sub-sales of these consignments are made by the respondents in their own name, and under such circumstances that as between themselves and the buyer the respondents are probably principals upon the presumption which exists that in such cases credit is usually given to the agent in this country, he being treated as the principal, and not to the foreigner who is the real principal. But it seems to me that that is a mere presumption, and the consideration that as between the parties to the contract the respondents would be treated as the principals, does not in the least, for all purposes in which we are concerned, prevent our dealing with the matter on the footing that Squire & Co. are the real principals and the respondents agents, though the contract is made by the respondents in their own name. On these grounds the case seems to me clearly to come within the decided cases.

Appeal allowed.

SMITH v. GALLOWAY. (a.)

Friendly society—Alteration of rules—New rule made under statutory powers—Continuance of rule after repeal of statute—Effect of subsequent alterations on members' vested rights.

A friendly society established in 1842, which had no provision in its rules for the alteration of its rules, made a new rule under the statutory power given by section 27 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, to alter or make new rules, the rule being in these terms: "No new rule shall be made, nor any of the rules herein contained or hereafter to be made, shall be amended, altered, or rescinded, unless with the consent of a majority of the members present at a general meeting."

Held, that, having regard to section 6 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, this rule continued in force notwithstanding the repeal in 1875 of the Act of 1855, under which it was made; that the rule conferred upon the society and kept alive the power to alter, amend, or make new rules; that members who joined the society when such rule was in force were bound by subsequent alterations properly made under the rule; and that under it the society had power to make an alteration of rules imposing upon members who were already in receipt of superannuation allowance, conditions for breaches of which they might lose their allowance.

Case stated by arbitrators under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

The Hearts of Oak Benefit Society was a friendly society established in 1842 under the Acts then in force relating to friendly societies, and the rules of the society were duly registered and certified under the Acts on the 6th of July, 1842.

No provision was made in the rules for the alteration of the same, but under the powers conferred by section 27 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, the rules were altered in the year 1866, and such alterations were duly registered and certified on the 6th of April, 1866, by the registrar of friendly societies.

Amongst the alterations so made was the introduction of a rule in the words following:

"Alteration of Rules."

Rule 50. "That no new rule shall be made nor any of the rules herein contained or hereafter to be made shall be amended, altered, or rescinded unless with the consent of a majority of the members present at a general meeting of the society specially called for the purpose."

No further alterations were made in the rules of the society until after the year 1875, when the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, was repealed by the Friendly Societies Act, 1875; but since that date the rules had been frequently altered and amended, and all such alterations and amendments had been duly registered under the Acts.

The rule above referred to (rule 30) had never been rescinded, but in one of the earlier amendments of the rules of the society registered under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, it was altered so as to be, and had ever since been, in the words following:

"Alteration of Rules."

Rule 53. "No new rule shall be made nor any of the rules herein contained or hereafter to be made shall be amended, altered, and rescinded unless with the consent of three-fourths of the delegates present at a meeting specially called for the purpose. Notice of any such amendment, alteration, or rescission shall be forthwith sent to the registrar of friendly societies in the manner provided by the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, and the same shall not be valid until it has been registered."

In June, 1869, Walter Smith applied for admission to the society, and he was approved by the committee and declared to be admitted a member of the society and was then supplied with a book containing his name and registered number and a copy of the rules as altered in 1866.

In May, 1890, Smith declared on the sick fund of the society and he received sick allowance under the rules for the time being in force until the 2nd of September, 1891, when he was, in accordance with such rules, placed on the list for reduced allowance, termed the superannuated list, and he received such reduced allowance until he was excluded from the society as hereinafter mentioned.

By the rules any member on the sick fund was subject to conditions for breach of which he was liable to be excluded from the society, but such conditions did not apply to members on the superannuated list.

In 1896 the rules of the society were altered with the consent of three-fourths of the delegates present at a meeting specially called for the purpose, and notice of such alterations was forthwith sent to the registrar of friendly societies, and such alterations were duly registered on the 4th of February, 1896. Such alterations proposed to make members of the society on the superannuated list under the age of sixty years subject to the conditions applicable to members on the sick fund, and liable equally with such last-mentioned members to be excluded from the society for breach of such conditions.

In January, 1897, Smith, who was then under the age of sixty years, was, under the rules as so altered, excluded from the society for breaches of one of the said conditions—namely, for being from home on three or more occasions after seven o'clock in the evening, that is, after the hour allowed by the rules applicable to members on the sick fund.

At the time of such breaches Smith had had notice of the alterations, and then well knew that by the terms of the altered rules, if they applied to him, he was subject to the said conditions and liable to be excluded from the society for such breaches.

In consequence of such exclusion a dispute arose between Smith and the society, and such dispute was in accordance with the rules of the society, submitted to arbitration, in the course of which Smith admitted the breaches of the said condition for which he had been excluded from the society, but he contended that the society had no power to alter the rules after the repeal of the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, and that, if they had, he was not bound by the alterations made in the rules in February, 1896, and was therefore not liable to be excluded from the society for the said breaches.

Upon these contentions Thomas Galloway (secretary of the society), on behalf of the society, applied to the arbitrators to state a case for the opinion of the court on the questions raised.

The questions of law for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Whether the society had power, after the repeal of the Friendly Societies Act. 1855. to alter the rules, and

---

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

(2) Whether, if so, the said Walter Smith was bound by the alterations registered on the 4th of February, 1896, and subject to the conditions thereby made applicable to members of the society on the superannuated lists.

Sells, for the plaintiff.—The society had no power to alter their rules until the Friendly Societies Act, 1855, gave them the power. Section 27 of that Act gave power to alter, amend, or rescind rules, or to make new rules. Under that section the society altered their rules by the introduction of rule 50. The Act of 1855 was repealed by the Friendly Societies Act, 1875—which in turn has been repealed by the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, and the Collecting Societies, &c., Act, 1896—and upon the repeal of section 27, under which rule 50 was made, rule 50 was repealed also, and ceased to have any operation. That being so, rule 53 and the subsequent alteration in February, 1896, were invalid, and were not binding upon the members who had not assented thereto. As to the first question, therefore, when rule 50 ceased to be operative in 1875, the society had no power, either by their own constitution or by statute (as the Act of 1875 gave no power to alter) or by rule, to alter their rules. As to the second question, even if the society had power to alter their rules, they had no power to make an alteration the effect of which was to take away from the plaintiff a vested right which he already had under the rules in force. At the time when the alteration of February, 1896, was introduced imposing conditions upon those in receipt of superannuation allowance, the plaintiff had become entitled and was in receipt of the allowance. Such a rule, therefore, was ultra vires: Auld v. Glasgow Working Men's Building Society, 35 W. R. 632; 12 App. Cas. 197; In re Norwich and Norfolk Building Society, 24 W. R. 103, 1 Ch. D. 481.

E. Morten (A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., with him), for the defendant.—Although the Act of 1855 was repealed in 1875 rule 50 was still in force. There is not the slightest reason for the suggestion that because the Act of 1855 was repealed, therefore rule 50, made under that Act, ceased to be in force. Rule 50 was in force when the plaintiff joined the society in 1869. It gave the society power to alter their rules, and the plaintiff by assenting to rule 50 when he joined the society must be taken to have assented to this power to alter rules, and is bound by that. Rule 50 gave power of alteration, and although the Act of 1875 repealed the Act of 1855, yet section 6 of the Act of 1875 provided that existing societies and their rules then in force should continue in force until altered or amended, and this is made clear by section 13 and the second schedule. Rule 50 remained in force, and under it rule 53 was made, and under rule 53 the alteration of February, 1896, was made. The plaintiff was therefore bound by these alterations, and no vested right was taken away other than what the society had power to deal with: Stooke v. Mutual Provident Alliance, Times, Jan. 22, 1891; Strohmenger v. Finsbury Permanent Investment Building Society, ante, p. 69, [1897] 2 Ch. 469; Wilson v. Miles Platting Building Society, 37 W. R. 369, note, 22 Q. B. D. 381, note.

Sells, in reply.

WRIGHT, J.—The first point made is that rule 50, which was in operation when the plaintiff joined the society, and which authorized further alterations of the rules, had ceased to exist because the Act of 1855 has been repealed. That contention hardly deserves any answer, but the obvious answer is that when the Act of 1855, under which that rule was made, was repealed by the Act of 1875, the Act of 1875 provided that existing societies and their rules as existing in 1875 should continue in force until altered or amended. The Act of 1855, in section 27, gave power to amend rules, and in pursuance of that power, as the case expressly finds, rule 50 was made before the plaintiff joined the society. The Act of 1855 has been repealed, but continuing provisions have been made in the Act of 1875, as section 6 of that Act provides that existing societies shall be deemed to be existing societies under this Act, and their rules shall continue in force until they are altered or amended, and section 13 and the second schedule contain rules as to the mode of making the alterations. It is idle to suggest that rule 50 has disappeared merely because the Act under which it was made has been repealed by another Act to the like effect. Rule 50 remained in force and kept alive for the society the right to make alterations, and the alterations properly made are therefore binding upon the society. The second question is whether the rules of February, 1896, are ultra vires on the ground that at the time when they were made the plaintiff was entitled to a benefit from the society, and that the effect of the rules of February, 1896, would be to diminish his security for that benefit—namely, by imposing conditions for breaches of which he would forfeit his right to a superannuation allowance. It appears to me that there is no ground for saying that the alteration was ultra vires. The plaintiff joined the society on the basis that the rules might be altered. The alteration made is the ordinary kind of alteration which is constantly made in the conduct of these societies. The distinction seems to me to be plain. Where the only contract between a society and a member is the original contract under which he became a member, and that contract, as in this case, provides for alterations of the rules, then the member is bound by any alterations of the rules. Where there is an additional contract, as in the case of a society where the member has a mortgage, or where anything has been added to the contract, as in the case of Auld v. Glasgow Working Men's Building Society, then it is not competent for the society, by alterations of the rules without the assent of the member, to alter the effect of that second contract, because the member has not agreed to the alteration of that second contract. But as regards the alteration in this case of the original contract the plaintiff did agree to that when he joined; and the mere fact of his joining was an assent on his part to future alterations of the rules.

KENNEDY, J.—I entirely agree, and for the reasons stated.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 27.—The judgment of the court (Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., POLLOCK, B.,* and HAWKINS, LAWRANCE, and COLLINS, JJ.) was delivered by Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The prisoners were indicted and convicted for an offence under the provisions of the Conspiracy and Property Protection Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 7, for having, with a view to compel one William Eten to abstain from doing that which he had a legal right to do—that is to say, from performing a contract which he had entered into with the owner of the steamship Lesraulx to serve as a seaman on board the said ship—intimidated the said William Eten, and watched and beset the place where he was, and followed him with others in a disorderly manner.

The facts which were proved, and not disputed by the prisoners' counsel, were as follows:

William Eten, together with Henry Chandler and James Owen, signed articles on board the steamship Lesraulx, then lying under a coaling tip in Penarth Dock. Articles were signed on board the vessel, instead of at the shipping office as usual because the owners of the Lesraulx were paying a lower rate of wages than that allowed by the Seamen and Firemen's Union, and in consequence of apprehended violence from the members of the union. On coming ashore, the prisoners, together with a number of other persons who had been waiting on the dock side, surrounded them, and it was proved that they were intimidated and assaulted by the prisoners who followed them in company with the others for a distance of some 300 yards. There was evidence that the prisoners followed the sea as a calling, each of them having been engaged as a fireman on board steamships, but on the day in question they were not engaged or employed as firemen or seamen on board ship. It was not shown when either of them had been last so employed or engaged, but they followed the sea as an occupation.

At the conclusion of the case for the prosecution, the counsel for the prisoners submitted that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the indictment on the ground that, by section 16 of the Conspiracy and Property Protection Act, it is provided that "this Act shall not apply to seamen or apprentices to the sea service," and that, therefore, the prisoners could not be convicted. For the prosecution it was contended that the term "seamen" in the Conspiracy and Property Protection Act applied only to seamen actually engaged or employed on board ship within the definition in the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 and 1894—namely (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 2, and (57 & 58 Vict. c. 66), s. 742.

The learned judge, Ridley, J., directed the jury that for the purposes of this case the defendants were not within the exception contained in section 16, and they were convicted and sentenced accordingly. The sole question, therefore, for the opinion of the court is, What is the proper construction to be put upon the word "seaman" as used in section 16 of the Act of 1875?

If there were no reason to the contrary "seaman" might well be construed in its largest sense as meaning a sea-faring man or person whose ordinary occupation is that of a seaman, just as a person whose usual vocation is that of a carpenter is so-called although he may be out of employment at the particular time. In construing an Act of Parliament, however, it is necessary to inquire into the intention of the Legislature giving just effect to the language employed, having regard to the object in view and taking into account other legislation bearing on the question.

The question at once arises, Why are seamen excepted from the provisions of the Act and not carpenters or any other workmen or artificers? If "seaman" means "seafaring man" it would be difficult to suggest any reason for so large an exception, whereas, if it is taken in the limited sense of the definition in the Merchant Shipping Acts, a reason for such exception might possibly be found in the special legislation of those Acts applicable to the limited class of seamen as therein defined. If, for instance, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, contained a series of clauses similar in principle to those which are found in the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, but by their language specially adapted to the case of sailors in actual employment, the distinction would be obvious and the argument in favour of the prosecution would be irresistible.

But although the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, as to sailors in actual employment are not similar to those which are contained in the Conspiracy Act, 1875, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, does contain provisions which have an importain bearing upon the determination of the present case.

By the interpretation clause of the Merchant Shipping Act (section 2) it is enacted that "seaman shall include every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship."

By section 243, which deals with offences of seamen and their punishment, sub-section 4, it is provided that "For wilful disobedience to any lawful command a seaman shall be liable to imprisonment for any period not exceeding four weeks, with or without hard labour, and also at the discretion of the court to forfeit out of his wages a sum not exceeding two days' pay." By section 257 it is provided that "Every person who by any means whatever persuades or attempts to persuade any seaman or apprentice to neglect or refuse to join or to proceed to sea in or to desert from his ship, or otherwise to absent himself from his duty, shall for each such offence in respect of each such seaman or apprentice incur a penalty not exceeding ten pounds."

These provisions create a wide distinction between a seaman actually employed or engaged under the Merchant Shipping Act and a mere seafaring man not so actually employed or engaged, and the status of the former is thereby rendered very different from that of the latter. With reference to the offence dealt with by the Conspiracy Act, 1875, the captain of a vessel possesses ample power to deal with a seaman under his command. He may require him as a lawful command under section 243, sub-section 4, to abstain from intimidation, or if a seaman persuades or attempts to persuade another seaman to neglect or refuse to join or to proceed to sea in or to absent himself from his duty, he may summon him for the penalty. Under these circumstances the Legislature may well have considered the mischief dealt with by the Conspiracy Act, 1875, already sufficiently provided against, and have declined to add a cumulative remedy. It was suggested in argument that a difficulty might arise in determining whether a seaman was "employed or engaged," and also whether, as the Act adds the words "on board any ship," a seaman would be liable if he committed the alleged illegal acts ashore. These objections have no real foundation, as the employment or engagement must be decided as a fact in each case, and a seaman may well be held to be employed or engaged on board a ship, although at the particular point of time he may have been sent ashore on duties connected with the ship, such as obtaining stores or provisions or taking a letter to the ship's agent. What is found in the case as to the prisoners is that "there was evidence that they followed the sea as a calling, each of them having been employed or engaged as fireman or seaman on board ship. It was not shown when either of them had been last so employed or engaged, but they followed the sea as an occupation." It is consistent with this that they had been out of employment for months, and they appear to have had no immediate or certain prospect of a future engagement. It would be strange if the Legislature intended to exclude such persons from the legislation of 1875, as well as from that of the Merchant Shipping Acts.

On the whole, therefore, it appears that at the date of the passing of the Act of 1875 the Legislature had already in an earlier statute defined what it meant by "seaman"; that the explanation of their exclusion from the later Acts must be sought in the fact that they were already the subject of special enactments giving another remedy for some of the matters included in the latter statute, and that no ground of reason or common sense can be found for excluding from the operation of the Act in question the whole class of seafaring men not actually engaged in sea service.

Under the circumstances we think the view taken by the learned judge at the trial was correct, and the conviction must be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

In re PIERS.
Ex parte PIERS v. READ. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Amendment — Secured creditor— Omission to value security arising from inadvertence —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), schedule 1, r. 10.

A secured creditor who has valued his security at nil owing to a mistaken idea as to its value, and has voted in respect of his whole debt, cannot afterwards be allowed to amend his proof by altering the valuation of his security, because such mistaken valuation cannot be said to have arisen from inadvertence.

Application by C. P. Piers, the assignee of Turnbull, a secured creditor in the bankruptcy, for leave to amend his proof by altering the valuation of his security from nil to the full amount of the debt proved for.

Turnbull, owing to false information as to the value of his security, had valued it at nil, and had voted at a meeting of creditors in respect of the full amount of his debt. He subsequently assigned his debt to C. P. Piers, who discovered that the security was equal in value to the whole amount of the debt, and now applied for leave to amend his proof.

A. G. McIntyre, for Piers.

E. A. Nepean (Reed, Q.C., with him), for Read, another creditor.—This amendment ought not to be allowed, for there was no omission to value the security arising from inadvertence within the meaning of rule 10 of schedule 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: "For the purpose of voting, a secured creditor, shall, unless he surrenders his security, state in his proof the particulars of his security, the date when it was given, and the value at which he assesses it, and shall be entitled to vote only in respect of the balance, if any, due to him, after deducting the value of his security. If he votes in respect of his whole debt he shall be deemed to have surrendered his security unless the court on application is satisfied that the omission to value the security has arisen from inadvertence." In the present case the creditor did not omit to value his security through "inadvertence," for he deliberately elected to value it at nil.

He cited Ex parte Clarke, In re Burr, 40 W. R. 608, 67 L. T. Rep. 232.

Kent, for other creditors.—I submit that the present applicant has no locus standi here, because Turnbull, having voted in respect of his whole debt, was "deemed to have surrendered his security," and had no interest in it which he could assign to Piers. [WRIGHT, J.—I think there was an omission to value the security; the question is whether that omission arose from "inadvertence."]

McIntyre, in reply.—It was equivalent to "inadvertence," for Turnbull had no chance of learning any more about the value of his security at the date when he sent in his proof. As to the other point, Turnbull still had the debt which he could assign to Piers, even though he had lost the security.

WRIGHT, J.—I have come to the conclusion that the omission to value in this case did not arise from "inadvertence," and I am fortified in my opinion by the case of Ex parte Clarke, In re Burr. "Inadvertence" is a peculiar and unusual word to find in an Act of Parliament, and I cannot construe it as the opposite of what it really means, which is the contrary to deliberate election, that a man never meant to do what he really did.

I think I could get over Mr. Kent's point, as Turnbull could in any case assign the debt.

Application refused.

GOSLING v. GASKELL. (a.)

Company—Receiver—Principal and agent—Liability for goods ordered.

By an indenture of second mortgage all the land and property, and all the business and undertaking of a limited company were conveyed to the appellant as trustee for the second debenture-holders. By this deed it was provided that the trustee might appoint a receiver of the mortgaged premises, who should have power to enter into possession and carry on the business, and that the person so appointed should be the agent of the company, who alone should be liable for his acts and defaults. The trustee appointed K. receiver, the instrument appointing him containing certain regulations as to payment of money received into the appellant's bank, and that cheques drawn by him should be countersigned by the appellant's solicitor, who was also chairman of the company. Immediately after his appointment the receiver entered into possession and carried on the business, and goods were ordered by him signed in the company's name, with the addition "K., Receiver." Soon after the appointment of the receiver, an order was made for the compulsory winding up of the company, and a liquidator was appointed, who, however, did not displace the receiver. K. continued to carry on the business, and, in the course of doing so, ordered goods from the respondents in the above-mentioned form.

Held, in an action brought by the respondents against the trustee for the price of the goods supplied to the receiver's order, that the receiver was agent for the mortgagors (the company), and that the trustee was under no liability.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1896], 1 Q. B. 669) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, [1896] 1 Q. B. 669, 44 W. R. Dig. 132 (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J.; Rigby, L.J., dissenting), affirming a decision of the Lord Chief Justice.

The appellant Gosling and another (defendants in the action) were trustees for second debenture-holders under an indenture of mortgage dated the 18th of May, 1892, under which in certain events they could (and did) appoint a receiver to carry on the business mortgaged.

The action was brought by the respondents, Gaskell and others, against the said trustees (one of whom died before service of the writ), for £488 odd, being the balance unpaid of the price of goods supplied by Gaskell and others to the receiver appointed by the trustees.

The respondents obtained judgment against the appellant, and this decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The facts are given very fully in Lord Watson's judgment.

The House took time for consideration.

July 27.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—I am of opinion that this case is covered by authority. The case of Cox v. Hickman in this House (8 W. R. 754, 8 H. L. Cas. 268) appears to me expressly in point. Before that case was decided, I could have well understood the arguments presented to your lordships on this appeal on the part of the respondents; but it appears to me to be too late now to take up the position, which was then very plausibly occupied.

The facts in this case are complicated to some extent, by one of the parties being a company, but in truth there is nothing in that circumstance which can alter the application of the law. A company called Poole & White (Limited) had borrowed a large sum of money upon a mortgage of the whole property of the company to certain trustees, who, among other powers given to them, were entitled to enter into possession of the property mortgaged for the purpose of paying to certain debenture-holders the loan, and handing over to the company whatever should remain after the debt and the sums due upon debentures had been paid. In certain events, which happened, the trustees in pursuance of this power entered into possession, and in pursuance of the same power appointed a receiver to take possession of the property and to carry on the business of the company.

Some months after the date of the mortgage a Mr. Kelly, the receiver so appointed, was put into possession of the property mortgaged, and for a period of between two and three years carried on the business of the company. If during the period of so carrying on the business of the company Mr. Kelly or the trustees had been personally sued, the exact question which arose in Cox v. Hickman would have arisen, and though I shall proceed to discuss what happened afterwards I believe the statement might stop there so far as the decision of the present case is concerned.

It is the fact that Mr. Kelly, on behalf of the trustees, ordered goods and incurred liabilities on behalf of someone in the conduct of the business, and I could well understand that but for Cox v. Hickman it might very reasonably have been argued that the trustees here, like the creditors and their agent there, were carrying on a business for their own profit; and the agency, such as it was, might well have been held to bind the persons entering into these trading operations as partners in the business. As Blackburn, J., in that case said: "It was very reasonable that those sought to be charged in Cox v. Hickman had authorized the managers of the business that was being carried on to bind them, as it was an incident attached by law to a participation in the profits that such authority is given to those managing the concern." What Lord Cranworth says seems to me to be the answer to the argument in that case, as it is the answer to the argument here. His lordship says: "It seems to me to follow that the mere coincidence of creditors in an arrangement under which they permit their debtor, or trustees for their debtor, to continue his trade, applying the profits in discharge of their demands, does not make them partners with their debtor, or the trustees. The debtor is still the person solely interested in the profits, save only that he has mortgaged them to his creditors. He receives the benefit of the profits as they accrue, though he has precluded himself from applying them to any other purpose than the discharge of his debts. The trade is not carried on by or on account of the creditors, though their consent is necessary in such a case, for without it all the property might be seized by them in execution; but the trade still remains the trade of the debtor or his trustees; the debtor or the trustees are the persons by or on behalf of whom it is carried on." This is the principle, and I am wholly unable to distinguish the reasoning of the noble and learned lord from the propositions of law that are applicable to this case.

After the period of Mr. Kelly's management an order was made for winding-up the company under the provisions of the Companies Acts, and no difference was made in the management of the business, or in the mode in which it was carried on after that order was made. For some reason or another which I have not been able to follow, it is apparently assumed that immediately on the winding-up order, Mr. Kelly, who it is assumed had been up to that time the agent for the company (as indeed he was so described, and as by the terms of the mortgage deed he was bound to be), suddenly became the agent of the trustees. That no new authority was, in fact, given to Mr. Kelly is admitted, but why the making of the order to wind up the company should suddenly convert Mr. Kelly, who was there as the agent of the company, into the agent of the trustees is a problem that I have not been able to solve.

There is a circumstance which appears to me to be absolutely irrelevant, but which, as it is relied on, it is proper to notice—namely, that one of the conditions on which the security should become enforceable, and under which it was enforced, was that if in the opinion of the trustees the security should become endangered they, the trustees, should appoint a receiver, and that when they had appointed a receiver that receiver was to open an account with the bank in which the trustees themselves were partners, and all moneys received by the receiver appointed must immediately be paid into that bank, and when cheques were drawn by him on the account so created, a Mr. Tryon, the solicitor for the trustees, was to countersign the cheques. Mr. Tryon was chairman of the company. As I have said, this fact is irrelevant. The fact of the trustees keeping a check upon the mode in which the produce of the trade carried on was dealt with (which was all that was done by this provision) appears to me to reflect no light whatever on the relation of the trustees to outside creditors, who were supplying goods to the receiver of Poole & White (Limited).

As I have pointed out before, but for Cox v. Hickman it might well have been argued that the trustees, though called trustees in the deed, were really managers, and as far as the management of the concern went, the mere agents of the creditors, who had the entire control over them, and as Crompton, J., (in Cox v. Hickman, p. 291) actually asked: "In what, then, does the present case differ from that of ten persons setting up a new business in the names of two or three managers, they having to divide all the profits? The present case, indeed, is not even one of a trading in the names of the managers, but in a name which may comprehend any partners, and the clause of the deed so much relied on by the plaintiffs in error, which stipulates that they shall carry it on in the name of the Stanton Iron Co., must surely be quite inoperative as to any limitation of the liability to such persons when the rule of law is so well recognized that no agreement amongst partners can prevent the liability to third persons arising from the participation of profits. I can see no hardship under this particular deed in the creditors, who are to have the profits, being liable for the funds and goods from which the profits are to be made, except the general hardship of large liability from small investments, attempted to be remedied by the Limited Liability Acts."

The answer is the one which I have already quoted from Lord Cranworth, and if I were to substitute the word "company" for the word "debtor" in Lord Cranworth's language, every word of that very learned judge's observations would be applicable in this case. The company is still the person solely interested in the profits, save only that it has mortgaged them to its creditors. It receives the benefit of the profits as they accrue, though it has precluded itself from applying them to any other purpose than the discharge of its debts. The trade is not carried on by or on account of the creditors, though their consent is necessary in such a case, but the trade still remains the trade of the company. The company is the person by or on whose behalf the business is carried on.

I am not able to understand in what way the winding-up order is supposed to have affected the persons now sued. I am not aware that there is anything in proof which shows that they accepted any other liability than that which they had already incurred, whatever that liability was. No specific act of adoption of any order given subsequently to the winding-up is even suggested. If the agent was acting under a misapprehension that he still could have the authority of the company to carry on the trade it would not make those who originally appointed him in pursuance of the powers of the deed liable for his acts. They appointed him as they were entitled to appoint him, under the express powers of the deed, and if the argument addressed to your lordships were to prevail, that the authority of the company can no longer be invoked to sanction the trading, inasmuch as his power to trade with the company had ceased with the winding-up order, it could not operate to involve the trustees in a new liability without their knowledge. It could not be said that they were the real proprietors of the business, even if, as two of the learned judges say, the company had ceased to exist. It was not and it never could be their business. Anything that their authorized trading had procured in the way of profit would not have belonged to them; but though, even if unauthorized, it was carried on ostensibly for and on behalf of the company, and if they neither professed to be the principals nor were in fact the principals, I do not understand how they can be made principals.

Under the circumstances I am of opinion that the judgments of the courts below were wrong, and I think this appeal ought to be allowed, and the respondents ought to be made to pay the costs both here and below.

Lord WATSON.—The present appellant and the deceased William Cunliffe Gosling were trustees under an indenture of mortgage, executed upon the 18th of May, 1892, by Poole & White (Limited) for the security of their second debenture-holders. The company had borrowed the sum of £11,000 upon three series of debentures—the first issue being for £7,000, the second for £3,000, and the third for £1,000, which were charged upon the whole assets of the company, present and future, with the exception of its uncalled capital.

By the deed of the 18th of May, 1892, the company mortgaged these assets to the trustees, with certain powers, of which two only need be referred to for the purposes of this case. By the first of these, the trustees, in the event of the security becoming enforceable in the sense defined by the deed, were empowered to enter into possession of and release the subjects mortgaged, accounting for the proceeds realized to the debenture-holders, and to the company for any surplus which might remain after satisfying their debt. By the second, although the security should not have become enforceable in terms of the deed, the trustees were authorized, upon their certifying that, in their opinion, it was endangered, to appoint a receiver who was to enter into possession of the assets mortgaged and to carry on the business of the company. It was made an express condition of the exercise of that power that "any person so appointed shall be the agent of the company, who alone shall be liable for his acts and defaults." No power was conferred upon the trustees, in any event, to conduct the business themselves.

On the 22nd of July, 1892, the trustees certified, by a writing under their hand, that in their opinion the security was endangered; and by the same writing they appointed William John Kelly to be receiver of all and singular the property and rights mortgaged, with all the powers conferred by the indenture, whether expressly or by implication. A proviso was added which does not occur in the indenture, to the effect that the receiver should open an account with a bank, in which the trustees had a partnership interest, into which all moneys received by him were to be paid on the day of their receipt, and also that the bank should not honour any cheques drawn by him on that account unless they were countersigned by John Tryon. Mr. Tryon was a member of a firm of solicitors who acted for the trustees in these transactions between them and Poole & White (Limited). He was also the chairman of that company, and the holder of its third issue of debentures.

The company accepted and gave immediate effect to the appointment of the trustees by putting Mr. Kelly into possession of its assets, and transferring to him the conduct of its business. From that time until February, 1895, Mr. Kelly continued to carry on the business as the "receiver of Poole & White (Limited)."

On the 1st of September, 1892, a petition was presented to the High Court of Justice for the winding up of Poole & White (Limited), and on the 14th of that month the court ordered that the company should be wound up by the court under the provisions of the Companies Acts. The official receiver became liquidator of the company, and subsequently Mr. Wilding was appointed liquidator in his place. Neither the liquidator nor the first debenture-holders interfered in any way with Mr. Kelly's management of the company's business, which went on after the liquidation order in precisely the same manner as it had done before, with this single variation, that in September, 1893, the counter-signature of Mr. Tryon was dispensed with, and the bank thereafter honoured cheques drawn by the receiver upon his account.

This action was brought by the respondents against both trustees under the indenture of the 18th of May, 1892 (one of whom, the late William Cunliffe Gosling, died before service of the writ), for the sum of £448 9s. 3d., being the balance still unpaid of the price of goods supplied at various times to Mr. Kelly in his capacity of receiver for Poole & White (Limited) between the 5th of December, 1893, and the 31st of January, 1895. They have obtained judgment against the appellant for that amount with costs, before the Lord Chief Justice of England, sitting without a jury, and his decision has been affirmed by a majority of the Court of Appeal, consisting of the Master of the Rolls and Lopes, L.J., Rigby, L.J., dissenting.

It is not part of the respondents' case, and it was not maintained by their counsel at your lordships' bar, that the appellant and his co-trustee were either real or ostensible partners of the concern carried on by Mr. Kelly as receiver of Poole & White (Limited). Their sole contention, which succeeded in both courts below, was that the relations established between the appellants and the receiver whom they appointed, professedly under the power conferred upon them by the indenture, were such that they must in law be held, if not before, at least after the liquidation order, to have given authority to Mr. Kelly to purchase goods for the purpose of carrying on the business, and that, the purchase of the goods in question having been within the scope of that authority, the appellant and his co-trustee were conjointly and severally responsible for their price. In view of that argument, it appears to me to be expedient to consider separately the legal position of the trustees before and after the liquidation of the company, especially seeing that their liability during those two periods was rested upon different considerations. If, before the order, the trustees had given the receiver authority to pledge their credit cadit quæstio. If they had not, the question still remains whether they subsequently gave him such authority. Neither of these questions involves any controversy of fact. Every fact in the case, whether relevant or not, has been made matter of mutual admission, and, to my apprehension, the only matter which your lordships have to determine is whether the admitted facts, which I have stated in so far as they were represented to be material, are in law sufficient to sustain the inference that such authority was given.

I think that it would be impossible to affirm that any liability attached to the trustees during the earlier of these periods, unless your lordships were prepared to ignore or reverse the doctrine approved and applied by this House in Cox v. Hickman, and followed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Mollwo, March, & Co. v. The Court of Wards. In Cox v. Hickman a firm of ironmasters trading as B. Smith & Son, being unable to meet their obligations, entered into a deed of arrangement with their creditors, by which the whole business of the firm was assigned to certain of the creditors as trustees, to be carried on by them under the name of "The Stanton Iron Co." Provision was made for meetings of the creditors, at which the majority in value present were to have the power to make rules as to the mode of conducting the business, or to order the discontinuance of it. The purposes of the trust were to distribute the net income of the business rateably among the creditors of the firm, which net income was always to be deemed the property of the firm of B. Smith & Son, for whom the trustees were to hold the trust estates when all the debts were paid. The trustees, in the course of their management, bought goods of Hickman, and accepted bills to him for the price "per proc. The Stanton Iron Co." The object of the action was to make two of the creditors, who were parties to the deed of arrangement but were not trustees, personally liable for the amount of these bills. The learned judges of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and also the judges who attended the House, were equally divided in opinion; but the four noble and learned lords who constituted the House were unanimous in holding that these creditors were not made partners of the Stanton Iron Co. by the provisions of the deed of arrangement; and that there were no grounds for inferring that they had given authority to the trustees to pledge their credit for goods purchased in the course of carrying on the business.

In the present case the business was carried on by a receiver, who was, until it went into liquidation, the agent of the company; and the trustees upon whom it is now sought to impose liability, had no power either to conduct the business or to control the receiver in its management, and never attempted to do either the one or the other of these things.

I have had difficulty in speculating upon what principle the Lord Chief Justice, who makes no reference to Cox v. Hickman, arrived at the conclusion that, consistently with the principle of that decision, the appellant could be held to have given authority to Mr. Kelly to pledge his credit to the respondents. Unfortunately his lordship, after expressing an opinion to that effect, indicates that he did not consider it necessary to give his reasons, probably because he was also of opinion that the appellant had, at all events, given such authority at the time when the goods, the price of which is in question, were purchased by the receiver.

In the Court of Appeal, Lord Esher, M.R., took the same view in regard to the liability of the appellant before the liquidation, and has assigned his reasons. His lordship regarded the proviso inserted in Mr. Kelly's appointment requiring him to open a bank account, and to make daily payment into it of the receipts of the business, and also that his cheques should be countersigned by Mr. Tryon, as introducing conditions which not only were in excess of the power of appointment conferred upon the trustees by the indenture of the 18th of May, 1892, but conditions which gave the trustees control over the management of the receiver. I am unable to assent to either of these propositions. Both conditions appear to me to have been reasonable checks imposed upon the agent of the company, for whose acts and defaults the company alone was liable, in the interest of the company itself. Then, as to the power of controlling the management of the receiver, which the trustees are supposed to have derived from the fact that Mr. Tryon was selected to countersign his cheques, Lord Esher observed that the receiver ought not to have been put in the position of ordering goods "and then having to say to the tradesmen who supplied them that he could not pay for them because those who appointed him had reserved control over all such payments themselves." That reasoning ignores the fact that Mr. Tryon was not only solicitor for the trustees but chairman of the company and holder of the third issue of debentures, and that in these latter capacities he had a material interest in the success of the business carried on by the receiver, and therefore an interest in seeing that its receipts were properly applied in extinction of its current liabilities. He had no right whatever to refuse to countersign cheques drawn in payment of goods actually purchased; his only function was to satisfy himself, before countersigning, that the cheque represented a real transaction by the receiver. It must also be kept in view that the company acquiesced in the terms of the appointment as made by the trustees, and on that footing transferred its assets and the conduct of its business to Mr. Kelly, and that circumstance, in my opinion, affords a conclusive answer to the suggestion that the addition of these provisoes, which constituted a mere check to prevent any improper application of the receipts of the business, and gave neither Mr. Tryon nor anyone else power to control the course of its management by the receiver, were in excess of the power to appoint him conferred by the company upon the trustees for the second debenture-holders. The provisoes must, in these circumstances, be treated on the same footing as if they had been expressed at length in the indenture of the 18th of May, 1892.

The Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, and also Lopes, L.J., who held that the appellant would not have been liable for goods bought by the receiver before the liquidation order, were all of opinion that, whether the trustees were or were not responsible for the receiver's purchases before that event, they became so liable upon its occurrence. I am unable to follow the reasoning by which these learned judges have arrived at that result. The Lord Chief Justice says that the company quâ company then "ceased to have any real actual existence at all as a going or trading concern," and that the liquidator took no part, direct or indirect, in the carrying on of its business by Mr. Kelly. Lopes, L.J., says that "from the date of Mr. Wilding's appointment as liquidator the company ceased to exist as a company, and ceased to exist as a going concern."

These statements are approximately correct. The company, when in liquidation, although by no means defunct, could no longer act by its directors, and appoint or employ agents capable of binding the corporation or its estate, and was represented by the liquidator, who could not himself carry on its business without the special leave of the court. But the radical right to the business continued to be an asset of the company; and if it had been so successful under the management of Mr. Kelly as to yield profits sufficient to meet the claims of debenture-holders, who had no interest beyond that of mortgagees, it would, no doubt, have been at once reclaimed by the liquidator for the behoof of the general creditors. In point of fact the management of the receiver appears to have been so far successful that neither the first debenture-holders nor the trustees for the second debenture-holders, nor the liquidator, seem to have thought it expedient to disturb it.

None of these circumstances appear to me to be sufficient to afford a solution of the question which your lordships have to decide. If I had been of opinion that the trustees for the second debenture-holders stood in the relation of principals to Mr. Kelly before the liquidation, I should not have hesitated to hold that such relation was not altered by the supervening incapacity of the company to act by, or incur any obligation through, an agent. But, not being of that opinion, I am at a loss to understand upon what principle the trustees of the debenture-holders became subrogated as principals, in room and stead of the company, as soon as it incurred a statutory incapacity to occupy that position. The reasoning of the learned judges who were adverse to the appellant appears to me to involve this proposition, which to my mind is fallacious: that in cases where an individual, acting under a power of attorney or similar warrant, appoints an agent for a company, he necessarily becomes the principal of that agent whenever the company ceases to be legally capable of imparting any authority to the agent, if the agent, without obtaining any new authority from him, chooses to continue his management.

Apart from that general and doubtful proposition, it was admitted by the respondents' counsel that, after liquidation, nothing occurred which could alter the relation in which the appellant and his co-trustee stood to Mr. Kelly, the receiver, with the single exception of the fact that, from and after September, 1893, the counter-signature of Mr. Tryon to the cheques passed upon his bank account by the receiver was discontinued. It was curious to observe that the respondents' counsel, who strenuously maintained the view of the Master of the Rolls, that the observance of that condition was sufficient to make the trustee liable before liquidation, were driven to argue, with equal vigour, that its non-observance after liquidation, at the time when their client sold goods to the receiver, was attended with the same legal result. In point of fact it does not appear by whom or under what authority that check was removed; but, assuming its removal to have been sanctioned by the trustees, it appears to me that the circumstance could not by itself, or in combination with the other features of this case, have the effect of transforming the trustees into principals of the receiver.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgments appealed from ought to be reversed with costs to the appellant, here and in both courts below. I have only to add that had the case not been attended with much variance of judicial opinion, and been of considerable importance to the large class of persons who lend their money on debentures to limited companies, I should have been content to express my concurrence in the careful and exhaustive judgment of Rigby, L.J.

Lord HERSCHELL (after stating the facts).—The question in the case was, in the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice, one of fact, and not of law at all. But the facts were not in dispute. The goods were ordered by Kelly, and not by the appellant and his co-trustee. They certainly gave Kelly no express authority to purchase for them, nor did they expressly appoint Kelly to act as their agent in carrying on the business, or, indeed, to act as their agent at all, or to pledge their credit. If, then, they are liable to pay for the goods, it must be because, in the circumstances which I have detailed, and notwithstanding the facts to which I have just referred, the law made them Kelly's principals and imposed such liability upon them. Though the Lord Chief Justice did not decide the point, he indicated the impression, at least, that from the outset Kelly was carrying on the business, not for the company, but for the defendants; that from the time when he was appointed receiver they, and not the company, were his principals. The Master of the Rolls, whilst agreeing with the Lord Chief Justice that it was not necessary to decide the point, expressed a distinct opinion that Kelly was appointed, not such a receiver as was contemplated by the contract, but as agent for the trustees.

Though it may not be essential, I think it very important to determine in what capacity Kelly originally acted, and whose agent he was. For so far as he and those with whom he dealt were concerned, he carried on the business in precisely the same manner from the beginning to the end. He gave the orders in the same form. He received in terms no new authority. If the trustees were originally his principals, no doubt they continued so to the end. If, on the other hand, the company were at the outset the principals, it will be necessary to inquire whether there were any acts done by the trustees which, in the absence of an express authority to act for them, made Kelly their agent to purchase goods, or generally to carry on the business.

It is to be observed that at the time when Kelly was appointed receiver the trustees had no power to interfere with the company in the conduct of their business except by appointing a receiver under the 13th clause of the deed of the 18th of May, 1892. The security was not then enforceable; they had no power to enter into possession of the mortgaged premises. Apart, then, from the proviso to be found at the end of the instrument appointing Kelly receiver, I do not think that it could be doubted that he was duly appointed receiver for the company, and that they, and not the trustees, were alone liable for his acts and defaults. Mortgage deeds frequently empower the mortgagee to appoint a receiver for the mortgagor. What, then, was the effect of the added proviso? The Master of the Rolls regarded it as depriving the receiver of the freedom ordinarily incident to his position, and reserving to the trustees a control over him with regard to every step which he might take. I cannot so view it. Its object seems to me clear. I do not think that it was intended to reserve to the trustees any control over the management of the business, but only to act as a check to prevent any improper use by the receiver of the moneys of the company, and to ensure that they should be properly applied. Mr. Tryon, by whom the cheques were to be countersigned, was, it is true, solicitor to the trustees, but he was also the chairman of the company. His function was merely to see that the cheques were drawn for payment of the company's liabilities. But even assuming that the company would have been entitled to refuse to let Kelly occupy the position of receiver for the company on the ground that the terms of his appointment were not such as were warranted by the deed of May, 1892, they did not do so. They allowed him from the date of his appointment to conduct their business as a receiver appointed under that deed. If the proviso introduced a check upon the acts of the receiver which the deed did not authorize, it was quite competent for the company to assent to and sanction the introduction of that check. And one can well understand that the company would regard it as in their interest, and would desire that there should be such a check upon the action of the receiver. I cannot myself entertain any doubt that when Kelly took over the management of the business, under his appointment, he did so with the full assent of the company, and as receiver for them. Supposing that before they went into liquidation an action had been brought against them for the price of goods ordered by Kelly, what answer would they have had? Could they possibly have maintained that he was not receiver for them, but for the trustees, when the trustees had at the time no power to appoint a receiver, except for the company, and when the company had recognized his appointment and permitted him to act as receiver? I cannot think so.

As soon as the order was made for the winding up of the company it became, as from the date of the petition, incapable of entering into contracts without the sanction of the court. The contracts made by Kelly after that date certainly did not bind the company. They could not be principals in those contracts.

The reasoning which led to the conclusion in favour the respondents appears to have been this: That after the winding-up order the company could no longer be principals; that Kelly, who contracted in the same terms as before, was not liable upon the contracts as principal; that the appellant and his co-trustee were aware that the company were no longer principals; that they permitted Kelly to carry on business as before, when they could at any time have displaced him; that the business was really being carried on for them, and that therefore they are liable as principals on Kelly's contracts.

It is clear that after the winding-up order the appellant and his co-trustee did not in terms give Kelly any new authority. They did not interfere in any way. He carried on the business afterwards just as he had done before. They did not expressly authorize him to enter into any contracts, or to carry on the business on their behalf. If, then, they are liable as principals it must be because an authority to do so is to be implied from the circumstances.

I have to observe, in the first place, that even if Kelly could not be made liable on the contracts, and if the company could not be treated as his principals, it by no means follows, in my opinion, that there must be some other principal. Where an agent purports to contract for another in such terms as not to make himself a contracting party, and he has no authority from that other to bind him as principal, neither the agent nor anyone else can be sued on the contract, though the agent may be subject to the same liability as if he had been a party to the contract in respect of his breach of an implied warranty that he possessed the authority which he represented himself to have. If, then, neither Kelly nor the company are liable on the contract, this does not show that someone else must be, or go a step towards proving that the appellant and his co-trustee were the principals. It is not necessary to decide whether Kelly could be made liable for the price of the goods.

It is said that the appellant and his co-trustee might have displaced Kelly, and so put an end to his carrying on of the business. This is true. But the holders of the first mortgage might equally have taken this step, as indeed they did at a later date. This non-interference by the appellant and his "permitting" Kelly, in this sense, to carry on the business, cannot of itself make Kelly his agent if he was not so otherwise. Kelly was certainly not held out to the world as the agent of the trustees for the second debenture-holders. The respondents knew nothing about them, and did not give credit to them. The respondents, therefore, can only succeed by showing that the contracts were made on behalf of the appellant and his co-trustee and with their authority. What, then, wrought the change by which Kelly not only ceased to be agent for the company, but became the agent of these trustees? I gather that the answer to this question would be that from the date of the winding-up order the business was carried on for the benefit of the trustees. I do not see, however, that it was any more carried on for the benefit of the trustees after that date than before. The profits made by the carrying on of the business of the company were, before as well as after the winding-up order, part of the security for the payment of the debts due to the debenture-holders, and after as well as prior to the winding up the profits of the business, subject to the claim of the mortgagees, belonged to the company. It had not ceased to exist; it could still hold and also acquire property. If the business had proved profitable and the assets of the company had been more than sufficient to discharge the mortgage claims, the liquidator of the company could, and doubtless would, have intervened, and applied the surplus to the payment of the creditors of the company, and all that remained after they had been paid would have been the property of the company.

Prior to the decision of the case of Cox v. Hickman in this House it would, no doubt, have been open to contention that, under the circumstances which existed in this case, the business was being carried on for the benefit of the mortgagees, and must be treated as their business, and that they would therefore be liable upon contracts made by the person who carried it on. But since the decision of that case such a proposition can no longer be maintained. I think that the effect of the judgments in Cox v. Hickman has been overlooked in the judgments appealed from.

In that case an insolvent firm, by a deed of arrangement with their creditors, assigned their business to certain of the creditors as trustees. These trustees carried on the business under the name of "The Stanton Iron Co." In that name they ordered goods of the plaintiff and accepted bills for the price. The question in the action was, whether the other creditors (two of whom were sued) were liable as principals in the transaction. It was contended that they were so, because they were parties to the deed of arrangement by which the net income of the business was to be distributed rateably among the creditors of the firm, and a majority in value of the creditors present at meetings called for the purpose were empowered to make regulations as to the mode of conducting the business or to order its discontinuance. Notwithstanding these circumstances, this House held the defendants not liable. There the business was being carried on for the benefit of the creditors of the insolvent firm just as much as it was here carried on for the benefit of the appellant and his co-trustee, or those whom they represented. And those creditors as much authorized and permitted it to be carried on in the way it was carried on as did the appellant and his co-trustee in the present case. Moreover, the persons who conducted the business in the case referred to were subject to a control and interference by the creditors generally, to which there is no parallel in the present case.

It appears to me that the plaintiff in Cox v. Hickman had a stronger ground for contending that the defendants were liable than the present plaintiffs have, and I think that it would be impossible to decide in favour of the respondents on the ground that the appellant permitted the business to be carried on for his benefit without overruling the decision of your lordships' House in that case.

I entirely agree with the view expressed by Rigby, L.J., and I think that the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

Lord MORRIS.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord DAVEY.—Were it not for the judgments in the courts below I should not have thought that this case presented much difficulty.

In my opinion there can be no doubt that at the date of his appointment the receiver, though nominated by the mortgagees, became, both in fact and in law, the agent of the mortgagor—i.e., of the company. That he was so by the express terms of the power under which he was appointed is undisputed. The purpose for which he was appointed was in order to make provision for payment of the company's mortgage debts, which was, in my opinion, a purpose of the company. It is said that certain directions which were given to the receiver—e.g., to open a banking account with Messrs. Goslings & Sharpe, and that his receipts and cheques should be countersigned by Mr. Tryon—were in excess of the power. Perhaps they were. I do not know. But his appointment with these provisions was accepted and acquiesced in by the company, and the directors gave up the custody of the company to him, and allowed him to conduct the business as a duly-appointed receiver in the manner directed by the terms of his appointment. If the company did not agree, any terms in excess of the power were not binding on the receiver, for it cannot be pretended that there was any intention on the part of the mortgagees to appoint a receiver except under the power, and, indeed, they had no authority at that time to do so. The fact that the mortgagees were to obtain the benefit of the appointment through the payment of their interest or principal, or had the right to exercise certain control over the conduct of the business, would not, of course, make him their agent for the purpose of pledging their credit. One need only refer on this point to the judgments delivered in the House of Lords in Cox v. Hickman, and the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Mollwo v. Court of Wards. If he was not agent of the appellants originally, did he become so on the winding up of the company? I assume that the power to carry on the business so as to pledge the credit of the company and make the company liable to be sued on contracts made by him, came to an end. The receiver, however, continued to exercise the power of management and to carry on the business in the same manner as he had done before the winding up. He purported to exercise powers which I will assume that he no longer possessed. I forbear to say what may be the legal consequence to himself if he did so. But I am unable to see how, without any act or assent on their part, it made him the agent of persons who, for the purpose of pledging their credit, had not previously conferred that authority on him, and never contemplated or intended doing so, or held themselves out as his principals. I agree with the judgment of Rigby, L.J., and I concur with your lordships in the order proposed.

GOWER v. COULDRIDGE. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Joinder of defendants—Joinder of separate causes of action against several defendants—Ord. 16, rr. 4, 5; ord. 18, r. 1.

A claim to recover damages from three defendants on the ground of deceit cannot rightly be joined in the same action with a claim to recover damages from two of such defendants on the ground of conspiracy.

Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co., 45 W. R. 51, [1896] A. C. 450, followed.

Appeal from an order of Day, J.

The action was brought to recover damages from three defendants, Couldridge, Maw, and Newman, the promoters of a company called Richard Spurgeon (Limited). Couldridge and Maw were directors, and Newman was secretary of the company. The plaintiff was the registered holder of 500 preference shares in the company of £1 each, for which he had applied, and which had been allotted to him, and in respect of which he had paid £500, and which, as he alleged, were of no value.

The statement of claim alleged that the defendants Newman and Couldridge fraudulently conspired to promote and form the company for the purpose of buying and taking over a worthless business, and to get the public, including the plaintiff, to take and pay for shares therein, their object being to receive for themselves large profits and emoluments, and to shift the burden of the business on to those members of the public who might be induced to take shares.

The statement of claim further alleged that the three defendants issued to the public, including the plaintiff, a prospectus containing untrue statements, which they knew to be untrue, and that the plaintiff had been induced by such statements to apply for the 500 shares. It further alleged a cause of action against the three defendants, in respect of such untrue statements, under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890.

On the application of the defendant Maw an order was made by a master that the plaintiff should elect whether he would discontinue the action against the defendant Maw or against the defendants Couldridge and Newman.

This order was reversed by Day, J.

The defendant Maw appealed.

M. M. Macnaghten, for the defendant Maw.—The question is whether a plaintiff is entitled to join separate causes of action against several defendants in one action. The House of Lords has answered this question in the negative: Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co., 45 W. R. 51, [1896] A. C. 450. Here the plaintiff seeks to combine in one action a cause of action for deceit against the three defendants, a cause of action under the Directors' Liability Act against the three defendants, and a cause of action for conspiracy against two of the defendants. It is not alleged that Maw had any part or lot in the conspiracy. Maw, therefore, is entitled to object to the torts, which are alleged against him, being joined in the same action with an entirely distinct tort, which is alleged against the other defendants only.

Arthur Powell, for the plaintiff.—Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co. does not govern this case. In that case no tort was alleged to have been committed by the two sets of defendants jointly, but each set of defendants was charged with separate and independent torts. Here the plaintiff has a cause of action against all three defendants for deceit, and a cause of action against all three under the Directors' Liability Act. There is no decision that under such circumstances he may not join with those causes of action a separate cause of action against two of the defendants. And the words of the rules are clearly wide enough to allow this to be done. Ord. 16, r. 4, says that "all persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative." And rule 5 says that "it shall not be necessary that every defendant shall be interested as to all the relief prayed for, or as to every cause of action included in any proceeding against him." Then ord. 18, r. 1, says that "the plaintiff may unite in the same action several causes of action." Here the plaintiff, having rightly constituted an action of deceit and under the statute against all three defendants, is entitled to join in the same action a separate cause of action against two of them.

He cited Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494; and Bennetts & Co. v. MacIlwraith & Co., 45 W. R. 17, [1896] 2 Q. B. 464.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 17.—CHITTY, L.J., read the following judgment: In this action the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for the loss he has sustained by taking shares in the company called "Richard Spurgeon (Limited)." He does not claim any injunction. There are three defendants, all of whom are alleged to be promoters of the company. In accordance with the modern system of pleading the plaintiff in his statement of claim sets forth facts from which it appears that he has three distinct causes of action. Stated shortly they are as follows. The first is a fraudulent conspiracy by two of the defendants—viz., Newman and Couldridge, to promote and form the company to buy a worthless business and to induce the plaintiff to take and pay for the shares which he in fact took. Although there is a statement that the defendant Maw joined in the promotion of the company, it is clear that he is not charged with being party to the conspiracy. This was admitted by the plaintiff's counsel. The second is a statutory liability founded on the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, in respect of statements in the prospectus issued by all three of the defendants. The third is false and fraudulent repre sentations in the prospectus, also charged against all the defendants. The action, then, is founded on three distinct torts or wrongs committed, as to the second and third, by the three defendants, and, as to the first, by two only.

In these circumstances the defendant Maw, objecting to the joinder of the first cause of action with the other two, took out a summons, on which the master made an order, in substance directing the plaintiff to elect whether he would proceed with the action on the first cause against the defendants Newman and Couldridge only, or on the second and third causes against the three defendants. On appeal the learned judge in chambers reversed the master's order, and allowed the action in its present form to proceed against all three defendants. The appeal is by Maw from the judge's order. At the bar the plaintiff's counsel elected, if the court considered that the judge's order could not be sustained, to strike out from the statement of claim all the allegations relating to the fraudulent conspiracy, and to proceed with the action on the second and third causes only. In my opinion the judge's order cannot be sustained. The case is entirely governed by the decision of the House of Lords in Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co., where it was held that claims for damages against two or more defendants in respect of their several liability for separate torts cannot be combined in one action. The plaintiff's counsel endeavoured in vain to distinguish that case from the present. He referred to orders 16 and 18 and various rules under those orders, and suggested that the lords who took part in the decision did not deal with the rules. The suggestion is wholly inadmissible. The rules were necessarily before the House and present to the minds of those who advised the House. The decision lays down a principle applicable to the present system of procedure on the subject, and governing all the rules bearing on the question. It would be idle, therefore, for this court to enter upon a discussion of the rules or of any of the authorities relating to them other than Sadler's case. In the case before us the cause of action founded on the fraudulent conspiracy is an entirely distinct and independent cause; it is wholly separate from the second and third causes. I hold, then, that the defendant Maw is entitled, as a matter of right, regard being had to the plaintiff's election at the bar, to have all the allegations relating to the conspiracy struck out from the statement of claim, and the order will be to that effect. No question, therefore, arises as to the exercise of any discretion by the court on the ground of embarrassment to the defendant Maw. Had that question arisen, I should have arrived at the same conclusion.

The costs of the appeal and of the summons both before the master and the judge must be the costs of the defendant Maw in any event.

BATEMAN (LADY) v. FABER. (a.)

Married woman—Restraint on anticipation—Life interest determinable on condition—Bonâ fide but incorrect admission that condition had been fulfilled—Estoppel.

A married woman, who had, subject to a restraint on anticipation, a life interest in certain estates determinable on her coming into an income of £8,000 a year, executed a deed-poll whereby she admitted that she had come into £8,000 a year and released her life interest.

A mortgagee of her husband, relying on this deed, entered into certain arrangements for the benefit of her husband. It was subsequently discovered that the married woman had not in fact come into £8,000 a year.

Held, that a married woman could not, by an incorrect admission, deprive herself of the benefit of the restraint on anticipation, even though by the admission she had induced someone else to alter his position for the worse.

Judgment of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 151), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported ante, p. 151). The facts are fully stated in the report of the judgment in the court below, but may be shortly set out here as follows:

By an indenture dated the 26th of June, 1867, Lord Bateman mortgaged his life interest in the Kelmarsh and Shobdon Court estates to the executors of Lady Kerrison's will to secure a sum of £11,430, representing trust funds under the will advanced to Lord Bateman; and subject to trusts for repaying the loan, the executors were to pay the surplus rents and profits of the estates to Lady Bateman, the wife of Lord Bateman, during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, "provided, nevertheless, that if at any time the said Lady Bateman shall succeed to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum for her separate use, then and in such case the trusts in and by this indenture lastly hereinbefore declared shall absolutely cease and determine, and after the determination of the trust lastly hereinbefore declared (but subject and without prejudice to the trusts hereinbefore declared) upon trust for the said Lord Bateman." Lord Bateman subsequently mortgaged such interest as remained to him to Mr. Andrew Montagu, as a collateral security for £110,000.

In July, 1886, Lady Bateman became entitled to a life interest in the Kerrison estates in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Middlesex, and a question was soon afterwards raised by Mr. Montagu whether or not the plaintiff had "succeeded to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum for her separate use," so as to bring into operation the above-mentioned proviso. Lady Bateman was ultimately advised by her then solicitor (who had since died) that now she was tenant for life of the Kerrison estates she must be considered as having succeeded to an income of £8,000 within the meaning of the proviso.

On the 4th of March, 1890, Lady Bateman, relying on this advice, and being desirous of enabling her husband to obtain better terms from the mortgagee, Mr. Montagu, executed a deed-poll, whereby she expressly admitted that her life interest in the Kelmarsh and Shobdon Court estates had determined under the proviso and released that life interest in favour of Lord Bateman. In consequence of, and subsequently to, the deed-poll Mr. Montagu entered into agreements with Lord Bateman whereby the rate of interest on the £110,000 loan was reduced, and payment was arranged for on terms favourable to Lord Bateman. Subsequently, however, Lady Bateman discovered, as she alleged, that her income from the Kerrison estates did not amount to £8,000 a year, inasmuch as she took subject to numerous prior incumbrances, so that the deed of 1890 was executed under a wrong state of facts, and was therefore inoperative to affect the interest secured to her by the deed of 1867. Accordingly, she brought this action against the executor of the mortgagee, Mr. Montagu, who had died, the persons to whom Lord Bateman had conveyed his life estate in the Kelmarsh and Shobdon estates subject to the mortgage, and Lord Bateman himself, claiming a declaration that she, the plaintiff, had not at any time since the execution of the deed of 1867 succeeded to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum for her separate use within the meaning of the proviso; and also a declaration that the admission by the plaintiff in the deed-poll of 1890 was not binding upon her in respect of the income to which, under the deed of 1867, she became entitled for her separate use without power of anticipation, and that, notwithstanding the deed-poll, she had always been, and still was, entitled to that income.

Kekewich, J., held that, by reason of the restraint on anticipation, Lady Bateman could not bind her interest by the admission, and that her right to receive the income continued notwithstanding the deed-poll.

The defendant Faber appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Brabant, for the appellant.—The question is, what is the effect of an admission by a married woman which brings into effect the cesser clause? [CHITTY, L.J.—You have a clear case against anyone but a married woman restrained from anticipation.] Married women, even when restrained from anticipation, are subject to the discipline of the court: Derbishire v. Home, 3 De G. M. & G. 80; Crofts v. Middleton, 2 K. & J. 194, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 115. A married woman can be affected by estoppel as to her separate estate: Jones v. Frost, 20 W. R. 1025, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 773; Sharpe v. Foy, 17 W. R. 65, L. R. 4. Ch. App. 35. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to Willoughby v. Middleton, 10 W. R. 460, 2 J. & H. 344. CHITTY, J., referred to In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. R. 816.] Those cases were considered in In re Vardon's Trusts, 34 W. R. 185, 31 Ch. D. 275. [CHITTY, J.—Willoughby v. Middleton was discussed in Codrington v. Lindsay, 21 W. R. 182, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 578, p. 590.] What deprives Lady Bateman of her estate is the proviso which sends the estate over. With the determination of her estate she is relieved from the restraint on anticipation. The only point is what is required to prove this cesser. We submit that this deed is simply evidence of the cesser. Jackson v. Hobhouse, 2 Mer. 483, which Kekewich, J., relied on, was dealt with in Sharpe v. Foy. [LINDLEY, M.R., referred to White v. Greenish, 11 C. B. N. S. 209, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 34.] Stanley v. Stanley, 26 W. R. 310, 7 Ch. D. 589, was discussed in Cahill v. Cahill, 31 W. R. 861, 8 App. Cas. 420.

Warrington, Q.C., and Beaumont, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This case is somewhat new in its details, and it is of great importance. It is of great importance to lawyers and of great importance socially. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that it is impossible to reverse the decision of Kekewich, J., unless we are prepared to lay down as law a proposition which I do not believe is law. If we reverse Kekewich, J.'s, decision, we must hold that it is competent for a married woman entitled for her separate use to property without power of anticipation to get rid of the restraint by telling an untruth, and causing someone else to act on the faith of that untruth. I do not say that the law would be unreasonable if that proposition were well founded; but in the face of the authorities I dare not say that it is law; there are well known cases which say that it is not. Now, the question arises in this way: Lady Bateman was entitled to certain property which I will call the Kelmarsh estates for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation. In the settlement which created that life interest in her there was a proviso that if at any time she should succeed to an income of her own of £8,000 or more a year for her separate use, then the trusts for her should absolutely cease and determine. Now, whether those trusts have ceased and determined depends upon the simple question of fact. Has she or has she not succeeded to an income in her own right of £8,000 a year? If she has, then these Kelmarsh estates have ceased to belong to her. If she has not, then they still continue to be hers. I quite agree with Mr. Renshaw that that is a mere question of fact. What is the evidence before us? The evidence before us is a deed-poll executed by her in which she states that she has succeeded to an income in her own right of £8,000 a year. The first question which arises is, Whether that deed is admissible in evidence against her? I think that it plainly is so. There is no objection to it, and it is an admission by her that this event has happened. Then she says, "I made a mistake; that admission which I made was made by inadvertence, and I claim relief upon the ground of that mistake." The answer to that is, "You are not entitled to take advantage of that circumstance; you are not entitled to say it was a mistake or untrue, because you made that statement with a view to induce and did induce Mr. Montagu to act upon it and change his position by reason of it, and he has done so." Therefore he says, "I do not care whether it is true or untrue, you said you had succeeded to an income of £8,000 a year; you said that, to induce me to make arrangements with your husband which I should not otherwise have made, and I have made them, and therefore you are estopped from denying the truth of your statement."

Now, first let us face that. As regards anybody else except a married woman who is entitled to property for her separate use without power of anticipation, that would be a good answer. But if we admit that to be a good answer here, what are we doing except enabling the married woman, by telling an untruth, to deprive herself of a protection which the clause has been designed to afford to her. In my opinion that cannot be done. I am quite of the same opinion as the learned judge in the court below. I do not think that it is necessary to go through the cases; no case touches this, no case comes up to it. It is new in point of detail, but in principle it is old—that is to say, a married woman cannot by any device, even by fraud (the cases go to that length), deprive herself of the protection which the restraint upon anticipation throws around her. The policy of the law I say nothing at all about, but it has been sanctioned by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Of course the result is that a married woman, having an estate settled for her separate use without power of anticipation, can play fast and loose to a greater extent than if she were a feme sole. I am of opinion therefore that the appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. If this had been the case of a man instead of a married woman restrained from anticipation there would have been a clear case for estoppel. The circumstance in this case, that there was a deed, is not material on the question of law. The deed only shows that the statement made by Lady Bateman was a solemn deliberate statement. It would be just the same if the case had stood upon letters instead of a deliberate deed of arrangement. Now, the question is whether the law of estoppel, which would apply to a man, or even to a married woman who holds her property for her separate use without any restraint upon anticipation, ought to be so applied against a married woman who is restrained from anticipation as to deprive her of an estate which is subject to the restraint. In other words, whether the law of estoppel as applied against her ought to have that effect or not. Now, no authority has been cited, nor, so far as I am aware, can be cited, in favour of that proposition. It was very well put in argument that the law of estoppel is part of the law of evidence. But then we must have regard to the way in which a married women is treated in courts of equity, and to the way in which that treatment is sanctioned by the Legislature under the Conveyancing Acts. We must consider the effect which it would have. Now, the equity which created the doctrine of separate use made the married woman, for the purpose of that doctrine, a feme sole. But then it superadded the restraint on anticipation, and the restraint on anticipation cannot be got rid of when it is for the married woman's benefit, without the aid of section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, as is shown by the case of Robinson v. Wheelwright, 4 W. R. 187, 427, 6 De G. M. & G. 535, a well-known case upon which the law as established is founded. So far as I know, the only way in which the restraint can be got rid of is under section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, by an application to the judge, who can, if he is satisfied it is for her, the married woman's, own benefit, relieve her from the restraint. The result, as has already been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, of our allowing this appeal would be to give the married woman indirectly, but substantially, the control over property which is thus settled. It appears to me that we should be misapplying the doctrine of estoppel if we allowed it to have that effect against the married woman.

It was said, What would have been the effect supposing in court she had admitted the property she succeeded to was worth £8,000 a year? If the matter had been in court, and the question had been raised and the court had accepted the proofs that were given as being sufficient, and there had been a judgment, the case would have stood differently. It appears to me that she must be allowed to retract this admission when the use that is attempted to be made of the admission is such as has already been pointed out; in other words, when the effect of the admission is to enable her by her own act to get rid of the restraint on anticipation. There is no case of fraud here, and therefore we have not to consider the authorities upon fraud. The better opinion seems to me, as the law stands at the present moment, that a married woman's deliberate fraud, where she is restrained from anticipation, does not suffice to enable her to get rid of the restraint on anticipation.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am sorry that the law is such that a married woman cannot relieve herself of this fetter with respect to anticipation in cases where she has been guilty of a fraud, because in the end the fetter as to anticipation is a fetter imposed largely for her benefit. It does not seem very wholesome that she should continue to have the benefit of the fetter upon anticipation in a state of circumstances in which she has chosen to cause another to alter his position, and alter his position for the worse upon the assumption that there is no such restraint. But I do not think that it has been argued here to-day that a married woman can relieve herself of the restraint on anticipation by her fraud. If it had been so argued —which, I repeat, I do not think it has—it seems to me that, since the case of Stanley v. Stanley, it is impossible to maintain any such proposition as that a married woman's fraud may relieve her from the restraint on anticipation. In those circumstances it seems to me that it follows that the judgment in the court below appealed against was right. It is attempted to put this case outside the rule established in Stanley v. Stanley by saying it is not sought here to rely upon any dealing by the married woman with her property; but that it is only sought here to rely upon the rule in the law of evidence. It is argued that it may very well be that although a married woman cannot directly affect the restraint upon anticipation by her act, or even by her fraudulent act, yet it does not follow that she is not liable to the same laws of evidence as other people, that if that is so she is bound by this estoppel; that the moment this deed-poll is put in it proves, unless contradicted, that the event has happened on the happening of which she was to lose this life estate; and that it not only proves it, but that she is thenceforth estopped from offering evidence to the contrary. It is further said that she is bound by this rule of the law of evidence, and that there is nothing in the decision of Stanley v. Stanley, or the other authorities to the same effect, which relieves her from the operation of that rule. I think, however, that such a proposition is based upon a misunderstanding of what the rule really is. It is quite true that in so far as the deed is put in as a deed executed by this lady it is her admission, and as such is evidence. But it is not sought to rely upon this only as an admission. It is sought to say that it is an admission which she ought not to be allowed to contradict; that she cannot contradict it without doing a wrong to those who have acted upon the faith of this representation by her, which is relied upon as an admission by her in evidence. It seems to me that the moment that one says that that is the principle upon which she is prevented from contradicting the admission, one cannot help coming to the conclusion that the rule of evidence is based upon the fact that courts do not allow persons to commit a wrong of this sort in the presence of the court and during its hearing. But it seems to me that when one recognizes that, the result is to bring the reasoning upon which the married woman is prevented from contradicting her admission within the same rule as is acted upon in the decision of Stanley v. Stanley and the other cases to like effect. I think, therefore, as has already been said by the Master of the Rolls and Chitty, L.J., that it is impossible to decide in a different way from the decision of Kekewich, J., without really holding that a married woman may relieve herself from restraint on anticipation by her own acts. Under these circumstances I agree with the decision of the rest of the court, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs in the usual way.

Appeal dismissed.

MAYOR, &c., OF THE BOROUGH OF WEST HARTLEPOOL v. ROBINSON. (a.)

Local government—Public health—Street—Charges for paving, &c.—Duty imposed by Act of Parliament—Memorial to Secretary of State—West Hartlepool Extension and Improvement Act, 1870 (38 & 39 Vict. c. cxiii.), ss. 3, 69, 80, 82, 349, 350.

Where one of two adjoining owners laid out a strip of land 18*ft. wide, at the edge of his land, to make a road, the other agreeing to give a similar strip to make the road* 36*ft. wide,*

Held, under the West Hartlepool Extension and Improvement Act, 1870, that the 18*ft. strip so first laid out was a "street" and not merely part of a street, and that, therefore, charges for paving, &c., that strip could properly be made and enforced against the other owner, notwithstanding that he had laid out the agreed additional strip, and had paved and made it good at his own sole expense.*

If such charges constitute, in the circumstances, any hardship upon the owner, his remedy is, under section 349 of the Act, to appeal to the Secretary of State by memorial for relief.

Decision of Stirling, J. (45 W. R. 312), affirmed.

Appeal from Stirling, J. (reported 45 W. R. 312).

In this action the corporation of West Hartlepool sought to establish and enforce by summons against lands belonging to the defendant two charges for sums of £27 15s. 6d. and £328 3s. 4d. These sums were for the expenses of paving and sewering the street in which the defendant's properties were situate, and the charges were claimed under the West Hartlepool Extension and Improvement Act, 1870, the provisions of which closely resemble those of the Public Health Act, 1875.

In 1878 the lands in question formed part of the Lynnfield estate, which belonged to the defendant, and was occupied by him residentially. In that year a Mr. Callendor and other persons, the owners of the property adjoining the defendant's property on the south, applied to the West Hartlepool Improvement Commissioners (the predecessors of the plaintiffs) to sanction a scheme for the development of their property as a building estate, and submitted a plan showing the proposed road, Middle Park-road, running along the boundary between their estate and the defendant's, half being on each estate. On the plan was a note to this effect, "It is proposed to leave half of Middle Park-road 18ft. wide." The commissioners sanctioned the scheme, and the road, which was in fact called Sandringham-road, was made. At first the new road was only 18ft. wide, but there was an agreement between the defendant and the commissioners that the defendant should afterwards give an amount of land to the north sufficient to make the street 36ft. wide.

In January, 1892, the corporation of West Hartlepool made an order for paving, &c., the 18ft. road. Notice of this order was served on the defendant and the other adjoining landowners, none of whom, however, executed any part of the works required. The works were therefore done by the corporation, the cost was apportioned by the borough surveyor, and notices were sent to the defendant that he had been charged with the two sums above mentioned. The defendant contended that the charges were enforceable, if at all, against one Muir, to whom he alleged that the whole of the Lynnfield estate had passed. The plaintiffs then took proceedings before the magistrates, and succeeded, against Muir. The present summonses had been issued against Muir, but in February, 1896, the defendant's name was substituted for Muir's, on the ground that Muir was simply the defendant's agent. At the hearing it was proved that the defendant had thrown the agreed portion of his land into the road, which was thus made 36ft. wide, and had paved, &c., the new portion of the road, the charges claimed being in respect of the other 18ft. of the road.

Stirling, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appealed.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Strachan, Q.C. (W. C. Ryde with them), for the appeal.—The magistrate's order directed us to trespass upon another person's land, and therefore cannot be enforced. This was not a street, but only half of a street, and the only cases of half streets in which the owners have been held liable are under the Metropolis Management Acts, which give the owners no power to do the work themselves, and provide for an assessment, not an apportionment. When we gave a written notice disputing the apportionment, the corporation were bound, under section 82, sub-section 5, to proceed by arbitration.

They also referred to the West Hartlepool Extension and Improvement Act, 1870 (38 & 39 Vict. c. cxiii.), ss. 73, 80, 69, 83, 81, 82, 3, 70, 71, 72, 348; 350; Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board, 27 W. Buckley, Q.C., Macmorran, Q.C., and S. B. L. Druce, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R., stated the facts, and proceeded: Having regard to the agreement of the parties, it is impossible to treat Mr. Robinson as an adjoining owner having nothing whatever to do with the construction of this 18ft. street, or part street I will call it for the present, on Mr. Callendor's land. He was assenting to a larger building scheme, and assenting to the carrying out of that scheme piecemeal—by steps.

Now, the first point which arises is this: Whether that 18ft. on Callendor's land was a street within the meaning of section 3 of the Act of Parliament to which we have been referred. I cannot for a moment doubt it was; I have not the slightest doubt about it. What does it matter whether the street is made piecemeal—whether one part of it means one portion of the whole width, but not of the whole length, or one portion of the whole length, but not of the whole width? To say that Callendor's 18ft. strip is not part of the wider street which was contemplated appears to me to be an absolutely untenable proposition. It is a street for all the purposes of legislation. It is not the less a street because it was intended to be widened.

As to the order for paving, &c., it is not necessary for us to consider whether, under this Act of Parliament, if the defendant had been no party to these proceedings—if there had been no agreement by him to throw in 18ft. and make the road 36ft., he being an outsider—and if the attempt was to impose upon him an obligation of contributing half the expense of making the road on Callendor's property; whether that could be done under this Act of Parliament I do not know, nor is it necessary for us to consider. The point of this case is that this was a street, 36ft. wide, to be made for the common benefit. It was as much for the defendant's benefit as for Mr. Callendor's; it was a joint operation and a joint construction from first to last, to that extent. Therefore it appears to me that we need not trouble ourselves about what possibly is a much more difficult question—as to what would have been the law if the defendant had been no party to the proceedings. It is said that this dispute must be settled by arbitration. What did the defendant do? He did not in any way dispute the apportionment—that is to say, the amount which he was asked to pay. He took up a perfectly logical and perfectly intelligible position, though in our opinion wrong—that he was a person who was not within the jurisdiction of the commissioners or the corporation at all, and that they had no right whatever to make any order upon him at all, because he had no land whatever abutting on this street. His points turn upon a critical examination of the meaning of the word "street," and upon those points we are against him. He denied the jurisdiction of the commissioners or the corporation, and it appears to me perfectly impossible to say that that is a dispute about the apportionment by the surveyor. It is nothing of the kind—it is far from that.

We were pressed with the case of The Sandgate District Board of Health v. Keene, more particularly in the Appeal Court. I cannot help thinking that Wright, J., in his observations upon that case, and Stirling, J., in his observations upon it, have construed that decision correctly. I do not understand that that case goes the length of saying that if a person takes up the position that the local authority have no jurisdiction over him at all, the matter is to be referred back to arbitration. If there is any distinction between that case and the present, it is adverse to the defendant, the section here in question being less favourable to his contention. It seems to me that when a man takes up the position which the defendant did, it is absolutely impossible to hold that there is a dispute about apportionment. It is nothing of the kind. Therefore the point about arbitration absolutely fails.

I do not think there is anything else to which I need call attention. It is said that there has been a hardship on the defendant. Of course we have nothing to do with that. At first I was not impressed with that view of the case; but, having read Stirling, J.'s, judgment, I think there may be some hardship upon him, because it may be he is not in a position to obtain compensation. If so, he has so managed matters as to bring that hardship upon himself. But he is not without remedy, because, as Stirling, J., pointed out, section 349 shows that there is a course open to him to have that hardship redressed, if there be hardship in it. It appears to me that legally he is wrong from the beginning to the end, and the wrong is attributable to the fact that he, having agreed to contribute a strip of his own land 18ft. wide, has made his building operations not to work in and tally. He has only himself to thank for his position. The appeal must be dismissed.

CHITTY, L.J.—I agree. The order under appeal is an order enforcing a charge under the 350th section of the West Hartlepool Extension and Improvement Act of 1870. The facts have already been stated by the Master of the Rolls, and I shall not repeat them.

When the order to execute the works of the 5th of January, 1892, was made by the corporation, who had then succeeded to the position of the commissioners, the state of things was this: the defendant had agreed to contribute one-half of the land necessary for a road of 36ft. The Callendors had originally submitted plans to the commissioners in 1878, whereby they proposed that a road of the width of 36ft. should be made, they contributing one-half—namely, the half on their own land. The commissioners, when Mr. Callendor's proposal was brought before them, refused to proceed until the relation of the defendant to this scheme had been first duly ascertained; and in the result the defendant entered into a written agreement that he would contribute 18ft. toward this road of 36ft. He did not agree that he would contribute it at any particular time, nor that he would execute the work required of himself, but still he was a party assenting to this scheme, and that, I think, is an important fact in this case. When the order of the 5th of January, 1892, was made, that being the state of circumstances, a question seems to have been raised in the argument whether that order was an order made within the authority of the 80th section. On looking at the order and referring to the surveyor's plan, which forms part of the order, it is quite plain that the order related to a street then to be made of 18ft. wide. Putting the other circumstances that I have already stated in connection with that order, no doubt there was a street of 36ft. in contemplation; but it was part of this contemplated 36ft. road that was then under consideration, and which was then ordered to be made. The order plainly refers to the 18ft. street, and that appears to me to be a street or part of a street within the meaning of the Act of 1870.

It was urged that the urban authority had no jurisdiction to make an order for the execution of works upon a street less than 36ft. wide; but I refer to the 73rd section, which, no doubt, says that "Every new street intended for carriage traffic shall be laid out and formed at least 36ft. wide unless"—and then there follow certain circumstances which are mentioned, and the section winds up by saying, "or on account of other special circumstances stated in the order." Here there were special circumstances to bring the case within that 73rd section—namely, the circumstances that I have already shortly stated, that the defendant, who was the adjoining owner, had agreed to contribute one-half of the 36ft. road. I entertain no doubt that the street mentioned in the order of the 5th of January, 1892, was a street or part of a street within the meaning of this Act. The result is that in my opinion the order of the 5th of January, 1892, was made within the authority of the Act, and it was served according to the Act upon the defendant; and I can see nothing in the objection which was raised, that the land charged would include the land he had agreed to contribute towards the street. It may be that by reason of subsequent events that charge had become unenforceable against that particular portion of the land—namely, the 18ft. which he was to contribute. There was a charge upon it at the time, although a charge which, in the events that have happened, has become unimportant and unenforceable; because, I take it that it could not be said that there would be jurisdiction to sell that part of the land which is now a part of a public street. I mention that point because it was strongly urged on the appeal; but it appears to me that it is one which, though proper to notice, has no force in it whatever.

The other point is a very simple one, and it turns upon the 82nd section, which section deals with the case of the work not being done. Well, the work was not done within the time mentioned by the Act, one month. Then the section enacts, under a separate head, first, that the commissioners may do the work themselves; secondly, that the commissioners may charge the several owners of the buildings or lands in the street with the expenses; then the 3rd sub-section shows that "new street expenses" are to be charged to the owners in proportion to the extent of the frontage of their buildings and lands in the street; and then comes the 4th sub-section, and upon this it is said that there was a condition precedent to suing and enforcing the charge that the parties should have gone to arbitration; and unless they had the dispute which arose between them settled by arbitration there was no right on the part of the plaintiffs to seek to enforce the charge. I think that argument cannot be sustained. The 4th sub-section says that the proportion is to be ascertained by the surveyor, which was done; and that the apportionment is to be binding and conclusive on all parties unless the same is by written notice disputed within one month from the time of notice being given by the commissioners of the apportionment; and any such dispute shall be settled by arbitration. I refer also to the 6th sub-section, which enacts that, notwithstanding any dispute, interest on new street expenses shall commence as against each owner from the expiration of one month from the time of demand by the commissioners of his porportion of new street expenses.

Now, I do not find that any difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs arises by reason of these sub-sections. The dispute must be a dispute plainly under the 4th sub-section in relation to the apportionment. There was no such dispute. If there had been such a dispute the arbitrator would have been competent to enter upon it, and, I do not doubt, would have decided it, or sent a special case to the court if he thought it was proper for him to do so. He would have been the right person to decide a dispute of that kind; but on the facts of this case there was no such dispute. The dispute really was with reference to the 2nd sub-section, and generally on the Act, that the commissioners, or the urban authority who had become substituted in their place under the Act, had no jurisdiction to make the charge. I think, therefore, that portion of the case falls to the ground.

It is not necessary for me to say anything about the 249th section, or any of the subordinate parts of the case, after the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, in which I concur.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I only wish to add a few words. Speaking for myself, my conclusion is based entirely upon the fact that the street dealt with here is the 18ft. street, and that the appellant had land abutting on this street within the meaning of the 69th section. My conclusion would have been exactly the same whether or not there had been the agreement of 1878 relating to a subsequent extension of that street.

The only other thing that I wish to say is that I have arrived at no conclusion myself as to whether, in the case of the Sandgate District Local Board of Health v. Keene, there was a decision that under the Public Health Act, 1875, arbitration is a condition precedent to the right to recover even in cases where the dispute is a dispute as to liability only, but I do not think it is necessary to decide that in the present case.

For the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, under this Act of Parliament it seems to me, there can be no doubt that there is no need to go to arbitration in cases where liability only is disputed, and the apportionment is not disputed.

In re HUGHES.
BRANDON v. HUGHES. (a.)

Married woman — Protection order — Contract — Feme sole — Appointment — General power — Administration — Property liable to debts and liabilities — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), ss. 21, 25, 26.

A married woman who has obtained a protection order under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, is to be regarded as a feme sole for the purposes of contract. Consequently, where a married woman has obtained such an order, funds appointed by her by will, in exercise of a general power of appointment conferred upon her by a deed executed in 1894, and constituting her sole property, will become liable for a debt contracted by her in 1880, subsequent to the protection order, and her creditor can come in and prove for his debt in the administration of her estate.

Adjourned summons.

In the month of February, 1880, Mrs. Walker, otherwise Hughes, obtained a protection order against her husband under section 21 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. This order was never discharged.

By an indenture dated the 6th of March, 1880, Mrs. Walker covenanted with Mr. J. C. Stogdon to pay him the sum of £450 and any other sum which might become due on the footing of the security therein contained on the 30th of March following, together with interest thereon in the meantime at the rate therein mentioned. The money was not paid.

Mrs. Walker died on the 24th of March, 1896, having by her will appointed certain funds over which she had a general power of appointment under a certain indenture dated the 23rd of July, 1894. The funds so appointed constituted all Mrs. Walker's property at her death.

This was a summons in an action for the administration of her estate, by the assignee of Mr. Stogdon, asking that his claim to prove as a creditor of Mrs. Walker's estate for (inter alia) the £450 and interest due under the contract contained in the indenture of the 6th of March, 1880, might be allowed.

Warrington, Q.C., and Dauney, for Stogdon's assignee.—After the protection order had been obtained Mrs. Walker must be regarded as a feme sole in respect of all her contracts by virtue of sections 21 and 26 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and this sum must be treated as a debt due from her. In exercising by her will the general power of appointment she made this property her own, and it is liable for her debts: In re Ann, Wilson v. Ann, [1894] 1 Ch. 549.

Tanner, for the executor.—I submit that this is a case under section 25 of the Act. It is a case affecting the married woman's property and not her contract, and her property is subject to the same restrictions after she has obtained a protection order as it was subject to before the order: Hill v. Cooper, 41 W. R. 500, [1893] 2 Q. B. 85, referring to Waite v. Morland; 36 W. R. 484, 38 Ch. D. 135. Remaining, as she does, a married woman, she can contract as a married woman and not otherwise. On the question of the power of appointment—in the case of In re Ann, the wife's liabilities arose after the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, but in the case of In re Roper, 36 W. R. 750, 39 Ch. D. 482, they arose prior to the Act, and it was there held that the appointed fund was not liable.

Warrington, Q.C., in reply.—Hill v. Cooper did not deal at all with section 26 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. The marriage tie is not severed by the judicial separation, but she is a feme sole for the purposes of contract. In re Roper is not an authority on this point.

KEKEWICH, J.—It seems to me that I cannot reject this claim without saying that the Act of 1857 does not mean what it says. Section 21 of the Act says that if any such order for protection, as is contemplated by that section, be made, "the wife shall during the continuance thereof be and be deemed to have been, during such desertion of her, in the like position in all respects, with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued, as she would be under this Act if she obtained a decree of judicial separation." Then on turning to section 26 of the Act I find that "in every case of a judicial separation the wife shall, whilst so separated, be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract, and wrongs and injuries, and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding." It has been urged in argument that in the present case we are dealing with the property of the wife and not with her contract, and the case of Hill v. Cooper was relied upon in support of that argument. That was a case which decided that a married woman who has obtained a protection order still retains the status of a married woman, and that any property which she is restrained from anticipating still remains subject to the restraint as regards so much of it as became her property before the order was obtained. That case was decided under section 25 of the Act, which says that "in every case of a judicial separation the wife shall from the date of the sentence, and whilst the separation shall continue, be considered as a feme sole with respect to property of every description which she may acquire or which may come to or devolve upon her." The case of Hill v. Cooper does not, however, deal with the question before me, for I am dealing with a question of contract and not of property. Sections 21 and 26, read together, say that a married woman shall be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract, and therefore I think she can enter into a contract freed from those restrictions which are imposed upon married women for their own protection. Mrs. Walker did enter into such a contract with Mr. Stogdon. I decide this case simply in relation to the protection order, and therefore I do not refer to In re Ann, which was a case upon a different statute, and does not apply. I rely simply on the 21st and 26th sections of the statute; the counsel engaged in this case have not cited to me any case which helps us, and therefore I think the better plan is to treat the Act as meaning what it says—viz., that the wife is to be regarded as a feme sole. At the date of the contract she was a married woman under that protection order, and therefore was entitled to enter into this contract with Stogdon, and having afterwards exercised a general power of appointment, she could enter into engagements for which her estate was liable, and the court always treats the engagements of a married woman as her debts and liabilities. The plaintiff, therefore, of Mr. Stogdon can come into this administration action and prove for his debt.

GRANGE (Appellant) v. SILCOCK (Respondent). (a.)

Animal—Dog—Injury done to cattle or sheep—Liability of owner of dog—Dogs Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 60), s. 1.

A dog chanced to worry and kill a sheep which was trespassing on the land of the owner of the dog.

Held, that, the words of section 1 of the Dogs Act, 1865, being absolute, the owner of the dog was liable in damages.

Semble (per Collins, J.), there might be cases, however, where some qualifying proviso ought to be read into the section.

Case stated by justices for the city of Sheffield.

The plaintiff, Silcock, summoned the defendant, Grange, under section 1 of the Dogs Act, 1865, for the value of a sheep which had been worried and killed by the defendant's dog. At the time that the dog worried and killed the sheep, such sheep with a number of others was trespassing on the defendant's field. The lands of the plaintiff and the defendant adjoined, and were separated by a stone fence about four feet high. The sheep were Scotch horned sheep, and were capable of jumping any ordinary fence. They had frequently gone over the stone fence on to the defendant's land, and he had complained to the plaintiff of their doing so on several occasions. The land being of a moorland character it was admitted that very little damage was done by sheep trespassing. At the time when the sheep was worried by the dog the plaintiff or his servants were driving such sheep off the defendant's land. The defendant did not allege that he had made any attempt to protect his field, either by empounding the sheep or claiming compensation for damage done, but he contended that he was not liable in that the sheep were trespassing on his land, where his dog had a right to be for the purpose of protecting his grass, and that as the plaintiff had been warned to keep his sheep within bounds he was guilty of negligence in allowing them to stray.

The justices expressed their decision thus: "We were of opinion that under the very definite words of section 1 of the Dogs Act, 1865, 'the owner of every dog shall be liable in damages for injury done to any cattle or sheep by his dog, and it shall not be necessary to show a previous mischievous propensity in such dog or the owner's knowledge of such previous propensity or that the injury was attributable to neglect on part of such owner,' we were not called upon or entitled to take into consideration the questions which might have arisen between the parties in an action for trespass by or injury to the sheep in another court, but that the dog-owner was under that section liable before us for the injury done to the sheep by his dog, about which, as a fact, there was no dispute, and that therefore we had no other course than to construe literally the words of the section, and to enforce by our own order the payment of the amount of such injury." The justices accordingly made an order for payment by the dog-owner of 15s. for damages and 6s. for costs.

The defendant appealed.

Arthur Sims, for the dog-owner.—The justices are wrong in the view they have taken of the section. The circumstances in each case ought to be considered, otherwise the effect of the section is that the dog-owner, although unheard, is to be held liable for damages on proof that his dog had in fact worried or killed sheep or cattle. The Act merely renders proof of "scienter" no longer necessary evidence, but the owner of the animal at fault may escape from damages by proving negligence on the part of the person claiming damages: Fletcher v. Rylands, 14 W. R. 799.

Storry Deans, for the informant, was not called upon to argue.

LAWRANCE, J.—I think the justices were right, and therefore the appeal fails. The facts in this case are perfectly clear and not in dispute. Had they been somewhat different an interesting question might have been raised as to the dog-owner's liability under the Act. In this instance it was the owner of the sheep who drove them off the defendant's land, and while doing so the defendant's dog came up, without his master's knowledge and without having, therefore, been sent there by his master, and instead of assisting the plaintiff to do that which his master would have had clearly a right to do—namely, to drive the sheep off his land—the dog set to, worried, and killed a sheep. The statute certainly altered the law, making it no longer necessary, before the owner of the injured cattle or sheep could recover, for him to prove "a previous mischievous propensity or the owner's knowledge of such previous propensity" in the dog. There is nothing in the Act, so far as I read it, which admits of a defence, in circumstances such as these, being successfully raised. It seems to me, indeed, to be a patent example of the very kind of case the statute was especially intended to cover.

COLLINS, J.—I concur. The words of the statute are absolute and make no exception in favour of a dog who has worried and killed a sheep he found trespassing on his master's land. I do not desire to give any opinion on points of construction of the section, which are not really before the court, but I can conceive cases which would render it necessary to read some qualification into the literal meaning of the words of this section as they now stand. Take, for instance, this case: A wild bull escapes into a man's field. The owner of the field puts his dog upon the bull to turn him out. The dog in doing so bites the bull. In such a case surely the owner of the dog would not be liable in damages, and, therefore, the section would have to be read as if there were qualifying words to the effect that the owner of the dog should be liable unless some legal justification for so employing the dog can be shewn. Such a question does not arise here. It is clear that the dog could not be in a better position than his master in respect of this wrongful act. The right of the owner of any land upon which his neighbour's cattle have trespassed is to remove them, using only such violence in so doing as is necessary to enforce his right. Here the dog killed the sheep. His master, therefore, is clearly liable.

CLIFFORD v. THAMES IRONWORKS CO. (a.)

County court — Appeal — Point not raised at trial — County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120, and following sections.

Under the provisions of section 120 and the following sections of the County Courts Act, 1888, the omission of the judge to direct the jury as to the law is a point of law, which must be raised and submitted to the judge at the trial in order to entitle the party complaining thereof to appeal.

Appeal from the Bow County Court.

The action was an action for damages for personal injuries. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed, on the grounds (1) that there was no evidence proper to go to the jury; (2) that the learned judge misdirected the jury by omitting to direct them as to negligence and contributory negligence, and by omitting to tell them that if the plaintiff was the author of his own injury he could not recover.

E. Morten, for the respondent, raised the preliminary objection that no point of law was taken in the court below, and cited Smith v. Baker & Sons, 40 W. R. 392, [1891] A. C. 325.

Jelf, Q.C. (Morten Smith with him), for the appellant.—Where the point of law arises during the summing up of the learned judge it is not necessary to take it in order to establish a right of appeal, nor would it be practicable to do so: Barber v. Bart, 42 W. R. 572, [1894] 2 Q. B. 437.

GRANTHAM, J.—I see no difficulty in counsel drawing the judge's attention to a misdirection at the trial.

CHANNELL, J.—The court has no jurisdiction to hear this appeal. By the County Courts Act only a limited right of appeal is given. Every now and then a point may arise which could not have been taken at the trial. But here both grounds of appeal are points which could have been taken at the trial.

In re ESTATE DUTY PAYABLE ON THE DEATH OF THE SECOND EARL COWLEY. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Settled property—Value of property passing on death—Mortgage created by tenant for life and remainderman—Annuity charged upon estate in favour of remainderman during life of tenant for life—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2, 7.

Property was settled upon a person for life, with remainder to his son in tail. The tenants for life and in tail, by deed barred the entail and reserved to themselves a joint power of appointment over the property, the limitation in default of the exercise of the power being to the father for life, with remainder to the son in tail. They then joined in creating mortgages whereby, in the exercise of their joint power of appointment and by virtue of their respective estates, they conveyed the property in fee simple to the mortgagees to secure £230,000. Part of this sum was applied for the benefit of the tenant for life, the remainder being paid to or for the benefit of the tenant in tail. By a re-settlement subsequently executed this property was charged with an annuity of £3,000 in favour of the tenant in tail during the life of the tenant for life. The tenant for life died in 1895.

Held, that, in determining the value of the property passing on the death of the tenant for life, no deduction could be made in respect of either (1) the £230,000; or (2) the capital value of the annuity of £3,000.

Decision of the Divisional Court (45 W. R. 538, [1897] 2 Q. B. 47) reversed as to (1) and confirmed as to (2).

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Bruce, J.) upon a petition of the third Earl Cowley under section 10, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, from the decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue (reported 45 W. R. 538; [1897] 2 Q. B. 47).

By his will dated the 27th of June, 1863, and proved on the 20th of August in the same year, the late Earl of Mornington devised his real estate to the use of trustees upon trust to pay the interest on certain mortgage debts (all since discharged) and to pay certain annuities. Subject and charged as above mentioned, the testator's real estate was to be held upon trust for the first Earl Cowley for life, and after his death for the second earl for life, and after the death of the second earl for the first and every other son of the second earl successively in remainder in tail male with remainders over. The will also gave powers to the tenants for life of jointuring and charging portions.

The first earl died on the 15th of July, 1884, and his eldest son, the second earl, thereupon succeeded in possession to the estates and interests conferred upon him by the above will.

By a deed-poll of the 1st of April, 1865, the second earl, in exercise of his power of jointuring under the above will, appointed a yearly rent-charge of £500 to his wife Emily Gwendolen Countess Cowley for her life, if she should survive him, to be charged on the trust estates.

By virtue of divers indentures the life interest of the second earl in the trust estates (and certain policies on his life) became charged with payment to the London Assurance Corporation of several annuities during his life redeemable on payment of the principal sum of £64,248, and also with several mortgage debts amounting together to the principal sum of £80,000.

The petitioner (then Viscount Dangan) was the only son of the second earl, and attained the age of twenty-one years in his father's lifetime on the 13th of January, 1887.

On the 14th of January, 1887, the second earl and the petitioner executed a disentailing deed (which was duly enrolled) whereby the interests in the trust property created by or under the powers of the above will and preceding the estate tail of the petitioner (except the life estate of the second earl) were preserved, and subject thereto the trust estates were limited to such uses and subject to such powers as the second earl and the petitioner should jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment to the use of the second earl for life by way of restoration of the estate vested in him immediately before the execution of that deed with all powers annexed thereto, and after his death to certain uses to secure a jointure of £2,000 per annum to the Countess Emily Gwendolen and to secure portions and to enable the petitioner to create a jointure for his widow (if any) with remainder to the use of the petitioner in tail male with remainders over.

In the year 1888 an arrangement was effected under which the Prudential Assurance Co. paid off the mortgage debts owing, and redeemed the annuities payable to the London Assurance Co. (taking transfers of their securities) and made a further advance to the second earl and the petitioner jointly, the total sum so paid or advanced by the Prudential being £210,000. That sum was secured to the Prudential by a mortgage of the 8th of June, 1888, to which the second earl, the petitioner, and the Countess Emily Gwendolen (who joined for the purpose of postponing her jointure) were parties. By this mortgage, after a joint and several covenant by the second earl and the petitioner to pay the principal sum of £210,000 and interest, the second earl and the petitioner in exercise of the power of appointment vested in them by the disentailing deed of the 14th of January, 1887, appointed, and also by virtue of their respective estates and interests therein conveyed, the trust property to the Prudential in fee simple (subject to the annuities then subsisting under the will of Lord Mornington) by way of mortgage to secure the said principal sum and interest.

By a deed of resettlement of the 9th of June, 1888, after recitals stating that part of the £210,000 advanced by the Prudential was applied in discharging incumbrances on the life estate of the second earl, and that the mortgage to the Prudential was executed by the petitioner on an express agreement that the second earl should join with him in executing the present deed, the second earl and the petitioner, in exercise of their joint power under the disentailing deed, appointed that (subject as in that deed mentioned and to the mortgage to the Prudential) the trustees should hold the trust property in default of and subject to any appointment under the joint power upon trust that the petitioner should receive, during the life of the second earl, an annuity which, at the death of the second earl, amounted to £3,000 a year; and subject thereto in trust for the second earl for life by way of restoration of his life estate under the will of Lord Mornington, and after his death upon trust for the petitioner for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainders over. The resettlement also contained a provision to the effect that as between the second earl and the petitioner the second earl should, during his life, be primarily liable for the payment of the interest on the mortgage debt of £210,000.

By subsequent deeds the trust estates were further charged by the second earl and the petitioner to secure various sums expressed to be advanced to them by the Prudential.

The second earl died on the 28th of February, 1895. At that date the principal mortgage debt owing to the Prudential under the above mortgage and further charges amounted to £230,000, of which £199,987 11s. 8d. had been paid to or for the second earl, and £30,012 8s. 4d. to or for the petitioner.

The petitioner, as the person to whom property under the resettlement had passed on the death of the second earl for a beneficial interest in possession, and as accountable for the estate duty accordingly, duly delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an affidavit with a schedule annexed. Parts I. and II. of the schedule gave particulars of the trust investments and lands, the total principal value shown being £538,426 11s. 1d. Part III. contained "deductions from the principal value of property comprised in Parts I. and II.," and included five items. Items 1, 2, and 3 represented the capitalized values of the subsisting annuities under Lord Mornington's will and of interest payable during two joint lives on the consideration money received for the sale of an advowson, part of the trust estate comprised in that will. These items, together amounting to £9,140 17s., were allowed by the commissioners,

Item 4 was such part of the mortgage debt of £230,000 as was created wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit—viz., £199,987 11s. 8d. Item 5 was the capitalized value of the life annuity of £3,000 enjoyed under the resettlement by the petitioner at the death of the deceased—viz., £65,200. These two items were disallowed by the commissioners. The net principal value chargeable with estate duty would be, on the basis of the deductions claimed by the petitioner, £264,098 2s. 5d., and according to the determination of the commissioners, £529,285 14s. 1d.

The petitioner in his appeal claimed that the whole of the £230,000 secured on mortgage, and also the £65,200, the capitalized value of the annuity, ought to be allowed as deductions from the principal value of the estate.

The Divisional Court allowed the deduction of the £230,000, and disallowed the deduction of the £65,200.

The Crown appealed, and the petitioner gave a cross-notice of appeal.

Sir Richard Webster, A.G., Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.

Haldane, Q.C., and H. Fellows, for the petitioner.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the report in the court below. The material sections of the Finance Act, 1894, are set out in the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 3.—The following judgments were read:

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question raised upon this appeal is upon what amount is estate duty payable under the Finance Act of 1894 to be assessed upon the estate of the late second Earl Cowley, who died on the 28th of February, 1895; is it to be upon the sum of £538,426 11s. 1d., the then net principal value of what I will call the settled estate, less only the sum of £9,140 17s., or less also the sum of £230,000, the amount of a mortgage debt more particularly referred to hereafter, and less also the sum of £65,200, the capitalized value of an annuity of £3,000 a year payable to the third Earl Cowley, then Viscount Dangan, by his father, the second earl, during his lifetime? The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have allowed no deductions from the principal value of £538,426 11s. 1d., excepting the sum of £9,140 17s. This last sum consisted of what have been called overriding charges upon the settled estates at the date of the death of the second earl, being the value of annuities charged thereon in favour of annuitants and of another similar charge, and no question is raised by the Crown as to this allowed deduction. The petitioner, the third earl, who succeeded to the possession of the settled estates upon the death of his father, the second earl, insists that a deduction should also be made in respect of the mortgage debt of £230,000, as also in respect of the capitalized value of the annuity of £3,000 per annum — namely, £65,200, and these last two sums the commissioners have disallowed as deductions. The Divisional Court has allowed the deduction as regards the £230,000, and against this the Crown appeals. It disallowed the deduction of the £65,200, and against this the petitioner, the third Earl Cowley, appeals.

The answer to be given to the questions raised depends upon the true construction of the Finance Act, 1894; but before referring thereto it is necessary, considering the course the arguments have taken in this court, that the dispositions which have taken place in relation to the "settled estates" should first be clearly understood. [The Lord Justice stated the dealings above set out, and proceeded:]

I cannot doubt that in these dealings with the settled estates as above mentioned the life estate of the second earl therein was expressly kept on foot as security for the moneys borrowed thereon, and that it was not extinguished or merged into an equitable estate in fee in the Prudential Assurance Co., as excellently argued by Mr. Haldane for the third earl. The real substance of what was done (and this is what is to be looked at apart from the form of conveyancing) was that the second earl mortgaged his life estate in the settled estates to the Prudential Co., and that his son mortgaged his reversion in such estates to that company, to secure the repayment of the £230,000, and that this was the real transaction whether it was to be found carried out by one deed or by two. I cannot agree with the learned judges in the court below when they held that it was one charge on the fee simple of the settled estates; in other words, an overriding charge thereon. It is true that by the conjoint operation of the father and son the Prudential Co. obtained an equitable estate in fee, but the charge remained a charge upon the life estate of the second earl and upon the reversion of Viscount Dangan. The life estate of the second earl remained extant until his death on the 28th of February, 1895, charged with the mortgage of £230,000, when the life estate and the mortgage thereon each ceased and ended. Up to that date the life estate of the second earl was charged with payment of the interest of the money borrowed on mortgage from the Prudential Co. as and when it became due, and also with the annuity of £3,000 a year to his eldest son, Viscount Dangan.

I now come to the Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30). By section 1 it is enacted that "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act" (which the second earl did) "there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty, called 'estate duty.'" This section would not, I think, embrace the present case, for the life estate of the second earl ceased at his death and passed to no one.

By section 2, sub-section 1, it is however enacted that "property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following—that is to say, (a) Property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose" (this does not embrace the present case); "(b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest." This sub-section in my judgment covers the case of the life estate of the second earl, which ceased upon his death, mortgaged as it was to the Prudential Assurance Co., and was intended to embrace such a case, and the extent to which a benefit accrues by the cesser of such interest was the extent of the interest which then ceased, and that is the life estate of the second earl, and consequently his life estate when he died became property which by the Act was to be deemed to have passed on his death, and comes within section 2, sub-section 1 (b).

I now come to how by the Act property which is to be deemed to pass upon a death is to be valued for estate duty, and this brings me first of all to section 7, sub-section 1. By this sub-section it is enacted that in determining the value of a life estate for the purposes of estate duty, allowance shall be made for reasonable funeral expenses, and for debts and incumbrances, as I read the sub-section, if such debts or incumbrances were incurred or created bonâ fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit and to take effect out of his interest. This, I think, means a debt or incumbrance to take effect out of the estate which passes. This does not appear to me to have any application to an estate, as here, which is deemed to pass, for I do not see how an incumbrance can be created thereon which cannot exist at the time of passing. This mortgage debt of the second earl is not a debt or incumbrance upon an estate which passes or is deemed to pass pursuant to the Act, for the mortgage upon the estate of the second earl came to an end when that estate also came to an end, and is no longer a charge upon a life estate which was deemed to pass, and was not a debt upon the estate which passed, but only upon the reversion. I agree with the Court of Queen's Bench that this section 7, sub-section 1, does not apply to this case, though I do not follow their reasons.

I now come to sub-section 7 of section 7. This sub-section enacts that "the value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased" (these words evidently refer to the property which is deemed to pass as mentioned in section 2, sub-section 1 (b)), "shall," as I read it, be as follows: (a) If the interest ceasing extended to the whole income accruing of the property which shall be deemed to pass, the value of the benefit shall be the principal value of that property. This does not apply to this case, because the interest which ceased at the death of the second earl did not extend to the whole income, but only to the whole income less the charges represented by the sum of £9,140 17s. before mentioned; (b) if the interest ceasing extended to less than the whole income of the property which shall be deemed to pass, the value of the benefit accruing shall be the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended. Now, the interest which ceased upon the death of the second earl in the settled estates did not, as before pointed out, extend to the whole income of the property which should be deemed to pass, and it is under this clause (b), therefore, that the value of the benefit accruing is to be ascertained.

I have a difficulty in understanding the exact meaning of the words "of an addition to the property," or for what purpose they were inserted, nor did I hear anything clear as to this in the arguments addressed to us on either side. But whatever may be their true interpretation, they do not mean that the value to be arrived at is by making an allowance for a mortgage debt like the mortgage debt of £230,000 in this case; it is the value of the interest which passes or is deemed to pass which is to bear the estate duty, and when this interest passed it was no longer (except by the man's own act, about which hereafter) clogged with this mortgage, for when the life estate ceased so did the mortgage thereon.

The learned judges in the court below say: "If the income to which the interest of the deceased extended is to be taken as the income of the property after deducting the charges on the property 1, 2, 3 (that is, the £9,140 17s.), why should not the income to which his interest extended be limited in like manner to the amount he was entitled to receive after the interest upon the mortgages (the £230,000 mortgages) had been paid?" It seems to me that in this there is left out of view this cardinal point, that what is to pay estate duty is the value of the interest which passes or is deemed to pass upon the death, not to the extent to which it may have been enjoyed by the deceased, which may or may not have been during his life diminished by what he had borrowed thereon.

As regards the £9,140 17s., this was charged upon the settled estates, which passed so charged upon the death of the second earl; but this is not so as regards this mortgage of £230,000, for the life interest of the second earl upon which it was charged did not pass so charged, for that mortgage, so far as the life estate was concerned, had come to an end though the estate was deemed to pass. The learned judges say that the "mortgages undoubtedly remained subsisting charges at his death," but the mortgage by the second earl upon his life estate did not remain, for that was gone; the mortgage, it is true, remained a charge upon what the third earl came into, but not by reason of anything which the second earl had done in his lifetime, whose interest we are dealing with, but solely by reason of what the son had done by charging his reversion. It is not upon the value of what the man succeeds to, that the estate duty is to be levied; and how can what the reversioner does towards diminishing the value of his reversion, when he gets it, affect what is the value of the property which passes upon a death?

In my judgment, for the above reasons, the value of the benefit accruing upon the death of the second earl must be ascertained under section 7, sub-section 7 (b), without making any allowance for the £230,000 mortgages. As regards the annuity of £3,000 a year charged upon the life estate of the second earl, and payable thereout during his life to his son, for the reasons I have given above, I think that no deduction for this can be made.

It appears to me that, as before stated, the Finance Act makes liable to estate duty the value of the estate which passes and not the value it may be to any individual successor, and it appears to me that is the key to the construction of the Act; consequently, the point taken by Mr. Haldane—that the third earl, when he succeeded to the settled estates, was no better off by the cesser of this annuity than he was before—is in reality not in point.

I think that the appeal of the Crown as to the £230,000 mortgage succeeds, that the cross-appeal of the third earl fails, and consequently judgment must be for the Crown with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—This case is of so much importance that I think it worth while, notwithstanding that I shall be repeating to a great extent what has been said by the lord justice, to state my own view of the facts, and also to give in my own words the construction of the Finance Act, 1894, so far as it relates to this case.

Out of the somewhat complicated statement contained in the petition I will endeavour to extract what seems to be really material. Under the will of the Earl of Mornington, who died in 1863, and subject to certain overriding charges existing under or by virtue of the said will, certain real estate and money directed to be laid out in real estate (hereinafter for greater clearness referred to as "the settled property") stood limited to the use of the second Earl Cowley for life, with remainder to his eldest son, the third Earl Cowley (the petitioner), in tail. The legal estate was outstanding in the trustees of Lord Mornington's will, so that the life estate of the second earl and the remainder in tail of the third earl were equitable estates only. The second earl mortgaged his life interest in the property to the London Assurance Corporation, and at the date of the disentailing deed next hereinafter mentioned there were subsisting mortgages of that life interest in favour of the London Assurance Corporation for securing payment of annuities to the amount of £5,322 per annum during the life of the second earl, redeemable on payment of £64,248, and mortgage debts for a further sum amounting to £79,500. On the attainment by the third earl of his majority in January, 1888, and by a disentailing deed of the 14th of that month (duly inrolled), the estate tail of the third earl in the settled property was barred, and (omitting minor and unessential complications) the settled property was limited (so far as the father and son were competent to limit it) to such uses as they should jointly appoint, and, in default of appointment, to the use of the second earl for life, by way of restoration of the life estate vested in him immediately before the execution of the disentailing deed, with remainder to the third earl in tail, with remainders over. The life estate of the second earl having been conveyed, as before mentioned, to the London Assurance Corporation, it was, of course, impossible for the father and son to deal with anything beyond the equity of redemption in the life estate, and the reversion thereon in fee simple. The joint power of appointment vested in the two could not have been made to override the security to the London Assurance Corporation, and by the plain language of the disentailing assurance any intention to do so was conclusively negatived. This subordination of the joint power of appointment to the securities of the London Assurance Corporation will prove to be of vital importance when we come to consider the construction of the mortgage to the Prudential Assurance Co. On the 8th of June, 1888, the amount payable to the London Assurance Corporation, for the redemption of their mortgage on the life interest of the second earl, consisted of the above-mentioned sums, £64,248 and £79,500, and some arrears of annuities and interest, making altogether £150,853 6s. 7d. This sum, at the request of the second and third earls, was paid to the London Assurance Corporation by the Prudential Assurance Co.; and, by an indenture to which the second and third earls were parties, the London Assurance Corporation assigned their annuities and mortgage debts and all arrears thereof, and conveyed the second earl's life interest in the property, to the Prudential Co. subject to redemption. The Prudential Co. thereby became transferees of all the rights of the London Assurance Corporation. This transfer was part of an arrangement whereby the Prudential Co. agreed to lend to the second and third earls £210,000, to be secured by the mortgage next mentioned, on the terms that a sufficient part of the loan should be applied for the purpose of obtaining the transfer to the Prudential Co. as a further protection and security for the loan. It was also part of the arrangement that £59,146 13s. 5d., the residue of the £210,000 loan over and above the £150,853 6s. 7d. paid to the London Assurance Corporation, should be paid to the second and third earls jointly. Accordingly by a mortgage deed, dated the same 8th of June, 1888, but executed after the assignment and conveyance by the London Assurance Corporation to the Prudential Co., in consideration of the £150,853 6s. 7d. paid to the London Assurance Corporation, and of the £59,146 13s. 5d. paid to the second and third earls, making up the £210,000, the second and third earls jointly and severally covenanted with the Prudential Co. to pay the sum of £210,000 with interest. By the same mortgage deed the second and third earls, in exercise of the joint power given to them by the disentailing deed, appointed and, by virtue of their estates and interest, conveyed all the settled property to the Prudential Co., to hold to the company, as to such of the premises as were of freehold tenure, to the use of the company in fee simple, and as to the residue freed and discharged, with certain exceptions, from the powers therein mentioned conferred by the will of Lord Mornington, and subject to the charges therein mentioned, to the intent that the premises thereby mortgaged might be held and enjoyed by the company and their assigns freed and discharged from such powers, except as therein aforesaid. The deed contained a proviso for redemption by the second and third earls, or either of them, or any person interested in the equity of redemption of the mortgaged premises. The deed also contained the following proviso containing the terms, as between the Prudential Co. and the second and third earls, on which the assigned securities of the London Assurance Corporation were to be held: "Provided always and it is hereby agreed and declared that the several annuities and mortgage debts and interest transferred to the company by the hereinbefore recited indenture of even date herewith and all securities for the same thereby transferred shall continue on foot as subsisting charges on the life estate of the said Earl Cowley party hereto in the trust estate held on the trusts of the will of the said testator for the benefit of the company and their assigns and so as to protect them against all incumbrances and charges if any such there be and by way of an additional security for the said principal sum of £210,000 hereinbefore covenanted to be paid as aforesaid and interest thereon."

Several questions of importance arose on the mortgage deed hereinbefore stated; but before dealing with them it will be convenient to complete the statement of material facts by setting forth, so far as is necessary, the provisions of a deed of resettlement of the 9th of June, 1888, which completed, as between the second earl and the third earl, the arrangement under which the £210,000 was borrowed. By that deed it was, among other things, provided (a) that the settled property should be held in default of and subject to any appointment under the joint power upon trust and to the intent that the third earl should receive during the life of the second earl certain annuities which at the death of the second earl amounted to £3,000 a year, and (b) that as between the second earl, his heirs, executors, and administrators, and the third earl, his heirs, executors, and administrators, and the persons entitled to the equity of redemption of the mortgaged premises comprised in the mortgage of the 8th of June, 1888, the second earl, his heirs, executors, and administrators, should be primarily liable for payment of the interest which during his life should accrue due on the mortgage debt of £210,000, and the third earl should be primarily liable for the interest which, if the second earl predeceased the third earl, should accrue during the residue of the life of the third earl, and that after the death of the longest liver of the two the mortgaged premises should be the primary fund for the payment of the said sum of £210,000 and interest thenceforth to accrue due thereon. By certain deeds of further charge additional sums amounting altogether to £20,000 were borrowed from the Prudential Co. under circumstances which made the further advance and the original advance of £210,000 part of a consolidated mortgage debt of £230,000.

We are now in a position to ascertain the true effect of the transactions above described. It was argued that the mortgage deed of the 8th of June, 1888, to the Prudential Co. operated to effect a merger of the equitable life estate of the second earl in the property, and, by the effect of the appointment under the joint power, to vest the fee simple in the Prudential Co. free from the life estate. The appointment under the joint power could have no such effect, for no such appointment could override the pre-existing security created by the second earl in favour of the London Assurance Corporation, and by them transferred to the Prudential Co. The Prudential Co., and they alone, could have effected a merger of the life interest, and it is plain that they intended not to effect but to avoid a merger, not only by their taking the transfer, but by the express provision in the mortgage deed before set out. In such a case the intention of the parties interested must determine whether there is a merger or not. But for the accident of the legal estate being outstanding, there could not have been room for a suggestion of merger. The legal estate during the life of the second earl would, during the whole of his life, have been vested first in the London Assurance Co., and afterwards in their transferees, the Prudential Assurance Co., and only a surrender could have effected a merger. The life estate of the second earl subsisted, therefore, until his death and then ceased. The sum of £150,853 6s. 7d. payable for redemption of the mortgages of the London Assurance Corporation was part of the loan of £210,000. As between the second earl and the Prudential Co. the liability of the second earl arose under his covenant to pay the £210,000 contained in the mortgage to them, and the rights of the Prudential Co. to the transferred securities are defined by the proviso before set out. The result, as I construe the document, was that the Prudential Co. had no personal claim upon the second earl for the £150,853 6s. 7d., or any part thereof, as a separate debt, nor would such a right have been of the slightest advantage to them. This conclusion, however, is in no way necessary for the decision in this case. As against these incumbrancers, if any, the Prudential Co. were entitled to treat the annuities and mortgage debts transferred by the London Assurance Corporation as subsisting charges on the life estate of the second earl. As between himself, however, and the Prudential Co., he was personally liable for the payment of the whole debt of £210,000 and interest. Finally, as between the third earl and all persons interested in the equity of redemption of the property he was liable only to the interest during his life, and though he might have been sued by the Prudential Co. for the whole debt, he would have been entitled to be reimbursed by the third earl personally as to the interest to accrue after his death during the life of the third earl, and as to the whole capital sum by the settled property. If he had been called upon to pay and had paid the £210,000 to the Prudential Co., he would have been entitled to an assignment of the £210,000 to himself, or a trustee for him, in order to keep up his rights to reimbursement against the second earl and the settled property.

At the second earl's death, which happened on the 9th of February, 1895, the overriding charges under or by virtue of the Earl of Mornington's will consisted of two annuities of £1,000 and £500 a year, and a terminable yearly payment of £40 10s. The third earl in September, 1895, admitting himself to be accountable for the estate duty properly payable on the settled property, filed an affidavit estimating the principal value of the investments forming part of the settled property at £193,502 15s., and the principal value of the real estate at £344,923 16s. 1d., making the estimated principal value of the whole settled property £538,426 11s. 1d., which has been in the argument on the appeal accepted as correct.

From the estimated value the third earl claimed as deductions the capitalized values of the three overriding charges subsisting under and by virtue of the Earl of Mornington's will, and these deductions have been allowed. He also claimed as a deduction that part of the aggregate loan of £230,000, which had been expended in paying off the London Assurance Corporation, or otherwise for the benefit of the second earl, amounting to £199,987 11s. 8d., or alternatively the whole £230,000. He claimed as a further deduction the sum of £65,200 as the capitalized value of the annuities amounting to £3,000 per annum charged upon the whole settled property which were payable to him during the life, and ceased upon the death, of the second earl. The learned judges in the court below allowed the deduction of the whole sum of £230,000, but disallowed the deduction of £65,200 on account of the annuities for £3,000. There was an appeal on behalf of the Crown from the allowance of the £230,000, and a cross-appeal by the third earl against the disallowance of the £65,200.

The validity of these claims depends upon the construction of the Finance Act, 1894, Part I. Part I. of the Finance Act, 1894, is for present purposes a separate Act, and will hereafter be referred to as the Act; it is concerned with the creation and incidence of a new duty called estate duty, and what may be conveniently called the general scheme of the Act is concisely but comprehensively set forth in section 1. The occasion on which the duty is to arise is the death of any person dying after the commencement of the Act, called in the Act and hereinafter "the deceased." The duty is to be levied and paid upon the principal value of all property, real and personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of the deceased. The very general word "passes" is not a technical word, but one capable of the widest possible meaning, and there is nothing in the general scheme to limit its meaning to property of the deceased. Indeed, in connection with the words "settled or not settled," it seems to involve plainly property which did not belong to the deceased and may never have belonged to him. So far as the general scheme is concerned there is no reference to the persons to whom the property passes, or the amount of benefit taken by them, and the duty is leviable indifferently whether they are relatives of the deceased or strangers in blood. In other words, there is no reference to or implication of that relation of predecessor and successor or the existence of a succession which forms the basis of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. The duty is in no sense a duty on successions, but in respect of the value of the property passing from or to what person soever it passes. It is an essential feature of the general scheme that the duty is to be a graduated duty, and to be taken in lieu of the existing duties mentioned in the first section; but with these provisions we are not generally concerned in the present case, though it may be observed in passing that the rate of duty does not in general depend at all upon the way in which the property passing becomes distributed upon the death of the deceased.

The general scheme of the Act thus being ascertained by the first section, the rest of the Act (so far as it is necessary for present purposes to deal with it) is concerned with express provisions creating exceptions from the duty, the method (which in the present case is important) of ascertaining the principal value of the property, the mode in which the duty is to be graduated and raised, and provisions explanatory of the terms of the first section. The second section contains the most important for present purposes of these explanatory provisions. It provides by sub-section 1 that property passing on the death of the deceased is to include the property following: (a) Property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose. We are not here concerned directly with this sub-section, but it is not perhaps unimportant to mention it as indicating, in connection with the subsequent explanatory clauses of the Act, how widely the Act here departs from the analogy of previous Taxing Acts, and how impossible it is to construe the Act with reference to them. Clause (b) is that with which we are directly concerned. It includes "Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased." This would include a life interest of the deceased, even though he might have assigned or mortgaged it to any other person, or even a life interest in which he never had a beneficial right, as in the case of an estate for his life originally limited to another person.

It is evident, however, that to levy the duty on property ceasing on the death might, in some cases, involve a purely arbitrary standard, departing altogether from the test of passing at the death of the deceased involved in the general scheme. For instance, to mention one case only, a pension to a retired civil or military servant of the Crown would in general cease on his death, but there would be no passing of it; it would absolutely determine. It was necessary, therefore, to qualify the general words "ceasing on the death of the deceased," and that is done by the following words: "To the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest." These words may at first sight seem to involve a departure from the principle that the Act takes no notice of successions, but that is not so. The words only limit the operation of the word "ceasing" by confining it to cases where something passes, and to the extent to which anything does pass. They in no sense make the duty a duty on the succession. The subsequent words of the sub-section deal with, and except, cases in which there is in a sense something passing, though not in the sense in which "passing" is intended to be used in the Act.

Pausing here, there can be no doubt that on the ceasing of the second Earl Cowley's life interest on his death, estate duty became leviable. How that duty had to be estimated is dealt with later on in section 7, sub-section 7, of the Act. Sub-section 7 is that part of the section which deals with the particular case of an interest ceasing on the death. It provides in terms for the ascertainment of the value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest on the death of the deceased, and these words, at first sight, seem again to indicate a departure from the general scheme of valuing the property passing, by substituting for it a valuation of the succession. But this is explained by the way in which the corresponding words are used in section 2, sub-section 1 (b). They are there used, as before pointed out, as a measure of the extent to which the property in which the interest ceases is to be deemed to pass, and section 7, sub-section 7, only shows the way of applying that measure. The value is to be ascertained in alternative cases (a) and (b) as follows: "Shall (a), if the interest extended to the whole income of the property, be the principal value of that property; and (b), if the interest extended to less than the whole income of the property, be the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended." In each of these alternative clauses the interest dealt with is clearly the interest which ceases, and not the interest which the deceased enjoyed, or the interest taken. The second Earl Cowley's interest in the settled property did not extend to the whole income, being subject to the overriding annuities of £1,000 and £500 and yearly payment of £40 10s., subsisting under or by virtue of Lord Mornington's will. The case, therefore, falls under the alternative (b), and the value is to be the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which his interest extended. The language is somewhat peculiar and requires careful consideration. The key to its meaning is to be found by bearing in mind the general scheme of the Act. The duty is to be levied on the principal value of the property passing. What passes must be ascertained at the moment of passing without reference to any events happening before or afterwards. The income passing, will as in other cases, fix according to the nature of the property the amount of principal value. We find then that the income to which the interest extended is taken as the measure for the purpose of the calculation, and it is treated as though it were income of an addition to the property being dealt with, in order to determine the correct mode in which the principal value is to be arrived at.

In the case before us no question has been raised as to the way in which the deductions made in respect of the overriding charges have been arrived at, but lest it should be treated as a precedent, I feel bound to observe upon it. The principal value for the purposes of the Act has been determined by taking the whole principal value of the settled property, and deducting therefrom the capitalized value of the overriding charges. This is not the method prescribed by the Act, though in the particular case the numerical value is not far off from that which would result from applying the rule of sub-section 7 (b). In other cases the result obtained would be widely different from that intended by the Act. Take, for instance, the not uncommon case of an overriding term of twenty-one years from the death of a testator held on trust for raising a fund for payment of his debts or for portions. If the whole income of the settled property were £1,000 a year, and £900 had to be raised during the term for the purposes of it, the income to which the life tenant's interest extended would be £100 only, and the principal value of an addition to the settled property producing £100 a year would be in that case one-tenth of the principal value of the whole property arrived at in the way prescribed for property of that kind. But it might happen that the term of twenty-one years would expire by effluxion of time on the day after the death of the life tenant. The value of the charge under the term would then be next to nothing, and deducting its value from the principal value of the whole property would lead to a totally wrong result. Subject to what has been before pointed out as to the inaccurate mode of dealing with the overriding charges, which in my judgment, if it be worth while, ought to be corrected, the deductions as to those items are right.

The case as to the £230,000 debt may be summed up by saying that its existence in no way affected the interest passing at the second earl's death, but only the extent of his enjoyment of that interest, which is irrelevant. The debt, therefore, ought not to be deducted; and the same line of reasoning would show that the alternative claim for a deduction of that part of the £230,000 which was paid to or for the benefit of the second earl must equally be rejected.

But then it was argued before us that the £230,000 is to be allowed as a deduction under section 7, sub-section 1, and the learned judges in the court below seem to have held that the deductions provided for by section 7, sub-section 1, ought to be allowed in cases within sub-section 7 (a), but not in cases within sub-section 7 (b). This construction would lead to very extraordinary results, and I see no reason why if the deductions are permissible in the one case they can be excluded in the other. But when it is once established that the valuation in sub-section 7 when fully carried out is a valuation, not of the interest of the person who takes or even of the deceased, but of the property passing, it follows that no incumbrances created by the deceased on his interest, or by the person taking, on the interest which he takes, can be brought into account; and having regard to this I see no ground on which any of the deductions provided for in section 7, sub-section 1, should be allowed at all. Whatever deductions are provided for in that sub-section are deductions from an "estate," which is the word used in the Act to denote an aggregate of property passing —not a particular property passing. Next, the estate is to be one from which funeral expenses and general debts of the deceased may properly be deducted. Thirdly, the debts and incumbrances to be deducted are to be deducted from the land or other subjects of property liable thereto. It seems impossible to hold that the funeral expenses of the deceased can in any case be payable out of property his interest in which, if he ever had one, has ceased, and debts of his which are not incumbrances are in the same position as funeral expenses. It seems equally impossible to point out any land, or subject of property, out of which any incumbrances of the second earl are now payable, other than assets of his which by law are made subject to debts. I do not think it necessary to discuss in the present case the limitations contained in clauses (a) and (b) of section 7, sub-section 1, though probably they would be found to involve further objections to the claim now made by the petition. The learned judges were of opinion that a mortgage debt on the life estate only could not be deducted out of property when the life interest ceased, and no doubt this is so; but I see no ground for treating differently a mortgage debt which is only a continuing incumbrance because the owner of the reversion has made it a charge on his reversion. It is not a continuing incumbrance on any property of the owner of the life estate. Different considerations might apply to the case of an incumbrance which the two combined to create on the corpus of the property; but, as before shown, that does not arise here. I think that the Attorney-General was right in saying that for the purposes of this case the mortgage of the life estate and of the reversion might just as well have been made by separate deeds.

The annuities, amounting to £3,000, affected only the enjoyment by the second earl of the property which passed, not the extent of the property passing, and cannot therefore be deducted.

The appeal of the Crown must be allowed, and the cross-appeal dismissed.

Collins, L.J.—I agree with the judgments which have been delivered; but as we are differing from the court below, I will add a few words.

The question is, Had the second Earl Cowley while he lived, or had any other person, an interest which ceased at his death in any property? If so, such property is deemed to have passed on his death "to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest" (section 2, sub-section 1 (b)). I am of opinion that the mortgage of his life interest in the trust property, which was given by the second Earl Cowley to the London Assurance Corporation, to secure in all £140,000 and upwards, assigned by them to the Prudential Assurance Co. under the fresh arrangement made by the second earl and the present earl with that company, whereby it was provided that it should be a collateral security for the whole amount advanced by them, was a subsisting interest in the hands of the latter company which ceased upon the death of the second earl; and the property embraced in that security must, therefore, be deemed to have passed upon his death. This follows from the fact that that mortgage was expressly kept alive by a proviso in the later mortgage by the second and third earl to the Prudential Co., and it is therefore unnecessary to express any opinion upon the point, so ably argued by Mr. Haldane, as to what would have been the effect of the new arrangement but for this proviso, in working a merger of the life estate, and so preventing the cesser of any interest on the death of the second earl. But it is still necessary to put a meaning on the words "to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest," for to such extent only the property is deemed to pass. For this we must look to section 7, sub-section 7 (a) and (b). It is clear that the case does not fall within (a), as the charges allowed by the Crown never formed part of the life estate of the second earl, and no interest therein ceased on his death. We must, therefore, look to sub-section (b) for the measure of the benefit in this case, since it is manifest that the interest which ceased extended to less than the whole income of the property. The value of the benefit, therefore, will be, according to the section, "the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended." Why this cumbrous mode of expression was adopted I am at a loss to understand, if it is to be taken to mean what I suppose it was intended to mean—namely, as the court below thought, that just as in case (a), where the interest extended to the whole income, you take the principal value of the property, i.e., so many years' purchase of the income, so where it extends to part only of the income, you take the principal value, i.e., so many years' purchase of that part of the income. Why, having ascertained the amount of the income to which the interest extended, you should be invited to capitalize, not it, but "an addition to the property" equal to it, I cannot pretend to surmise, nor were counsel able to remove my difficulty; but it seems quite clear that the section cannot be construed so as to found a claim to deduct the mortgage debt. The life estate of the second earl, and the mortgage debt as a charge thereon, came to an end at one and the same time, and the value of the property in which the interest ceased on his death, and the value of the benefit accruing on such cesser, were therefore, wholly unaffected by the existence of the mortgage.

This train of reasoning is precisely that of the court below, but I think they have ignored the effect of the proviso which kept alive the pre-existing mortgage on the life estate for £140,000, and further constituted it a collateral security for the whole sum, £230,000 in all, advanced by the Prudential Co. And it is the existence of this mortgage so kept alive, and determining, so far as it was a charge on the life estate, on the death of the second Earl Cowley, that is decisive in favour of the Crown in this case.

It only remains to consider whether section 7, sub-section 1 (a), has any bearing on the case. This section provides that in determining the value of an estate for the purposes of estate duty, allowance shall be made for reasonable funeral expenses and for debts and incumbrances; but an allowance shall not be made "for debts incurred by the deceased, or incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased, unless such debts or incumbrances were incurred or created bonâ fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit, and take effect out of his interest." These words, if read without qualification, are perhaps wide enough to cover this case. The debt secured by the mortgage on the life estate was incurred bonâ fide for full consideration in money wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit, and takes effect out of his interest. Clauses (b) and (c) do not apply, and the final words of the section would not seem necessarily to exclude it. They are: "Any debt or incumbrance for which an allowance is made shall be deducted from the value of the land or other subjects of the property liable thereto," which in this case was the property in which the life interest subsisted. I think, however, the section must mean liable at the time when the deduction is to be made, and must be taken to apply only to deductions from estates which actually pass, and which form assets for the payment of the deceased's debts, which is not the case here. I think, therefore, the court below were perfectly right in holding that this section did not apply to this case.

The claim to deduct the value of the £3,000 annuity fails for the same reasons as the claim to deduct the mortgage debt. The annuity which dropped on the death of the second earl did not affect the value of the property upon which it was charged, and which was deemed to pass upon his death.

The judgment, therefore, must be reversed, and the cross-appeal dismissed.

Appeal of the Crown allowed; cross-appeal of petitioner dismissed.

LEEDS AND HANLEY THEATRE OF VARIETIES v. BROADBENT. (a.)

Mortgage—Principal not to be called in for three years if interest paid "punctually"—Payment within reasonable time after due date, whether "punctual"—Injunction to restrain sale by mortgagee.

When a mortgage contains a proviso that the principal money shall not be called in for a specified period, if in the meantime the interest is "punctually" paid, the mortgagor, to entitle himself to the benefit of the proviso, must make each payment of interest on the day on which it becomes due.

Appeal by the defendants from Kekewich, J.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 15th of February, 1897, and made between the plaintiffs, of the one part, and the defendants, of the other part, certain real estate was conveyed to the defendants as security for a loan. The mortgage contained a proviso that "it is hereby agreed that payment of the principal money hereby secured shall not be required by the mortgagees or any person claiming under them" within three years from the date of the mortgage "if in the meantime every half-yearly payment of interest shall be punctually paid."

The first half-yearly payment of interest fell due on the 15th of August, 1897, and the money was not then paid.

On the 16th the defendant Broadbent wrote to the secretary of the company asking for immediate payment, and on the 17th the secretary replied that he would submit the matter to the next meeting of directors.

On the 20th Broadbent gave the secretary notice calling in the mortgage money.

On the 24th one Musgrave, a director of the company, sent the defendants a cheque for the interest. The defendants accepted the cheque, but claimed to enforce their notice.

In November, 1897, the plaintiff company issued a writ claiming a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to require payment of the principal moneys under the mortgage. Afterwards, the mortgagees threatening to sell the premises, the plaintiffs moved for an injunction to restrain them from doing so.

Kekewich, J., was of opinion that on the true construction of the mortgage "punctually paid" meant paid within a reasonable time after becoming due, and that nine days was not more than a reasonable time. His lordship therefore granted an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling the premises or advertising them for sale in pursuance of the notice of the 20th of August, 1897.

The defendants appealed.

It was admitted that if a proper notice calling in the money had been given it had never been waived.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and A. J. Allen, for the appeal, cited Keene v. Biscoe, 26 W. R. 552, 8 Ch. D. 201; and Hicks v. Gardner, 1 Jur. 541, which is referred to in Fisher on Mortgage as showing that payment, to be "punctual," must be made on the day.

Warrington, Q.C., and C. Church, for the plaintiffs, referred to Davidson's Conveyancing, vol. 2, part 2 (4 ed.), p. 329, and argued that the mortgage, if not to be construed as the plaintiffs contended, did not correctly express the intentions of the parties.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., was not called upon to reply.

LINDLEY, M.R., after considering the claim for rectification of the mortgage, and coming to the conclusion that it was entirely unfounded, proceeded: I think this case is a singularly plain one. The mortgage contains a covenant to pay on the 15th of August, 1897, the principal sum of £7,000 with interest at 5 per cent., and afterwards to pay interest at 5 per cent. on the 15th of February and the 15th of August. Therefore, if the plaintiffs did not pay on the 15th of August an action could be brought on the 16th. That might have been rather sharp practice; but legally such an action would lie. Then there is this proviso: [His lordship read the proviso above set out, and continued:] That means, if, in the meantime, every half-yearly payment shall be paid on the day on which it becomes due. It cannot mean anything else. I do not think we want authority to show that "punctually" means punctually on the day fixed. There is no authority that it does not mean that. The money was not paid on the day named, or for several days after. Moreover, no provision at all was made for payment—the mortgagors being a limited company—on the first 15th of August, and there being no payment, and no sign of payment, the mortgagees on the 20th served a notice calling in their money, which they were justified in doing. Under the pressure of that notice the mortgagors paid. Can it, then, be right to say that the mortgagees are not entitled to call in the money on the terms of this mortgage? The mortgagors have only themselves to blame if they are put to any inconvenience in consequence of their neglect to discharge their debt according to the tenour of the deed.

I think the learned judge has gone a great deal too far in granting this injunction. The appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I really have nothing to add as to that part of the case which is confined to the interpretation of the words "punctually paid." The parties must be taken to have meant what they said; and the privilege stipulated for was forfeited by non-payment on the day named. His lordship then dealt with the claim for rectification, coming to the same conclusion as the Master of the Rolls.]

Summons.

By his will dated the 17th day of October, 1877, Alvara Powell, after certain specific devises and bequests, gave, devised, and bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto his trustee upon trust to pay certain legacies and an annuity, and as to all the residue of his personal estate upon trust to divide the interest, dividends, and annual profits into three equal portions and to pay one of such portions "unto the children of my sister Elizabeth Holmes, and to divide the same equally among them during their lives. And after their deaths to divide one-third part of my personal estate equally between their children; but if they shall all die without leaving any children then I direct my trustee to divide the said third part of my personal estate equally among the children of my nephew, Edward Crosland, share and share alike."

The testator died on the 17th of July, 1879, and his will was duly proved by the executors therein named.

The testator's sister, Elizabeth Holmes, was married once only—namely, to Charles Holmes on the 15th of August, 1820.

There were seven children of the marriage, three of whom, Charles, Elizabeth, and William, predeceased the testator without having been married. The remaining four children were: (1) Ann, one of the defendants, who married Thomas Holliday, and whose only children, Mary and Jane, were still alive; (2) Sarah, who was still alive but had never married; (3) the defendant Alvara, a bachelor and still living; and (4) Mary, who was married once only—namely, to William Goodman Crofts on the 15th of March, 1870, and whose only children, the defendant John Prince, Rose, and Harry, were still living.

Elizabeth Holmes died on the 9th of November, 1888, and Mary Crofts died on the 26th of November, 1895.

This was a summons by the present trustees of the will for the determination inter alia of the following question—namely, whether the trust by the said will declared of one-third of the testator's residuary personal estate in favour of the children of the children of the testator's sister Elizabeth Holmes was valid or void as transgressing the rule against perpetuities.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and A. J. Chitty, for the trustees, stated the questions raised upon the summons.

Dibdin, for the next-of-kin.—On the construction of the gift all the children of Elizabeth Holmes are included. The rule of convenience for ascertaining the class which takes applies only to a gift of corpus and not to a gift of income: In re Wenmoth's Estate, 36 W. R. 409, 37 Ch. D. 266. That authority applies to the present case, that children born after the testator's death might take part of the income, and, consequently, that a gift to their children is void for remoteness.

those (if any) who might be born after the death of the testator, I entertain no doubt. The argument that the gift ought to have a more extensive construction so as to admit children born after the death of the testator is founded, and I think founded entirely, on an application, which I venture to call a misapplication, of a decision of Chitty, J., in the case of In re Wenmoth's Estate. It is said that the learned judge was there dealing with the same rule of convenience as applies to the will in this case, and that his exception of the application of that rule also applies to this case. The answer to that argument is to my mind conclusive—namely, that whether it be properly called a rule of convenience or not, Chitty, J., was not dealing with the same rule of convenience which I am asked to apply here.

There is no doubt some foundation for the argument to begin with in calling the rule with which I am now dealing one of convenience, because Mr. Theobald, who, as we all know, is a very careful and useful author, classes the rule in question with the other rule with which Chitty, J., was dealing, and also with one or two others as rules of convenience. I venture to think, however, that the law is better stated in Mr. Vaughan Hawkins' book. He devotes chapter 7 to the subject; it is headed "Children, &c., when ascertained." I will read what he says at p. 68: "It might be supposed that a gift to the children of a person simpliciter would include all the children he might have, whenever coming into existence; but the testator is considered to intend the objects of his bounty to be ascertained at as early a period as possible; and it may be laid down as a general rule (qualified by the other rules which follow in this chapter) that," in "gifts to children, &c., as a class" the rule is that "a devise or bequest to the children of A., or of the testator, means, primâ facie, the children in existence at the testator's death, provided there are such children then in existence." That was the case here. Then he gives some instances and some notes, and cites Viner v. Francis, 2 Cox Ch. Cas. 190, which is also cited by Mr. Theobald. I have referred to that case. It is over 100 years old, and is point blank. There is no question, therefore, about that authority. Then Mr. Hawkins some way on, at p. 75, deals with the further rule with which Chitty, J., was dealing; it is headed "Gifts to children at a given age," and he makes this exception: "In the cases considered under the preceding rule, the shares of all the objects became payable at the same time, and the period of distribution was the same for them all; where the shares become payable at different times, as in the ordinary case of a gift to children at twenty-one or marriage, the last rule requires to be supplemented by another." Then, he states the rule which hastens the period of distribution and fixes it at the time when the first child becomes entitled to receive his share, which is undoubtedly a rule of convenience merely, so that these two rules seem to me to depend on somewhat different considerations from this point of view. The second rule is purely one of convenience. It is a rule which admittedly contradicts the words of the will, the testator having intended to let in all the children who attained twenty-one. There can be no question about that.

The application of my first rule, however, is not necessarily a contradiction of the words of the testator, because in legal phraseology all the children taking under a gift are intended to mean all the children living at the testator's death. No lawyer would ever doubt that a bequest of so many pounds to the members of a club, or any other class of persons specified in a like manner, would refer only to those who were members or fulfilled that description at the testator's death; and there does seem to me to be that distinction of substance between the first rule, which may nevertheless be in some sense a rule of convenience, and the second rule, which is purely a rule of convenience. In In re Wenmoth's Estate I understand Chitty, J., although, no doubt, he treated the two rules, as to some extent they must be treated, as both being instances of fixing the period of distribution, was only dealing with the second rule—that is to say, the rule which fixes the period of distribution at the time when the first child becomes entitled. It is that rule to which he refers, and it is that rule which he declines to extend to a case where only income is given. He does not deal with the other rule, and I take leave to doubt whether it occurred to him to consider at all in that case whether it would be right to alter the rule in any way as regards children taking at the death of the testator without any words with regard to attaining majority or anything of the kind, because they only took income or for any other reason. I do not read his judgment as being at all directed to such a case as the one before me, and it seems to me that this case must depend on the ordinary application of the ordinary rule, and that the children living at the testator's death, and no others, can take. The answer to the first question therefore will be, that the trust is valid and is not void as transgressing the rule against perpetuities.

PAGET v. PAGET. (a.)

Married woman—Separate estate—Relief from restraint upon anticipation—Payment of husband's debts—Wife's right to indemnity—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 39—Practice upon applications for relief under section 39.

The doctrine that a wife is entitled to be indemnified by her deceased husband's estate (and semble, also, by her husband while alive) against loss incurred by her contributions towards payment of his debts will not be extended to a case where the court has thought fit to release unconditionally the restraint upon anticipation of a wife's life interest under section 39 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, for the purpose of enabling her to raise money for payment of her husband's debts.

Action.

The plaintiff, Lucy Annie Emily Paget, was married to the defendant, Gerald Cecil Stewart Paget, in the month of January, 1877.

At the time of the marriage the plaintiff was entitled, under the will of her grandfather, during her life, for her separate use without power of anticipation, to the net income of a moiety of certain warehouse property at Manchester, and of a sum of £100,000.

Two settlements were executed upon the marriage; by one of them the defendant had settled a reversionary interest, to which he was entitled, in two sums of £10,000 and £5,000 upon trust for him during the joint lives of himself and his wife and for the survivor after the death of one of them, and after the death of the survivor for the issue of the marriage.

and, in default of issue, for him, the defendant, absolutely.

By the other settlement the plaintiff had settled a sum producing about £2,000 per annum upon the defendant during his life or until bankruptcy or alienation, and subject thereto, upon herself for life, with remainders over.

About fifteen months after the defendant's marriage, he borrowed a sum of £15,000 from the plaintiff's sister, and shortly after the marriage of the latter with Lord Charles Beresford the defendant executed a mortgage to Lord Charles Beresford comprising two policies of assurance on his, the defendant's, life for £4,000 and £11,000 each, and his reversionary interest under his first marriage settlement, to secure the repayment of the £15,000 with interest at £5 per cent.

For some years after their marriage the plaintiff and defendant lived in excess of their income, so much so that in 1882 their indebtedness amounted to £47,050, of which the greater part had been incurred by the defendant alone.

In 1882 an application by originating summons was made to Chitty, J., by Mrs. Paget for the purpose of obtaining relief under section 39 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, from the restraint upon anticipation of her life interest under her grandfather's will, and thereby enabling her to mortgage her life interest as part security for a contemplated loan of £23,000 by the North British and Mercantile Insurance Co.

In the evidence adduced in support of the application there was no attempt at fixing the responsibility for the indebtedness on either Mr. or Mrs. Paget.

Mrs. Paget said in her affidavit that she and her husband had incurred debts and responsibilities to a very large amount, and that, notwithstanding that their income was only between £7,000 and £8,000, they had spent between £15,000 and £20,000 during the first year after their marriage, and that in consequence of her husband's being pressed by creditors "it was decided that I should consult my solicitors, Messrs. Parker, on the matter. I accordingly did so, and it then appeared that our pressing debts amounted to about £25,000." Mrs. Paget then went on to say that she was "desirous of paying off the said debt." Mr. W. S. Parker stated in his affidavit that he had discussed the matter with Mrs. Paget alone, and that it was at her request that the application was made.

On the 28th of June, 1882, Chitty, J., made an order in chambers which, after expressing an opinion that the arrangement thereinafter mentioned would be for the benefit of the applicant, directed that the £23,000 then proposed to be advanced to her by the North British and Mercantile Insurance Co. should, when advanced, be charged upon her life interest and a policy on her life, together with interest and premiums, the principal sum not to be paid off until her death, unless she desired to pay it or any part of it during her life. By a mortgage dated the 24th of July, 1882, Mr. and Mrs. Paget assigned to the insurance company Mrs. Paget's life interest and a policy on her life to secure the sum of £23,000 then advanced, and Mr. and Mrs. Paget covenanted to repay the same with interest at the rate therein mentioned, Mrs. Paget covenanting so as to bind her separate estate.

The £23,000 was paid to Messrs. Parkers, and they applied the whole of that sum with the exception of £4,000 in paying off their clients' debts. Subsequently Messrs. Parkers absconded, and it was found that they had misappropriated the £4,000. In consequence of this loss and of further joint debts which had accumulated in the meantime it became necessary for Mrs. Paget to make another application to Chitty, J., and by an order of the 11th of August, 1887, she obtained powers to charge her life interest, notwithstanding the restraint upon anticipation, as part security for a further sum of £22,000 which the Pelican Life Insurance Co. were willing to advance. The evidence in support of the application was of a similar nature to that adduced on the occasion of the former summons, Mrs. Paget stating that their joint income formed a common fund, and that she considered any diminution of charges upon the fund to be for her benefit irrespective of the question whether the charges were exclusively debts of her husband or not. Chitty, J., upon this occasion separately examined Mrs. Paget, who attended in chambers for that purpose.

Mrs. Paget subsequently mortgaged her life interest (subject to the prior mortgage) and another policy on her life to the Pelican Life Assurance Co. to secure the £22,000 advanced by them. The £22,000 was applied in paying off the remaining debts and the balance of the £15,000 due to Lord Charles Beresford, who reassigned to Mr. Paget the property comprised in the mortgage of the 9th of November, 1878, with the exception of the £11,000 policy which had been already surrendered. By a deed of the 28th of September, 1889, the £4,000 policy so reassigned was assigned by Mr. Paget to the trustees of the secondly above-mentioned settlement upon trust to make good the £4,000 appropriated by Messrs. Parker, and subject thereto in trust for Mr. Paget absolutely. The mortgages for £23,000 and £22,000 had not been paid off. From May, 1893, Mr. and Mrs. Paget had lived apart, and Mrs. Paget had since then paid the interest on the two mortgages, and had also paid other sums of money towards defraying her husband's debts.

This was an action brought by Mrs. Paget, suing in respect of her separate estate and claiming (1) a declaration that her husband was liable to indemnify her against the mortgages of 1882 and 1887 and the principal sums of £23,000 and £22,000 and interest thereby respectively secured; (2) payment of those two principal sums and of the interest paid by her out of her separate estate since the separation in May, 1893; (3) repayment of the further sums paid by her out of her separate estate since the separation towards satisfaction of debts or liabilities of the defendant or otherwise on his account; (4) a declaration that she was entitled to a charge upon all the interests of the defendant in the two trust funds of £10,000 and £5,000 and in his £4,000 policy for the amount of the mortgage debt of £15,000 and interest repaid to Lord Charles Beresford; and other incidental relief.

In his defence the defendant alleged that the plaintiff had adopted the said indebtedness as her own, and pleaded the Statute of Limitations. He also raised a counterclaim which was abandoned at the trial and which is not material for the purposes of the present report.

Mrs. Paget was called as a witness, and whilst acknowledging that some of the expenditure was attributable to the joint establishment, alleged that most of it was incurred by and on behalf of the defendant alone.

Renshaw, Q.C., Carson, Q.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for Mrs. Paget.—We rely upon the principle that a wife's estate is entitled to be indemnified out of her deceased husband's estate against incumbrances incurred on behalf or for the benefit of her husband: Earl of Huntingdon v. Countess of Huntingdon, 2 Bro. P. C. 1; and the wife is entitled to a similar indemnity from her husband during his life. It makes no difference whether the wife's property is settled to her separate use or not: Aguilar v. Aguilar, 5 Madd. 414; Hudson v. Carmichael, 2 W. R. 503, Kay 613. We are not precluded from this argument by the orders of Chitty, J., for those orders did nothing else than relieve the restraint upon anticipation.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., Warrington, Q.C., and J. Henderson, for the defendant.—The right, if any, which vested in the plaintiff by virtue of these orders was a right of indemnity. Now, according to the authorities that right depends upon an implied assumpsit arising from the nature of the transaction and rebuttable by evidence. We submit that according to the evidence the wife adopted this liability as her own. The authorities show that where there is nothing more than a mortgage of the wife's estate to secure the husband's debt then incurred, then, in the absence of anything to the contrary, the presumption is that the husband is the principal debtor and the wife the surety and entitled to have the debt paid out of her husband's assets in the administration of his estate (Hudson v. Carmichael and Aguilar v. Aguilar), but this does not apply during the husband's life. In the mortgage deeds of 1882 and 1887 the loan is to the wife, and the payment clause is to the effect that the money is paid to her with the privity of the husband, and therefore the principle of Huntingdon v. Huntingdon and Hudson v. Carmichael does not apply. The evidence which the plaintiff adduces, consisting of the two orders and the evidence filed in support of the applications, actually rebuts any presumption in favour of the wife. Again, if the plaintiff ever had any right of indemnity, the evidence shows that she has waived it: Clinton v. Hooper, 1 Ves. Jun. 173. Moreover, the wife's claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply.—It has been suggested that the wife adopted the liability of her husband and that the payments were a free gift from her. We have shown that this latter contention is not so: as to the former contention, the wife did not adopt the liability exclusively. She did so as between her husband and herself on the one hand and the creditors on the other, but it does not follow that therefore the wife for all purposes takes upon herself, as between herself and her husband, the whole liability. There is nothing to show that she gave up her right against him. In Clinton v. Hooper the wife had expressly waived the question of her right to be recouped out of her husband's estate, and the waiver was after the death of her husband: Pawlet v. Delaval, 2 Ves. sen. 663, referred to in Milnes v. Busk, 2 Ves. Jun. 488, is in the plaintiff's favour. The Statute of Limitations does not apply, for Mrs. Paget has been paying interest on the mortgage down to the present time.

KEKEWICH, J.—The doctrine that a wife is entitled to be indemnified by her deceased husband's estate, or as it seems to necessarily follow by her husband living, against loss incurred by her contributions towards payment of his debts is too well established to need exposition, and there is no occasion to discuss the questions discussed in Lord Hatherley's judgment in Hudson v. Carmichael and elsewhere how far this doctrine depends on an implied assumpsit, or what are the limitations of the wife's rights as against the husband's creditors. Suffice it to say that the right is necessarily based on the matrimonial relations, and that whether strictly or for all purposes she is to be regarded as surety for him, that may with reasonable accuracy be defined to be her position. What falls to me to decide is whether this doctrine is applicable to a case like the present, where the wife's contributions have been made not by means of a gift from her, operating by legal process, such as a fine or by an assignment of her separate estate, but where resort has been had to the powers conferred on the court by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 39, which enables the court to relieve a married woman from restraint on anticipation where it appears to the court to be for her benefit so to do. This jurisdiction, which to me causes more anxiety than any other that a judge is called upon to exercise, requires minute and careful examination of all the facts and circumstances. It is the duty of a judge considering an application of this character to inquire not merely how it has come to pass that money is wanted, who is responsible for that result, and who is liable for debts already incurred, but also to what extent and in what manner benefit will be secured to the wife by granting the application, and what (if any) conditions can be reasonably and properly imposed.

Regarding the restraint on anticipation as intended for the protection of the wife, I view these applications with extreme jealousy, and when they are occasioned, as is often the case, by the husband's extravagance, I never grant them unless satisfied that the wife's happiness will be seriously endangered by refusal or will really be advanced by such order as is asked; and more than this, I am extremely careful to provide that the scheme submitted, whatever it may be, is so carried out as to secure the intended benefit as far as written provisions can secure it, and I always exact the strictest conditions which seem to me to be capable of fulfilment. For instance, where it is desired to clear off debts incurred by a style of living in excess of the matrimonial income, as, for example, by maintaining an over-large establishment, I insist, if it be feasible, on removal to a smaller house or on a reduction otherwise of outgoings. I have been obliged to illustrate the exercise of the jurisdiction by reference to my own practice, because these applications are almost invariably disposed of in chambers and the practice of other judges is not made public, but I believe that although other judges may and probably do treat as of first importance circumstances which, in my opinion, fall into the second rank, and on the other hand give prominence to some which I treat as of less weight, yet we all approach these applications and endeavour to regard each and every of them from the one standpoint distinctly indicated by the statute, and that is the benefit of the wife. When, therefore, the court is required to consider what is the effect of an order relieving a wife from restraint on anticipation and thereby enabling her to raise money with the assistance of a policy of assurance on her life or otherwise, what are the consequences following from such order? I am bound to conclude that the order was made for her benefit, and that, whether the money could have been raised or could have been applied in any different manner or subject to any different conditions or restrictions, the judge who made the order was convinced that on the whole it was better for the wife that the end should be achieved in the manner provided, in preference to any other. The orders of the 28th of June, 1882, and the 11th of August, 1887, were made without imposing on Mr. Paget any obligation to surrender the life interest provided for him by the marriage settlement, and except that one policy was brought into settlement for the express purpose of recouping to the settled funds the loss occasioned by Mr. Parker's fraud, no conditions were imposed. It was not suggested on either application that Mr. Paget's life interest should be touched, but the existence of that life interest was disclosed and I am bound to conclude that the learned judge who made the orders and who on the second occasion, we know, went into the case thoroughly and to the extent of seeing Mrs. Paget privately, determined that it was more for her benefit that this life interest should not be surrendered and that no other conditions should be imposed. It is argued that the contributions which she made by means of the relief of restraint on anticipation and which could not otherwise have been made at all, were only made by her as surety for her husband, and that he is now bound to indemnify her as principal and to make liable towards that indemnity the life interest which was left unaffected by the orders themselves. I say nothing about the time which has elapsed since the orders were made. If the plaintiff is right she could have insisted on her rights as surety immediately after their respective dates, but I do not pause to inquire whether she has forfeited such rights (if any) as she had by delaying her action until the present time. I prefer to rest my judgment on the broad ground that where the wife's life interest has been made available for raising money for payment of her husband's debts by means of relief from the restraint on anticipation under the sanction of the court, it is inconceivable that she intended, or that the court intended, that she should have a remedy over against him not reserved by the order giving such sanction, or that a doctrine flowing from the relations of husband and wife and called into operation by her action independently of the court should be thus extended.

I do not think that in a case of this kind, and bearing in mind that the wife's life interest has been largely taken to pay her husband's debts, it would be right to make her pay his costs, and therefore I dismiss her action without costs. The counterclaim, which was not arguable and was not argued, has already been dismissed with costs.

Per Lord Herschell.—The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, has not of itself any operation in respect of any road whatever, whether a carriage-way, a footpath, or a public road, unless brought into effect by some rights being given and corresponding obligations created by a special Act.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (44 W. R. 501, [1896] 2 Q. B. 74) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.) reported 44 W. R. 501, [1896] 2 Q. B. 74.

The Bexley Heath Railway Co. was incorporated by a special Act for the purpose of constructing a railway in the county of Kent, the special Act incorporating the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

The railway crossed a public footpath in the parish of Crayford, the line being constructed at that point upon an embankment, and the footpath being carried up the embankment by means of wooden steps, across the line on the level, and down the other side of the embankment by means of similar steps.

The railway company's special Act did not contain any reference to or clause dealing with this footway.

The Parish Council for Crayford having represented to the district council, under section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1894, that the public footpath had been unlawfully obstructed, the district council applied for and obtained a mandamus directed to the Bexley Heath Railway Co., commanding them to carry the railway over the footpath or the footpath over the railway by means of a bridge.

The Court of Appeal discharged the order of the Queen's Bench Division (Day and Lawrance, JJ.), and the district council now appealed to the House.

Section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act is as follows: "If the line of the railway cross any turnpike-road or public highway, then (except where otherwise provided by the special Act) either such road shall be carried over the railway or the railway shall be carried over such road by means of a bridge, of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided, . . . provided always that, with the consent of two or more justices of the peace in petty session, as after mentioned, it shall be lawful for the company to carry the railway across any highway other than a public road on the level."

Macmorran, Q.C., and Hohler, for the appellants.

Farwell, Q.C., and Boyle, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—I regret, with Smith, L.J., that we do not know the grounds on which this order was made by the Queen's Bench Division. I confess for myself I do not understand why the mandamus was issued. It is not the fault of the learned counsel for the appellants, who have both argued very ably and earnestly in favour of their proposition, but I am bound to say that I do not yet understand where the obligation to build the bridge comes from. I cannot find it in the Act of Parliament. All that I can conjecture to be the reasoning is this: Finding that the Act of Parliament (8 Vict. c. 20) certainly does not in terms contain any such obligation, you find in clause 46 a proviso which, unless there is such an obligation there, would, it is said, be an unreasonable proviso to put into the Act, because there is no such obligation in the statute, and by the hypothesis the proviso can only operate where there is such an obligation. I think that is stating fairly the argument which has been presented to your lordships. But that argument assumes that the statute is the final end of legislation; and that is exactly what it is not, because the statute in its terms assumes that special Acts will be passed from time to time containing provisions of their own, and if there are some such provisions, as has been pointed out by the learned counsel, then the proviso has its natural and just operation. The whole argument is that you must try the statute by itself and the proviso by itself, and assume that there must be an obligation (which certainly in terms is not there), because, as they say, if you were to construe the whole that they were responsible if the man so invited was led into the trap by means of which he was injured. That was the case of Heaven v. Pender.

Now, I am quite unable to see that that case has any application to the present case at all. This wagon at the time it was being used was being used on a new journey initiated by the Glasgow and South-Western Co. for their purposes, and there was nothing in it which can be said to be comparable to a trap created by or permitted to exist by the Caledonian Co., into which they invited and led the deceased man to come. Therefore the case of Heaven v. Pender seems to me entirely without application to the present case; and, as I have said, I am quite unable to see any duty resting upon the Caledonian Co. to the deceased man, a breach of which has cost the loss of his life, and consequently a right of action in the plaintiff.

In the Court of Session there was a difference of opinion between the learned judges. The majority were of opinion that this statement—these condescendences—did show that there was a case, and judgment was given accordingly by Lord Young, in which the Lord Justice Clerk concurred. Now, with all respect, I think the judgment of Lord Young is founded upon the supposition that it was enough if there might have been a contract under which the Caledonian Co. were under some obligation during the haulage of these wagons; and that there being an uncertainty whether there was such a contract or not, the case ought to go to trial to see whether there was such a contract, because he says it is absurd to suppose that they were led by favour and affection to let their wagons be used, and therefore they must have been used under some contract. That, I think, is what was in the learned judge's mind. It is only in that sense that I can interpret his language and appreciate the view he has taken. but I think it is for the plaintiff to make out a relevant case. If it rests upon a contract, though we may not know what has passed between the parties, and it may be a matter of speculation—still, if a contract is necessary to a relevant case, then a contract must be alleged, and of course it may be that the plaintiff will not succeed in proving it. But in the present case I can find nothing alleged in the whole of this claim to show that any responsibility rested upon the Caledonian Railway Co. after they had delivered the goods at the station, or that they had anything to do, or any sort of connection, with the haulage which took place afterwards from the station to the works of the Gas Commissioners.

For these reasons I think the judgment must be reversed. I may add that my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, who heard the whole of the argument of the leading counsel for the respondent, desires me to say that he takes entirely the same view.

I move your lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, and I apprehend some declaration will be necessary.

Lord MACNAGHTEN and Lord MORRIS concurred.

Lord SHAND.—The Caledonian Railway Co., one of the set of defenders in this case, have maintained that they are not bound to submit to a trial upon this claim, and in arrest of the proceedings they have maintained that the pursuers have made no statement relevant in law to infer the liability which is alleged against them. I agree with your lordships in holding that that plea is well founded, and that the action so far as the Caledonian Railway Co. is concerned ought to be dismissed.

In the pursuer's statement it is not alleged that any relation whatever subsisted between her deceased husband and the appellants, the Caledonian Railway Co. There was no such relation as employer or employed, or in any other way. The deceased husband of the pursuer was a servant not of the Caledonian Railway Co., but of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., in whose employment he was; he was acting under their orders in the matter which led to this accident. So far as the Caledonian Co. were concerned, he was an outsider or a stranger to them in every sense of the term. It appears from the pursuer's statement that the only part that the Caledonian Co. took in reference to the use of these wagons was this: that they, under a contract of carriage which they had entered into, carried the coal in their wagons from its place of departure (I do not know that it is very distinctly stated where that was) to its place of destination, and that place of destination was Dumfries. The moment the wagons arrived, hauled by the Caledonian Co. under that contract of carriage into the station at Dumfries, and were placed in the station of the Glasgow and South-Western Co. there, the Caledonian Co. had done with their contract. It appears, however, that a separate arrangement was made for a subsequent journey. I call it a journey, although it was short in distance; it might have been a matter of twenty or thirty miles; but it so happens that it was not so long, but was only a distance of three or four hundred yards through the streets of Dumfries to the works of the Dumfries Gas Commissioners. But for this separate journey, as I call it, there was a separate undertaking between two different parties—I mean between the Dumfries Gas Commissioners, to whom the coals belonged, which were carried on their behalf, and the Glasgow and South-Western Co. It was in the execution of that contract of carriage between the Gas Commissioners and the Glasgow and South-Western Co. that this unfortunate man, an employee of the Glasgow and South-Western Co., met with the accident which led to the action. The only connection, as it appears to me, which the Caledonian Co. had with this matter after delivering the wagons at the station was that they were the owners of the wagons. Beyond that, I can see nothing which can be suggested to fix responsibility upon them. It is true, as has been pointed out and pressed upon your lordships' consideration, that in article 13 of the pursuer's statement it is averred that "as regards the coal conveyed by the defenders, the Caledonian Railway Co., for the Dumfries Gas Commissioners as consignees"—that is, coal carried by them to Dumfries—"it is, and for many years has been, the regular practice for the said defenders to give the use of the wagons belonging to them in which the coal has been carried from coal-pits on their system of railway to Dumfries Station for the conveyance of the coal from the station to the gas-works without necessity for any transhipment." That simply means that, there being an arrangement, that the Glasgow and South-Western Co. are to carry the coals on from the Dumfries Station to the Gas Commissioners' premises, the Caledonian Co., in order to avoid the inconvenience of transhipment of the coal, give the use of their wagons to the Glasgow and South-Western Co.

What is said to follow from that is stated in the preceding sentence—a sentence which, logically speaking, ought to follow what I have now read: "In these circumstances it is the duty and is the practice of the Caledonian Railway Co. and other railway companies to take care that wagons, of which such use is given, are in proper working order, with a view to the safety of those who may have occasion to use and handle them in the loading, unloading, and delivery of the coal." Now, it is all very well to aver that to be a duty, but a pursuer in circumstances such as these is bound not merely to say that there is a duty, but to give the grounds from which that legal duty is to be inferred; and the only ground upon which that duty is said to be inferred is set forth in the clause I have already read, saying that the Caledonian Co. have been in the habit of giving the use of the wagons. Now, it is very clear to my thinking that the giving the use of the wagons can infer no such duty. If there was any duty at all upon the Caledonian Co. as in a question with the pursuer's deceased husband, it appears to me that it would have been a duty really to give sound wagons—such wagons that, if an accident happened from them, the Caledonian Railway Co. should only be excused on the ground of a latent defect which could not be discovered. But I can see no ground whatever for holding that, having parted with the wagons at the station, and having nothing to do with the contract of carriage subsequently, which might have been for a long or a short journey, there was a duty upon the Caledonian Co. in a question with a stranger to them to have their wagons either in a sound condition or examined with care. It may or may not be that the Caledonian Co. had some duty towards the Glasgow and South-Western Co. When I say "some duty" I mean some obligation under a separate contract; but with that we have nothing to do here, because there is no such contract alleged in the first place, and, even if there were, I do not think that the husband of the plaintiff could have taken the benefit of it.

I notice that there seems to have been a good deal of discussion, or rather consideration, in the Court of Session, on the part of Lord Young and Lord Trayner, who gave the conflicting decision, as to whether the averment I have read amounts to an averment that the carriages were lent by one company to the other, or that there was some valuable consideration given for the use of them. But whether it be a loan gratuitous, or whether it be a use given for payment of money, that is a transaction entirely between the two railway companies. We heard nothing about it here—we cannot look at it; but whatever that transaction may be, whether it might be such as would infer an obligation upon the part of the Caledonian Co., as in a question with the Glasgow and South-Western Co., to furnish sound wagons or to examine the wagon—whether it be such a stipulation as would possibly give the Glasgow and South-Western Co. a right to relief in the case of a claim such as is here made, if it were successful in the court below, it certainly is a question which cannot arise here. There is one thing that is quite clear, and that is, that whatever the arrangement between these two companies one with the other might be, that would never give a stranger to the Caledonian Railway Co., a mere servant of the Glasgow and South-Western Co., a direct right of action against the Caledonian Railway Co. in circumstances such as these.

The only possible view upon which I think such an action as this could have been maintained was that pressed upon us in the case to which your lordships have already referred of Heaven v. Pender, but I agree in thinking, upon the ground which my noble friend has stated, that that case has really no application to the present. The particular defect complained of there was in a part of the general works which the dock company was obliged to keep up, and, that being so, the general rule that the dock-owners would be responsible for their gangway and other appliances within the dockyard is sufficient to explain the decision arrived at in that case. Nor, as was suggested by the Lord Advocate, is the present case a case in which you can say that the thing used was an instrument noxious or dangerous in itself, which might produce an accident from the mere handling of it. It is not a case of that kind, where it may be that wider and other responsibilities might arise.

This being neither the case of a trap or an invitation, nor a case of a noxious instrument, and there being no contract or obligation between the pursuer's husband and the Caledonian Railway Co. about these wagons, I am of opinion with your lordships that we should hold that the pursuer in this case has failed to state a relevant ground upon which liability can be founded, and that therefore this appeal should be sustained and the interlocutor reversed, with costs.

NEW ZEALAND LOAN AND MERCANTILE AGENCY v. MORRISON. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Companies Arrangement Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 104)—Colonial creditor—Pleading—Foreign court.

Although the Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, extends to all creditors when their rights are in question in the courts of the United Kingdom, that Act does not extend to the Colonies; and therefore the proceedings in our courts cannot be pleaded in Victoria as a defence to an action by a Victorian creditor.

Gibbs v. Société des Métaux, 25 Q. B. D. 399, 39 W. R. Dig. 57 approved.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

The facts are set out in their lordships' judgment.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Upjohn, Q.C., and Ryland, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, and DAVEY, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by

Lord DAVEY.—On the 23rd of January, 1893, the respondent in Victoria placed £3,700 on deposit with the New Zealand Loan and Mercantile Agency Co. (Limited), the present appellants. This company was incorporated in England under the English Companies Acts, with its head office in England, but carried on business in New Zealand and the Australian Colonies, including the Colony of Victoria. On the 12th of July, 1893, a creditor's petition was presented to the court in Victoria for winding up the appellant company. A provisional liquidator was appointed, but no order was ever made on this petition, and there has been no winding up of the appellant company in Victoria. On the same 12th of July, 1893, the appellant company itself presented a petition to the High Court of Justice in England, and on the 21st of July, 1893, an order was made by that court for the compulsory winding up of the appellant company. Subsequently a scheme of arrangement was prepared and submitted to meetings of the creditors and contributories of the appellant company and accepted by the requisite statutory majorities of creditors and contributories in compliance with the provisions of the English Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870. By an order of the 13th of April, 1894, the High Court in England sanctioned the scheme of arrangement with immaterial amendments and declared the same to binding on all the creditors and contributories of the company and also on the official receiver and liquidator thereof. By this scheme it was provided that a new company should be formed with the same name to acquire the undertaking and property of the old company (i.e., the present appellants) and to assume and provide for its liabilities in manner thereinafter mentioned, and that the new company should pay to each unsecured creditor of the old company £12 10s. per cent. on the amount of his claim in cash, with interest capitalized to the 30th of June, 1894, and for the remaining £87 10s. per cent. should issue to such creditor debenture stock. And it was further provided that forthwith, after the scheme should have become finally binding on all parties, each creditor of the old company should, subject to the carrying out of the scheme, hold his claim in trust for the new company and release or deal with the same as the new company should direct. The new company was formed, and is carrying on business in Victoria, and has acquired or has title to all the property of the appellant company. The respondent had due notice of the scheme and of the meetings of creditors to consider the same.

On the 4th of January, 1895, the respondent commenced an action in Victoria against the appellant company to recover her deposit of £3,700 and interest. By their defence the appellant company stated (paragraph 5) the winding-up petition in Victoria, (paragraph 6) the winding-up order in England, (paragraphs 7, 8, and 9) the proceedings under the Arrangement Act, 1870, (paragraphs 10 and 11) the material provisions of the scheme, and (paragraph 13) submitted that the respondent was bound by the scheme as by a new contract, and further that she had no longer any beneficial interest in or right to receive the money claimed by her. In her reply the respondent objected that the Joint-Stock Arrangement Act had no force or effect in the Colony of Victoria, and that the acceptance of the scheme by the three-fourths majority of creditors would not make it binding upon the respondent or be an answer to the action. There was a rejoinder and sur-rejoinder which it is not necessary for the present purpose to notice.

The points of law raised by the above-stated paragraphs of the defence and reply were set down for argument before trial, and by an order of Hodges, J., of the 7th of August, 1895, it was ordered and adjudged that those paragraphs of the defence afforded no answer to the respondent's claim. At the trial of the action before the Chief Justice judgment was given for the respondent. Both orders were appealed to the full court, and by two orders of the 1st of September, 1896, were affirmed. The present appeal is against these orders.

It was contended before their lordships that the Arrangement Act, 1870, extended to all the Colonies as well as the United Kingdom, and that the Colonial courts were, therefore, bound to take notice of the proceedings under that Act and give judicial effect to them. It was the intention of the Act (it was said) to bind all the creditors of the company, and the Act should be construed so as to give effect to that intention so far as possible, and as the Parliament of the United Kingdom can bind the Colonies it must be assumed to have done so. The analogy of bankruptcy was referred to and reliance was placed on a decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Ellis v. M'Henry, 19 W. R. 503, L. R. 6 C. P. 228.

Their lordships do not think that the Arrangement Act of 1870, when read by itself and detached from the other Companies Acts, does, either by express words or by necessary implication, extend to the Colonies. That Act, however, cannot be regarded by itself, but is only one of a collection of Acts together containing the statutory law relating to joint-stock companies in the United Kingdom which are compendiously referred to as the Companies Acts and ordered to be read together. It is impossible to contend that the Companies Acts as a whole extend to the Colonies or are intended to bind the Colonial courts. The Colonies possess and have exercised the power of legislating on these subjects for themselves, and there is every reason why legislation of the United Kingdom should not unnecessarily be held to extend to the Colonies and thereby overrule, qualify, or add to their own legislation on the same subject.

It is quite true that the provisions of the Arrangement Act are expressed to extend to all creditors, and so they do to foreign as well as Colonial creditors, but only when their rights are in question in the courts of the United Kingdom. Their lordships adopt what was said by Holroyd, J., on this point:

"I am quite willing to admit, indeed I entertain no doubt, that the compromise spoken of in section 2 is one between a company and all its creditors or all of a particular class, that all are to be summoned to any meeting which the court may order, and that the votes of all who attend either in person or by proxy are to be counted. 'All' means 'all,' wherever the creditors may be found, whether in the United Kingdom or in the Colonies or in foreign countries; and within the jurisdiction of the English courts, all, wherever domiciled, will be bound by the result. But we are asked to say, looking at this one section only, that the same clause has a different import according as it is applied to foreign countries or to the Colonies; that with respect to the former its operation is confined to the jurisdiction of the English courts, while upon the latter it imposes a new law, and one in derogation of the legislative powers possessed by those colonies which enjoy self-government. It seems hardly probable that, if such was the purpose of the Imperial Parliament, it should have been expressed in a manner so ambiguous."

Nor do their lordships think that any assistance is to be derived from what has been held with regard to the application of the Bankruptcy Acts to the Colonies. It has been decided that by the express words of the Bankruptcy Acts all the property real and personal of an English bankrupt in the Colonies as well as in the United Kingdom is vested in his assignees or trustees. Their title must, therefore, receive recognition in the Colonial courts from which it has been considered to follow that the bankrupt being denuded of his property by the English law is also entitled to plead the discharge given him by the same law. But how does this assist the appellants? We have to deal with the winding up of a company not with bankruptcy, and there is a material distinction between the effect of bankruptcy and that of winding up. In the former case the whole property of the bankrupt is taken out of him, whilst in the latter case the property remains vested in title and in fact in the company subject only to its being administered for the purposes of the winding up under the direction of the English courts. Their lordships are not called upon to criticize the decision in Ellis v. M'Henry, which in their opinion does not apply to the present case.

If, as their lordships hold, the Arrangement Act of 1870 does not extend to the Colonies, the proceedings in the English court are for this purpose proceedings in a foreign court and cannot be pleaded in Victoria as a defence to an action by a Victorian creditor, as was decided in England with reference to a French winding up in Gibbs v. Société des Métaux, 25 Q. B. D. 399, 39 W. R. Dig. 57.

One other argument was used which should be noticed. It was said that everybody who deals with a corporation has notice of its origin and constitution, and contracts with it subject to all the incidents which according to the law of its constitution may affect its liability upon its contracts. This argument is specious, but when examined is found to beg the question, or rather to be the same point over again. The incident of the constitution of this company which is relied on is that it may be discharged from its liabilities by the order of an English court. But it should be added "so far as the jurisdiction of that court extends," and that brings us back to the same point.

Their lordships will, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellants will pay the costs of it.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Chitty, and Collins, L.JJ.) — Jan. 19.

REG. v. THORNTON AND ANOTHER (JUSTICES). Ex parte LACON & CO. (a.)

Licensing law—Licence—Order sanctioning removal—Grant of licence on condition of surrendering other licence—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 50.

At a general annual licensing meeting a publican, having obtained a renewal of a licence in respect of his licensed house, proceeded to apply for a new licence in respect of a neighbouring house. The justices made an order granting him such new licence subject to the condition of his giving up the licence of which he had just obtained a renewal.

Held, that the order was in substance an order sanctioning the removal of a licence, and that, inasmuch as the requirements of section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, had not been complied with, there was no jurisdiction to make such order.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Cave and Ridley, JJ.), granting a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by licensing justices.

In March, 1897, G. C. Laceby was the holder of a licence in respect of the Five Alls public-house, at Battersea, for the sale of beer, wine, and spirits, to be consumed off the premises, and he was also the holder of a similar licence in respect of the cellar of the adjoining premises, No. 2, Abercrombie-street. It appeared that in 1890 the then holder of the licence for the Five Alls, finding his premises insufficient, arranged to take the cellar of No. 2, Abercrombie-street, and obtained a separate licence in respect thereof, and since that time the two licences had been renewed from year to year.

Before the general annual licensing meeting for the Wandsworth Division, which was held on the 5th of March, 1897, Laceby gave notice of his intention to apply for renewals of the two licences, and also gave notice of his intention to apply for a licence for the whole of the house No. 2, Abercrombie-street.

The justices having granted the application for renewals of the old licences, the applicant proceeded to make his application for the new licence, which was adjourned in order that the justices might view the premises.

At an adjourned meeting, held on the 26th of March, the justices asked the applicant whether he would give up his licence for the Five Alls if they granted him the new licence which he now asked for. He agreed to this, and thereupon the justices made an order granting him a licence for the sale of beer, wine, and spirits, to be consumed off the premises, in respect of No. 2, Abercrombie-street, subject to the condition of his giving up the licence which he held in respect of the Five Alls.

At the instance of Messrs. Lacon & Co., a firm of brewers, who had purchased the lease of the Five Alls, the Divisional Court granted a writ of certiorari to quash the order, on the ground that the justices had no jurisdiction to make it, because it was in effect an order sanctioning the removal of a licence within section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and the requirements of that section had not been complied with.

Section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, enacts that the application for an order sanctioning the removal of a licence shall be made by the person desiring to be the holder of the licence when removed; that notice of the intended application shall be given in the same manner as notice is given of an application for the grant of a new licence; that a copy of the notice shall be personally served upon or sent by registered letter to the owner of the premises from which the licence is to be removed, and the holder of the licence, unless he is also the applicant; and that the justices shall not make an order sanctioning such removal unless they are satisfied that no objection to such removal is made by the owner of the premises to which the licence is attached, or by the holder of the licence, or by any other person whom the justices shall determine to have a right to object to the removal.

Laceby appealed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Divisional Court is right. The question is whether what took place in this case was a removal of a licence. The appellant was the holder of an off-licence for the Five Alls, and of a similar licence for the cellar underneath the adjoining house, No. 2, Abercrombie-street. At the general annual licensing meeting for 1897 he applied for a renewal of those licences, and having obtained an order for such renewals, he then applied for an off-licence for the whole of 2, Abercrombie-street. The justices thereupon said to him: "Before we entertain your application for 2, Abercrombie-street, will you give up your licence for the Five Alls?"—that is, in other words: "Will you remove your business from the Five Alls to 2, Abercrombie-street?" He assented, and they granted him a licence for 2, Abercrombie-street, on condition that he gave up his licence for the Five Alls. It was in substance the case of the removal of a licence and a business. In my opinion such a case comes within section 50 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and the owner of the premises from which it was proposed to remove the licence had a right to intervene and put his veto on the making of an order.

The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Solicitor—Costs—Solicitors Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 68), s. 12.

In taxing a solicitor's bill of costs, items in respect of business done while the solicitor had no certificate should be disallowed.

Summons to review taxation.

The respondent acted as solicitor for the applicants for a period before the 15th of November, 1896, and extending beyond that date. Upon the 15th of November, 1896, he neglected to renew his certificate, and did not do so before the month of March, 1897. The question to be determined was whether he should be allowed any costs for the period during which he had no certificate. The taxing-master followed In re Jones, 18 W. R. 159, L. R. 9 Eq. 63, and allowed these costs.

Rowden.—In re Jones has been modified by the passing of the Solicitors Act, 1874, s. 12. That case turned on the submission to pay and the analogy of the statute then in force to the Statute of Limitations. The difference made by the Act of 1874 is shown by Fowler v. Monmouthshire Railway Co., 27 W. R. 659, 4 Q. B. D. 334, which expressly states that In re Hope, 20 W. R. 1026, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 766, had ceased to be law. When a sum is not recoverable it is not a debt in the eye of the law.

He also cited In re Simmons, 33 W. R. 706, 15 Q. B. D. 348; Kent v. Ward, 70 L. T. Rep. 614; and In re Margetts, 44 W. R. 462, [1896] 2 Ch. 263.

Napier.—The later statute does not materially differ from the earlier one, and In re Jones is still in force. A submission to pay the amount due is a waiver of the statute, and the Act only takes away the remedy and not the right.

NORTH, J.—The trustees employed a solicitor up the 15th of November, 1896, and on that date he became disqualified as he did not take out a certificate until March, 1897. The question is, Should the latter part of his bill be struck out? In re Jones is relied upon, and the taxing-master thought it questionable if he could overrule it. He says, "I think it is for the court to overrule it and not for me, as it is an express decision." The question is rather, Has that case been superseded by a statute in different language from that under which In re Jones was decided? I think that it has, and that the passing of the Act of 1874 makes the conclusion that the taxing-master has come to wrong. The Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 25 enacted "that no person who, as an attorney or solicitor, shall sue, prosecute, defend, or carry on any action or suit, or any proceedings in any of the courts aforesaid without having previously obtained a stamped certificate which shall be then in force, shall be capable of maintaining any action or suit at law or in equity for the recovery of any fee, reward, or disbursement for or in respect of any business, matter, or thing done by him as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid whilst he has been without such certificate as last aforesaid." In re Jones was a case in which the client had submitted to pay his solicitor; it was not an action or suit to recover a bill of costs. In another case, In re Hope, in which a plaintiff took successful proceedings, an attempt was made by the defendant to resist payment because during part of the time the solicitor was not duly qualified, but it was held that such costs could be recovered. Then section 12 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 68 was passed. Under it "no costs, fee, reward, or disbursement on account of or in relation to any act or proceeding done or taken by any person who acts as an attorney or solicitor without being duly qualified so to act shall be recoverable in any action, suit, or matter by any person or persons whomsoever." The provisions are much stronger than those in the Act of 1843. Under the later Act, in Fowler v. Monmouthshire Railway and Canal Co., a successful plaintiff recovered costs, but as his solicitor was disqualified the defendant successfully objected to any costs being paid for the time during which the plaintiff's solicitor had no certificate.

Here the summons asks in common form for the delivery of a bill. Whatever is to be paid ought to be paid before taking the papers out of the solicitor's hands, and something is due for the time during which he acted while duly qualified, and the client submits to pay what is due. But reading the twelfth section I do not see how any costs whatever can be chargeable in a bill against the client, if they cannot be recovered as against the other side. The different decisions in the two cases I have referred to clearly show the alteration made by the Act of 1874. In re Hope is not overruled, but there is a difference. Cockburn, C.J., says (4 Q. B. D., p. 336): "Under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73 and earlier Acts relating to the qualification of solicitors, it was held that although the solicitor was prevented from recovering costs and disbursements in respect of business done while he was uncertificated, yet that the client himself could recover them from the opposite party. Then came the Act 37 & 38 Vict. c. 68, which in section 12 introduces new words. The effect of these words is to extend the operation of the former Acts, . . . and to prevent not merely the solicitor himself but also his client from recovering such costs." The remarks of Esher, M.R., in Kent v.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ward are also in point. A submission to pay the amount due on taxation is only a submission to pay a sum which is owing. When a client claims papers, and a solicitor claims payment of costs before he delivers them up, the solicitor can only claim for costs which he is entitled to charge. I think that I ought to decide that the Act of 1874 is very different from the Acts of 1843 and 1860, and that whatever was the position of parties before the Act of 1874 was passed, since the passing of that Act solicitors can have no costs whatever for work done by them during the period of disqualification.

PEGGE v. NEATH DISTRICT TRAMWAYS CO. (a.)

Company — Debentures—Equitable security—Option to call for debenture.

An option to call at any time for a specified amount of debentures in satisfaction of a promissory note may be exercised at any time while the issue is unexhausted. The holder of such a security is in equity a debenture-holder.

In re Queensland Land and Coal Co., Davis v. Martin, 42 W. R. 600, [1894] 3 Ch. 181, followed.

Summons to vary the master's certificate.

The defendant company in November, 1875, issued debentures for £6,000 at 4½ per cent. interest. One of these debentures for £600 was held by Charles Pegge, a director, and the applicant on this summons. In January, 1879, a series of second debentures for £10,000 at 4½ per cent. interest were issued. In November, 1882, the company borrowed money from the applicant and three other directors on the security of four promissory notes at 5 per cent. interest, coupled with an undertaking that the company would, at any time when called on by the holder of any such note, issue debentures for the amount out of the second debentures. The applicant, on the 11th of November, 1882, lent £300 on these terms, and on the 28th of October, 1884, a further sum of £100. He declined to change his note for a debenture in 1883.

In September, 1894, the applicant was one of the plaintiffs in a debenture-holders' action; a receiver and manager was appointed, and interest on the applicant's note was paid till the date of the appointment. The property was sold, and £8,000 paid into court. This being insufficient for the payment of the debentures, there was no surplus for ordinary creditors, and on the 7th of October, 1896, the applicant in an affidavit claimed his right to exchange his note for second debentures. The master's certificate, dated the 30th of June, 1897, disallowed the applicant's claim.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the debenture-holders.

Dighton Pollock, for the applicant.—The option can be exercised at any time until the debentures are exhausted or the company is wound up: In re Queensland Land and Coal Co., Davis v. Martin, 42 W. R. 600, [1894] 3 Ch. 181, is exactly in point, and we are equitable debenture-holders.

Hume Williams, for the company.

NORTH, J.—The facts are undisputed. The promissory notes bear interest at 5 per cent. free of income tax, and their holders had a right to call for debentures at any time at their pleasure. Four such agreements were made, and the other three directors exercised their options before 1883, and it is said that the applicant ought to have exercised his option at the same time, but I do not see why. In 1884 the applicant made a further advance of £100 upon the same terms, so it is clear that the company recognized that its liability to issue debentures at any time when called upon still existed. What has occurred since to disentitle the applicant to exercise his option? The total issue authorized was £10,000, and a sufficient margin to satisfy the option is still unissued. The applicant has been repeatedly asked to take up his debentures but refused, preferring the 5 per cent. interest on his promissory note; but that fact does not deprive him of his option.

Then, in 1894, the applicant, as holder of a first mortgage debenture, and J. D. Llewellyn, as holder of a second mortgage debenture, sued on behalf of themselves and all other holders of mortgage debentures of the company, and judgment was given on the 12th of January, 1895, declaring that both series constituted a charge. I cannot see that the applicant waived his right to a second mortgage debenture by not mentioning it in the statement of claim. On the 7th of October, 1896, the applicant first formally claimed to exercise his option to take second debentures. The reason is obvious, and I think he is entitled to have them, following In re Queensland Land and Coal Co., Davis v. Martin. He is equitably entitled to a second debenture and to stand on the same footing as a legal debenture-holder. I do not see how he is disqualified from asserting this right. He had the choice of two securities, promissory notes or debentures, and could take up which he liked at any time. He made his formal claim by affidavit on the 7th of October, 1896, and debenture interest should run from that date, but as the funds are insufficient this is immaterial. I cannot call upon him to return any of the interest at 5 per cent. he has received, and he has the right of proof for any arrears at the date of the exercise of the option. I must make a declaration that he is equitably entitled to a debenture and to rank as a debenture-holder. He can add his costs to his security.

DEUTSCHE NATIONAL BANK v. PAUL. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service out of jurisdiction—Foreclosure action—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) (g).

Mortgagees purchased an equity of redemption and had it conveyed to trustees for themselves. They then brought a foreclosure action against the trustees and a second mortgagee who was resident out of the jurisdiction. On a motion to discharge an order for service of the writ out of the jurisdiction,

Held, (1) that the action was not founded on a breach of contract so as to fall within ord. 11, r. 1 (e); and (2) that the trustees, though necessary parties to a foreclosure action, were not necessary defendants so as to bring the action within ord. 11, r. 1 (g), and that the order for service out of the jurisdiction must, therefore, be discharged.

(a.) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a motion to discharge an order which had been made for service of the writ on the defendant Ebbeke out of the jurisdiction.

The writ which had been served was issued by the plaintiffs against two gentlemen named Paul and Farish, who were resident in England, and the defendant Ebbeke, who was resident in Bremen. The writ claimed a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to charge for £6,022 6s. 2d. and interest on six policies of assurance, and also asked for foreclosure and further relief. The action arose in the following way: The firm of Messrs. Jellings, Blow, & Co., who carried on business in London, applied to the plaintiffs for a credit by a letter of the 1st of May, 1890, which contained the terms of the credit. On this letter the plaintiffs advanced Messrs. Jellings, Blow, & Co. £6,022 6s. 2d., and the policies in question were deposited with them by way of security for this sum. On the 21st of August, 1894, Messrs. Jellings, Blow, & Co. charged the policies in favour of the defendant Ebbeke, subject to the prior charge. Subsequently, by deed of the 14th of December, 1894, the same firm conveyed all their property to a Mr. Jackson as a trustee for the benefit of their creditors. On the 5th of June, 1897, the plaintiffs issued a writ against Jackson and the defendant Ebbeke claiming the same relief as was asked for in the present action. This writ was never served on Ebbeke, but was served on Jackson, and an arrangement was made by which the bank became purchasers of all interest which Jackson had in the policies as trustee; and the equity of redemption, subject to the defendant Ebbeke's claim, was conveyed to the defendants Paul and Farish as trustees for and by the direction of the plaintiffs. That action was then dropped, and the writ was issued in the present action against Paul, Farish, and Ebbeke, and leave was obtained for service out of the jurisdiction. This leave was obtained on an affidavit which did not disclose the fact that the defendants Paul and Farish were simply trustees for the plaintiffs.

The defendant Ebbeke now moved to have the order for service discharged on the ground that the action was not properly brought against Messrs. Paul and Farish as they were merely trustees for the plaintiffs. It was suggested that they were made defendants merely to bring the defendant Ebbeke within a jurisdiction which would not otherwise exist. On the other hand it was contended that Messrs. Paul and Farish were necessary parties to the action, and that consequently leave was rightly given.

The question turned on the effect of ord. 11, r. 1, which provides as follows: (1) Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever (e) the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract wherever made, which according to the terms thereof ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland; or (g) any person out of the jurisdiction is a necessary or proper party to an action properly brought against some other person duly served within the jurisdiction.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued: I assume that under section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, the legal right to sue on the policies is now vested in the defendants Paul and Farish. It is admitted that they are simply trustees for the plaintiffs and are bound to act with reference to the subject-matter of the trust as the plaintiffs direct, and that they have not refused so to do and do not object to become co-plaintiffs in the action. To justify service out of the jurisdiction the case must be brought within the provisions of ord. 11, r. 1: see In re Eager, 31 W. R. 33, 22 Ch. D. 86; In re Cliff, 43 W. R. 436, [1895] 2 Ch. 21. Clause (g) of that rule was mainly relied on, but at a late stage of the argument a suggestion was made that clause (e) might apply, and with that I shall first deal. The writ claims a declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled to a charge for the sum of £6,022 6s. 2d. and interest on six policies of assurance, and that the charge may be enforced by foreclosure and all accounts and enquiries necessary for that purpose and for further and other relief. The object of the writ, therefore, so far as specific relief is thereby sought, is to compel the defendant Ebbeke to redeem the plaintiffs by paying off what is due to them, and, in default, to become the absolute owners of the property on which the charge exists. Under the claim for general relief the plaintiffs would, I apprehend, be entitled to ask that, in the event of the court refusing to give relief by way of foreclosure, the policies might be sold and the proceeds applied in payment of the plaintiffs' debt. In my judgment an action so framed is not founded on a breach of contract within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (e). The plaintiffs' title to a charge may have arisen by reason of a breach on the part of Jennings, Blow, & Co. in not paying what they owed to the plaintiffs. The action, however, is not founded on that breach of contract, or indeed on any other breach of contract, for the defendants have not committed any breach of any contract with the plaintiffs; it is founded on the existence of a charge constituting a security for the debt due to the plaintiffs. I think, therefore, it does not fall within clause (e) of rule 1. Coming, then, to clause (g), the question is whether the present action is properly brought against Paul and Farish. The practice of the court requires that to an action for foreclosure all persons who have or claim an interest in the equity of redemption should be parties, and I think that to such an action as the present, the defendants Paul and Farish are extremely proper if not necessary parties. The rule would be satisfied, however, if those gentlemen had been made co-plaintiffs instead of defendants; and I think that they ought more properly to have been made plaintiffs, in this sense, that any extra costs occasioned by making them defendants might, upon a proper application for that purpose, be ordered to be borne by the plaintiffs. Now, Paul and Farish are made parties simply to comply with this rule of practice. Against them no relief is sought, no right is claimed to be enforced. No substantial reason is given why they should be defendants rather than plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs had taken an assignment to themselves instead of to the defendants, the action would not have fallen within ord. 11, r. 1. I do not think it is necessary for me to come to the conclusion that the assignment to them as trustees was a mere device to enable this action to be brought, but, in my judgment, the action is not properly brought against them within the meaning of the rule. The order for service out of the jurisdiction must therefore be discharged.

AJELLO v. WORSLEY. (a.)

Injunction—Trader—Misleading advertisement—Sale of goods at less than cost price.

A trader may offer for sale goods at any price he chooses, and it is immaterial whether such goods are actually in his possession or not. Consequently, where a trader advertised for sale goods at less than cost price, not having any such goods in his possession, and by so doing injured the plaintiffs,

Held, that he could not be restrained from so doing, as the damage to the plaintiffs arose not from the misrepresentations in the advertisements, but from the underselling of their goods, which was not an actionable wrong.

The statement of claim in this action sought (1) an injunction to restrain the defendant from maliciously, or for the purpose of injuring the plaintiffs in their trade, advertising or otherwise offering for sale (a) either a new pianoforte of the plaintiffs' manufacture at the price of 15 guineas (such being less than the plaintiffs' wholesale price for a similar pianoforte) or any other sum less that the said wholesale price, or (b) what is not in fact a new pianoforte of the plaintiffs' manufacture as a new pianoforte of the plaintiffs' manufacture; (2) an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, from passing off or attempting to pass off pianofortes not of the plaintiffs' manufacture as or for the goods of the plaintiffs by advertisement or in any other way; (3) damages for injuring the plaintiffs in their trade; (4) damages for passing off; and (5) costs.

So far as it sought to restrain the defendants from passing off or attempting to pass off goods of other manufacturers as those of the plaintiffs the case was abandoned at the trial, it being admitted that there was no evidence to support any such charge against the defendant. At the bar what was sought was an injunction not in the form asked by the statement of claim but in a modified form. The facts, so far as they are necessary to be stated, were these: The plaintiffs were manufacturers of pianos, carrying on business in London, who made and supplied their customers with various classes of pianos, among which it is only necessary to mention class 1, the Britannia model, supplied to the trade at 15 guineas; class 2, which is supplied at 17 guineas; and then a class described in the price list as "class 6*a*, an upright grand, iron-frame, check action, trichord," supplied to to the trade at £23 10s. The defendant was a furnishing contractor who carried on business in an extensive way at Manchester. In the early part of 1895 the plaintiffs supplied the defendant with several pianos, two of class 2 at the trade price, on the 26th of January and the 15th February, one of class 6*a* on the 25th of April and two of the Britannia model on the 23rd of April and the 5th of May. The two last, the Britannia models, formed part of an order for twelve pianos of that class, which had been given by the defendant to the plaintiffs, but which in consequence of some dissatisfaction of the plaintiffs with the advertisements issued by the defendant, the plaintiffs refused to execute. Their definite refusal so to do became known to the defendant at an interview between him and the senior partner of the plaintiffs' firm in August, 1895. After this, on the 22nd of February, 1896, defendant published in the Manchester Evening News, a newspaper having a large circulation in Manchester and the neighbourhood, an advertisement in the following form:

"Great Sale of Pianos at Worsley's.
Hundreds of Bargains on View.
Pianos by all the great makers.
Worsley's, The Pantheon, Gaythorn.
. . . . . .
Special List.
. . . . . .
New Instruments at Worsley's.
. . . . . .
A fine Upright Grand by Ajello!
Iron frame, check action, trichord!
Price 15 guineas, or 15s. per month.
. . . . . ."

A similar advertisement appeared in the same paper from the 24th to the 29th February both inclusive, and on the 2nd to the 7th of March. And a similar advertisement appeared in the Northern Daily Telegraph on the 5th, 25th, and 28th March, and on the 2nd, 4th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 16th, and 17th April. The object of the action was to restrain the continuance of these advertisements. The advertisements, in the opinion of the judge, were such that a member of the public, on reading them would be led to believe that the defendant had in stock and for sale at 15 guineas a new piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture which might be properly described as an upright grand with check action and trichord. It was admitted that at the date of the several advertisements the defendant had no piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture in stock, though the defendant had a piano of the Britannia model class in stock at the date when they began. It was also established that the plaintiffs had incurred loss by reason of these advertisements.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and J. Cutler, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to the injunction except as to passing off: Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 40 W. R. 337, [1892] A. C. 25. The cases of Bradford Corporation v. Pickles, 44 W. R. 190, [1895] A. C. 587; Flood v. Jackson, 43 W. R. 453, [1895] 2 Q. B. 21, are distinguishable. The latter case is still under consideration sub nomine Allen v. Flood.

Grosvenor Woods, Q.C., and Macnaghten, Q.C., for defendant.—The defendant may carry on a lawful trade in any lawful manner, whether it causes loss to any rival tradesmen or not. In the course of business he may sell goods at any price he pleases even at a loss, either to attract customers or to get rid of stock. There is no evidence of malice in anything the defendant has done, and even if there were, no action would lie. If there were any misrepresentations either as to the class of goods or as to goods being in stock, the plaintiffs must show that they were affected by these misrepresentations. There is nothing unlawful in advertising for sale goods which are not in stock, and such an advertisement would give rise to no cause for action.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued: What the plaintiffs claimed at the Bar by their counsel was an injunction to restrain the defendant from advertising for sale any of the plaintiffs' pianos unless he had in his possession a piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture and of the class advertised. By limiting the claim to an injunction so limited they virtually admit, and I think rightly, that if the defendant had in his possession a piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture and of the class advertised at the time he might offer it for sale at any price he chose. Indeed it appears plain that the owner of any property is entitled to sell or dispose of it for such consideration as he may see fit, and either at a profit or at a loss. And, I take it, that it is settled by the case of Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1, that the motive of the owner in so acting cannot be inquired into. I further think that the general rule is that any person may sell or offer for sale at any price whatsoever goods of which he is not the owner, but which he hopes or expects to acquire. It is expressly provided by section 5 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893: (1) The goods which form the subject of a contract for sale may be either existing goods, owned or possessed by the seller, or goods to be manufactured or acquired by the seller after the making of the contract of sale, in this Act called "future goods"; (2) there may be a contract for the sale of goods, the acquisition of which by the seller depends upon a contingency which may or may not happen; (3) where by a contract of sale the seller purports to effect a present sale of future goods, the contract operates as an agreement to sell the goods. And these last-mentioned goods in the Act are designated by the convenient term "future goods."

If a seller contract to sell future goods he must be at liberty as a first step of such contract to offer them for sale. And I see nothing to prevent his making such an offer by advertisement or in any other lawful way. Again, it seems to me that he is entitled to make the offer at any price he pleases, remunerative or not. It may be worth a trader's while to sell some goods at a loss so long as he is able to sell others at a countervailing or more than than countervailing profit. In all this I assume that the seller is acting honestly. If what he does is tainted with fraud he may be guilty of an actionable wrong. An illustration is afforded by the case of Richardson v. Silvester, 22 W. R. 74, L. R. 9 Q. B. 34. There the particulars of the plaintiff's claim in an action in a county court were as follow: "The plaintiff sues the defendant in tort for legal fraud and deceit committed under the following circumstances, for that the defendant in March, 1872, caused to be inserted in a public newspaper an advertisement for the letting by tender with immediate possession of a farm; and the plaintiff, believing in the bona fides of such advertisement and desiring to become tenant of a place of the description advertised, did take trouble and pains and incurred expense in going to and inspecting the property and in the employment of persons to inspect and value it for him with a view of becoming tenant thereof; whereas afterwards it appeared that the defendant had no power to let the property as advertised, and caused the advertisement to be issued to serve some purpose of his own other than that appearing by the advertisement, and that the defendant knew at the time he caused such an advertisement to be published that he had not the power to let the farm, and that the farm was not to be let." The county court judge ruled that the particulars disclosed no cause of action and nonsuited the plaintiff. Held, that the particulars contained allegations amounting to a fraudulent representation for which an action would lie.

In the present case the plaintiffs had, in the autumn of 1895, refused to supply the defendant with any of their pianos, and they continued such refusal down to the commencement of the action. The defendant therefore could not get from the plaintiffs any of their new pianos, but, in my opinion, he might, by indirect means, have acquired new pianos of theirs upon terms which would not indeed enable him to sell at a profit, but which need not have involved a ruinous loss. If, then, the defendant had seen fit to advertise that he was prepared to supply new pianos of the plaintiffs' manufacture, of Britannia model type, then I think he would have been within his legal rights. It is said, however, that the advertisement actually published contained two misrepresentations—first, that the piano to which it related (being, according to the defendant's statement, of the Britannia model type) was described as "upright grand, with check action and trichord"; and second, that such piano was in the possession of the defendant at the several dates when the advertisement appeared.

As regards the first point, as I have already stated, in my opinion the description cannot be treated as inaccurate, and in argument the main stress was laid on the second point. In my judgment this misrepresentation does not make the advertisement fraudulent, and in order that misrepresentation may be actionable it must not only be untrue but must cause damage. Therefore, beyond the damage to the plaintiff it must be attributable as a cause of damage to the person who complains of it. The question then arises, Is the damage complained of by the plaintiffs attributable to the misrepresentation of fact contained in the advertisement? It appears that this question must be answered in the negative, for an advertisement such as in my opinion the defendant might legally have issued would have produced precisely the same consequences and have been followed by the same damaging results. No decision in support of such an action as the present was cited in argument. What was mainly relied on by the plaintiffs' counsel was the general statement of the law laid down by Lord Bowen in the Court of Appeal in the well-known case of Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor. He states the law thus: "What, then, are the limitations which the law imposes on a trader in the conduct of his business as between himself and other traders? There seem to be no burdens or restrictions in law upon a trader which are not equally laid on all other subjects of the Crown. His right to trade freely is a right which the law recognizes and encourages, but it is one which places him at no special disadvantage as compared with others. No man, whether trader or not, can, however, justify damaging another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it." Then he proceeds to give a number of illustrations and what I think are general propositions. I do not think it necessary to inquire whether the law laid down by the House of Lords in Allen v. Flood imposes any limitations or qualifications on the views there expressed, for in my opinion the present case does not fall within the class in which damage caused by misrepresentation arises within the meaning of the lord justice. The class of cases which he probably had in mind was that of which Ratcliffe v. Evans, 10

W. R. 578, [1892] 2 Q. B. 524, is an example. It was there held that where a defendant had intentionally published an untrue statement regarding the plaintiffs' business, and thereby had in the ordinary course caused damage to the plaintiff, he was liable. Here the untrue statement related to the defendant's own business, and I may point out that if it affected the plaintiffs' business at all it did not effect it exclusively, for Mr. Sharples and every music dealer in the neighbourhood of Manchester who happened at the time to have the plaintiffs' pianos in his shop suffered damage as well as the plaintiffs. However, for the reasons I have already stated, I think the damage to the plaintiffs was not caused by the misrepresentation contained in the advertisement. Consequently the action fails, and must be dismissed. I cannot, however, approve of the defendant's conduct. The advertisement was not such as ought to have been published, and great negligence has been shown as regards the withdrawal of it. I think, therefore, that the defendant is not entitled to any costs of the action, except in so far as those costs have been incurred by the unfounded charge—namely, that of passing off as of the plaintiffs' manufacture a piano that was not—which forms the subject of paragraph 2 of the prayer in the statement of the claim. These costs will be paid by the plaintiff.

PENNELL v. FRANKLIN. (a.)

Solicitor—Executor—Will—Power to solicitor-executor to make professional charges—Insolvent estate—Creditors' action.

The power given by a will to a solicitor-executor to make professional charges is a legacy, and consequently the solicitor is not entitled, if the estate be insolvent, to any profit costs of acting as solicitor to the estate, as against creditors.

Walter White, who died in 1891, by his will, after directing payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, appointed three gentlemen, one of whom was a Mr. Franklin, a solicitor, executors and trustees of his will, and by a clause therein declared that Mr. Franklin should be the solicitor to his estate, and as such, notwithstanding his acceptance of the trusteeship and executorship of the will, should be allowed all professional and other charges for his time and trouble which, if employed as solicitor to the trustees and executors, not being himself a trustee and executor, he would be entitled to make. The testator's estate being quite insolvent, the will was proved by Mr. Franklin alone, the two other trustees and executors renouncing probate and disclaiming the trusts. An action being brought by creditors against Mr. Franklin as executor of the testator's estate was defended by Mr. Franklin, who appeared and defended the action in person, acting as solicitor for himself.

This was a summons upon the further consideration of the action taken out by the creditors asking for an order that, the testator's real and personal estate not being sufficient to pay his debts in full, it might be declared that the defendant, Mr. Franklin, was not entitled to any profit costs by reason of the declaration contained in the testator's will.

Church, for the creditors.—The power to make professional charges is in fact a legacy; it cannot, therefore, prevail against the right of the creditors. Mr. Franklin acts for himself alone, his fellow-trustees having renounced: In re Barber, Burgess v. Vinnicome, 34 W. R. 395, 31 Ch. D. 665; In re Pooley, 37 W. R. 17, 40 Ch. D. 1; Cradock v. Piper, 1 Mac. & G. 664; Broughton v. Broughton, 3 W. R. 602, 5 De G. M. & G. 160. [KEKEWICH, J., referred to In re Thorley, Thorley v. Massam, 39 W. R. 565, [1891] 2 Ch. 613].

J. G. Wood, for Mr. Franklin.—The power to charge is not really equivalent to a legacy, for work has to be done in return for the power. It will bear very hardly on Mr. Franklin. The creditors knew he took office on certain terms, which they ought to be willing to give effect to.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is not my duty to consider whether it may or may not be hard upon the solicitor, neither can I consider whether it would be better for the estate that he should act and charge as solicitor, I must consider the facts of the case. The solicitor, by a clause in this will, which is a very common one, is allowed to charge profit costs, notwithstanding that he is executor and trustee of the will. He is the sole executor, and the estate is insolvent, and the question is whether he is entitled to charge his profit costs against an insolvent estate. This power in the will is really a gift by the testator upon a condition. It is a gift to a solicitor of the power of charging for costs which he would not otherwise have if he chooses to act as executor. It is for him to say whether he will or will not act. He does act, and must therefore take the risk of getting paid out of the estate. It seems to me it must be a matter of bounty, for but for this clause the solicitor could not charge at all for profit costs. It is a gift by the testator to the solicitor of that which the law does not give. The testator, in fact, says, "I give to my trustee and executor the right to act as solicitor and to charge therefor." That is just as much a legacy as a gift of £100 would be. There is no difference between giving profit costs and giving a sum of money. It is a legacy, and is chargeable with legacy duty. The Court of Appeal was clear on the point, I think, in the case of In re Thorley. If it is a legacy the whole question is settled, because a legatee cannot compete with a creditor, he can only come in after a creditor, for a legacy can only come out of such part of an estate as is left after payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses. This is not a debt but a bounty, and it therefore fails as against the creditors. It may be hard upon the solicitor who acts upon the impression that there is a large estate which may be subsequently destroyed by some claim, but the law is as I have said, and with the propriety of it I have nothing to do.

In re CASTELL & BROWN (LIMITED).
Ex parte UNION BANK OF LONDON. (a.)

Company—Debentures—Priority between equitable mortgagees—Notice—Negligence of first mortgagee in custody of deeds.

A company had created by way of equitable mortgage certain debentures, which were secured by a floating charge on all the property of the company. There was a condition that the company should not be at liberty to create any charge upon its freehold or leasehold property in priority to the debentures. The title-deeds of such property were left in the possession of the company, and were, subsequently to the issue of the debentures, deposited with the company's bank to secure an overdraft. The bank had then no notice of the existence of the charge created by the debentures. In the liquidation of the company the bank claimed to have a prior charge, and to retain the title-deeds until their debt was paid.

Held, that though, as between equitable incumbrancers, the general rule is that, where other equities are equal, the first in time has priority, that in the present case, having regard to the possession of the title-deeds and other circumstances, the bank had the better equity, and were entitled to priority for their charge.

Adjourned summons.

The question in this case was that of priority between two equitable incumbrancers. In 1885 the company issued debentures to the amount of £28,000, each debenture purporting to charge all the property of the company whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being. One of the conditions indorsed was to the effect the charge was to be a floating security, but so that the company was not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge upon its freehold or leasehold hereditaments in priority to the debentures.

No legal mortgage of the freehold or leasehold property of the company was ever made to the debenture-holders, and the title-deeds remained in the possession and control of the company.

The debenture-holders, therefore, were the first equitable incumbrancers in point of date. The second was the Union Bank, who, in 1892, had allowed the company an overdraft on their depositing the title-deeds of their leasehold property. This overdraft was paid; but in 1895 a further overdraft was allowed on the company giving a memorandum of equitable charge on the deeds and undertaking to execute a legal mortgage. The interest on the debentures being in default, the above action was instituted by the debenture-holders, and in July, 1896, the usual judgment was made for the appointment of a receiver and directing inquiries as to the charges and their priorities. In April, 1896, the company passed resolutions for voluntary liquidation, and in June, 1897, an order was made for the continuation of the liquidation under the supervision of the court. In February, 1897, the bank was served with a notice of judgment in the action. At that date the overdraft at the bank amounted to some £220.

The bank stated that until served with the notice of the judgment they had not had any notice of the company having issued any debentures, or that it had created any charge upon the property comprised in the deeds deposited with the bank. The company being stated to be insolvent the bank claimed to have a prior charge for £220 and interest and to retain the deeds until their debt was paid.

Neville, Q.C., and Gore-Browne, for the Union Bank.

ROMER, J., said: This is a question of priority between two equitable incumbrancers. The debentures are prior in date. But the Union Bank at the date of its charges had no notice, express or implied, of the prior incumbrance, and obtained possession of the title-deeds, and, under the circumstances of the case, claims priority. If the equities of the two incumbrancers are in other respects equal then, of course, priority depends upon the dates of the charges. But the question is whether, under the circumstances of this case, the bank has not the better equity so as to entitle it to priority. Now, as between equitable incumbrancers in determining priority, the possession of the deeds has always been treated as a circumstance of great importance. And, indeed, in some of the numerous cases which show this there are observations of the judges who decided them which go very far. For instance, in Rice v. Rice, 2 W. R. 139, 2 Drew 81, Kindersley, V.C., said: "We have here, then, ample authority for the proposition or rule of equity that, as between two persons whose equitable interests are of precisely the same nature and quality and in that respect precisely equal, the possession of the deeds gives the better equity." And in Lloyd's Banking Co. v. Jones, 33 W. R. 781, 29 Ch. D. 221, p. 229, Pearson, J., observed: "I think upon the authorities which have been cited, and which are so well known, that it would be pedantry for me to go over these again. The doctrine of the court has always been that, where there are equities which are otherwise equal, the possession of the deeds gives priority to the person who has got them." But, in my opinion, these observations, if taken without any limit or restriction, go too far, for I do not think a prior equitable incumbrancer would lose his priority where he did not obtain the deeds, and the deeds came to the hands of the subsequent incumbrancer through no default of any sort on his part.

I therefore proceed to inquire into the circumstances under which, in the present case, the deeds came into the hands of the bank. In the first place, I cannot hold that there was any negligence on the part of the bank. When making its advances to Castell & Brown (Limited) (which I will hereafter call the company) it found the company in possession of the deeds in question, and, apparently, able as unincumbered owner to charge the property. The company purported as such unincumbered owner to give a charge to the bank, and I think the bank was, under the circumstances, entitled to rely upon obtaining a charge free from incumbrance.

It is suggested on behalf of the debenture-holders that the bank ought to have made some special inquiries of the company. But it is not suggested that the bank wilfully abstained from making inquiries, and as the bank had no reason to suppose that the company were not fully able to give a valid first charge, and found the company in possession of the deeds which showed no incumbrance, I think the bank was not bound to make any special inquiry. It is said on behalf of the debenture-holders that it is so common for companies to issue debentures that the bank ought to have assumed there were some in this case, or, at any rate, to have specially inquired about debentures. But every company does not issue debentures, and, moreover, every debenture does not charge property of the company, and certainly not property the title-deeds of which were left with the company. It might just as well be said, because it is common for private individuals to mortgage their properties, that a person asked to make advances to a borrower who appears to be unincumbered owner, and has the deeds showing him to be such owner, is bound to assume that the borrower has previously mortgaged, or to make special inquiries of him on the footing that he has previously mortgaged. Such a contention appears to me unreasonable. I therefore hold that there was no negligence on the part of the bank; and I now look to see how it was that the company retained possession of the deeds, notwithstanding the issue of the debentures. The reason appears to me to be obvious. The debentures were only intended to give what is called a floating charge—that is to say, it was intended, notwithstanding the debentures, that the company should have power, so long as it was a going concern, to deal with its property as absolute owner. And I infer it was on this account that the company was allowed to, and did, retain possession of the deeds. In other words, the debenture-holders, notwithstanding their charge—and, indeed, by its very terms—authorised their mortgagor, the company, so deal with its property as if it had not been incumbered, and left with their mortgagor the deeds in order to enable the company to act as owner. It is true that, having given this general authority to the company, the debentures purported to put a certain special restriction on its exercise. By the first condition it was provided that, though the charge was to be a floating security, the company was not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge upon its freehold and leasehold hereditaments in priority to the debentures. This restriction was, no doubt, quite valid as a private arrangement between the company and the dedenture-holders.

But can the debenture-holders, under these circumstances, set it up as against the bank taking its securities without notice? I think not. I take it to be established that if a first mortgagee, even though he has the legal estate, authorizes the mortgagor to retain the deeds in order that the mortgagor may thereby, as ostensible owner of the property, be able to deal with it, though only to a limited extent, yet, if the mortgagor takes advantage of the deeds so left with him to deal with the property to an extent beyond what was authorized, then the mortgagee cannot set up his charge as against a purchaser for value without notice who claims under the unauthorized dealing, and relied on the deeds and the apparent ability of the owner to deal with the property free from incumbrances. In Perry Herrick v. Attwood, 6 W. R. 204, 2 De G. & J., at p. 39, Lord Cranworth, L.C., says, with reference to a case of this kind, that if a person taking a legal mortgage chooses to leave the deeds with the mortgagor, not through negligence or fraud, but with the intention of enabling him to raise a sum of £15,000 which is to take precedence of the legal mortgage, the mortgagee cannot, as against subsequent mortgagees, complain if, instead of the £15,000, the mortgagor raises £50,000, because he had himself put it into the mortgagor's power to raise any sum of money he pleased; and the principle has been acted on in numerous later cases, amongst which I may mention Briggs v. Jones, L. R. 10 Eq. 92, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 84 This being the case as between a prior legal mortgagee and a subsequent equitable incumbrancer, it is an a fortiori case where the first mortgage is only equitable. In my opinion, therefore, the bank has a stronger equity than the debenture-holders and is entitled to priority. I may add that if I am not mistaken in my inference that the deeds were allowed to remain with the company because the debentures created a floating charge only, and it was intended that the company should be authorized to act as owner (subject to the special conditions imposed by the debentures), then I cannot see why the debenture-holders should not have obtained possession or control over the deeds in some shape or form, and they would come within the series of cases which have decided that a first mortgagee, even a legal one, who negligently leaves the deeds in the hands of the mortgagor, is postponed to a subsequent mortgagee who obtains the deeds without notice; see inter alia Clarke v. Palmer, 21 Ch. D. 124, 30 W. R. Dig. 135; and Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Companies v. Whipp, 32 W. R. 626, L. R. 26 Ch. D. 482.

I therefore declare that the bank's charge has priority, and their costs will be added to their security.

MARKS v. FROGLEY. (a.)

Army—Volunteer—"Persons subject to military law"—Training with regular forces—Breaking up of camp—Subsequent detention in military custody—Army Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 58), ss. 41, 45, 158, 176, sub-section 8 (a).

The plaintiff, a member of a volunteer corps, was with other members of the corps in military training with a portion of the regular forces at a camp at S. On the morning of the day on which the camp was broken up, the plaintiff was arrested on a charge of having commited a larceny in the camp. He was taken in military custody to the S. railway station, and there, by order of the officer in command, was given into the custody of the defendants, a sergeant and two other members of the same volunteer corps, and taken by them by train to B. railway station, a journey of three and a-half hours, and thence on foot to H., where the plaintiff was handed over to the civil authority. The plaintiff was subsequently tried at quarter sessions on the charge of larceny and acquitted.

Held, that, after the arrival of the plaintiff and the defendants at S. railway station, they were no longer "being trained or exercised" with the regular forces within section 176, sub-section 8 (a), of the Army Act, 1881, and were, therefore, not subject to military law; that the subsequent detention of the plaintiff in military custody by the defendants was not justifiable under sections 41, 45, and 158 of the Army Act, 1881; and that an action for false imprisonment and assault would lie against the defendants.

Action tried before Kennedy, J., and a special jury.

The plaintiff claimed damages for false imprisonment and assault.

The jury found a verdict in favour of the plaintiff with £300 damages.

The facts, and arguments of counsel, are fully stated in the judgment.

Tassell, for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 22.—KENNEDY, J., read the following judgment: Henry Marks, the plaintiff in this action, who is a member of a Bedfordshire volunteer corps, has obtained, in an action for assault and false imprisonment which was tried before me, sitting with a special jury, a finding of the jury of £300 damages against three defendants—Arthur Cooper, who is a sergeant, and Thomas Lovelock and George Albert Short, who are privates in the same corps as that to which the plaintiff belongs. A further defendant in the action, Frederic Frogley, who is a superintendent of the Herts County Police, has had, upon the findings of the jury, a judgment in his favour, and no question arises in his case. The points affecting the three first-named defendants, which I reserved after argument for consideration, are of a somewhat peculiar nature. The facts relevant to the decision of the points are as follows: The plaintiff and these defendants, with other members of the corps, were in August last in military training with a portion of the regular forces at Shorncliffe. The camp was broken up on the morning of August 8. Early on that morning, and whilst the preparations for the return of the volunteers to their respective homes were proceeding in the camp, a disturbance took place in and around the tent in which the plaintiff and others had been lodged in consequence of some of the plaintiff's comrades accusing him of having stolen and hidden in his kit bag a number of articles which belonged to them. The adjutant of the corps, Captain Foote, having been informed as to the disturbance, came to the spot, and ultimately (to omit details on which there was some conflict in the evidence) ordered Sergeant Killin to form an escort and take the plaintiff to the guard tent, where he would find Lieutenant Roberts on the point of proceeding with the luggage and its escort to Shorncliffe railway station. Sergeant Killin was to direct Lieutenant Roberts to take the plaintiff with the baggage guard to the railway station, and there keep him until the D (plaintiff's) Company arrived. By the further orders of Captain Foote, conveyed through Sergeant Killin, the plaintiff, after his arrival at the railway station, was to be taken in military custody in the special military train which was then about to start for the conveyance of volunteers to Watford, Boxmoor, and other stations to which the plaintiff and other members of his volunteer corps belonged; and on his arrival at Boxmoor (the railway station, about two miles distant, for Hemel Hempstead, where the plaintiff lived) the plaintiff was to be taken by his escort to the police-station at Hemel Hempstead, and then handed over to the civil authority. Captain Foote at the same time directed that information as to what had happened should be given at Hemel Hempstead to Captain Smeaton, the officer in command of the plaintiff's company. These orders were carried out. After the plaintiff had reached Shorncliffe station with the baggage guard, under Lieutenant Roberts, and the train was ready to receive her passengers, the defendant Cooper selected, in the usual way, from the ranks of the volunteers who were drawn up in the railway station, his two co-defendants, Lovelock and Short, to form the prisoner's escort on the journey to Boxmoor and Hemel Hempstead. The plaintiff was then placed in a compartment with these defendants, and the four so travelled together in the train to Boxmoor (a journey of about three and a-half hours). On the arrival of the train at Boxmoor the prisoner, under the charge of his escort, was directed by the defendant Cooper to remain in a waiting-room, while the rest of the volunteers, other than certain persons who would be required as witnesses in the plaintiff's case, were formally dismissed. The defendant Cooper directed Corporal Young to keep these witnesses together, and, with them, to follow prisoner's escort to the police-station at Hemel Hempstead. The defendants then marched with the plaintiff, who was placed between the two privates, to the police-station, and there charged by the defendant Frogley with the offence of larceny. After inquiry, and after hearing the evidence of some witnesses, the defendant Frogley took the plaintiff into custody. As there is now no question affecting the defendant Frogley it is unnecessary further to pursue the history of the case, except to say, in justice to the plaintiff, that when put on his trial, as he afterwards was, at the quarter sessions at Canterbury, he was honourably acquitted on the charges made against him. Upon these facts the plaintiff's case against these three defendants, Cooper, Lovelock, and Short, is a case of assault and false imprisonment, based upon the treatment to which they subjected him by keeping him in detention as their prisoner from the time when they took him in charge at Shorncliffe station to the time when they gave him in charge at Hemel Hempstead. It was not pleaded or contended on behalf of the defendants in answer to the plaintiff's claim that a felony had been committed. Therefore, if the matter had been one touching ordinary civilians the action was, except as to damages, an undefended action. The defendants, however, contended that this was not a case touching ordinary civilians, but a case in which they, and the plaintiff also, ought to be treated as persons under military law; that the order of Captain Foote was, under the law, justifiable; that even if it was in any respect illegal, it was not obviously illegal, and that as they simply obeyed an order which they were bound to obey they were in no case responsible. These being, as regards these defendants, the only defences of law, and the facts upon which they were based not being in dispute, the only question I had to ask the jury in regard to the claim against these defendants was as to the amount of damages to be awarded to the plaintiff in the event of the defences in point of law being held to be bad. The jury assessed these damages at £300.

I have now to decide whether the defendants are entitled to succeed upon any of the points of law which they have put forward. I have come to the conclusion that they are not. In the first place, at the time of the acts of which the plaintiff complains—i.e., during the conveyance of the plaintiff in custody from Shorncliffe to Boxmoor railway station and then to Hemel Hempstead police-station—I do not think that either the plaintiff or the defendants were subject to military law. The matter depends upon the provisions of the Army Act, 1881. The most important of these is section 176. That section commences by enacting: "The persons mentioned are persons subject to military law as soldiers, and this Act shall apply accordingly to all the persons so specified." The statute then enumerates in several sub-sections, which have no bearing upon the present case, various classes of persons; and in sub-section 8 it proceeds to include all non-commissioned officers and men belonging to the volunteer forces of the United Kingdom, (a) when they are being trained or exercised with any portion of the regular forces or with any portion of the militia when subject to military law. Now there is no question that whilst in the camp at Shorncliffe, and, in my view, until the dispatch of the prisoner, in fact (although he stated that he was unaware of it), from Shorncliffe railway station, both plaintiff and defendants were volunteers who were being trained and exercised with a portion of the regular forces, and were therefore, according to this enactment, persons subject to military law. Captain Foote in his evidence deposed to his opinion—and this is the contention of the defendants' counsel—that the "training" or "exercise" mentioned in the section ought to be held to continue in regard to each volunteer after the camp was broken up by the departure of the volunteers, and until the moment of his formal dismissal at his home destination, which in the case of the Hemel Hempstead party would be such a point either at Boxmoor station or after leaving Boxmoor station as the officer in command of the party might desire for the dismissal of the men. Indeed, I understand Captain Foote to go so far as to say that, in his opinion, if one of these volunteers had stolen a sheep on his way home between Boxmoor and Hemel Hempstead he could have been tried by court-martial for the offence. I cannot so construe the statute. The words in question appear to me to have a plain and sensible meaning, and to confine the subjection of the volunteer to military law within the period of his being trained and exercised with any portion of the regular forces or of the militia when subject to military law. The interpretation of Captain Foote and the defendants' counsel would add to the sub-section the words, "and when they are proceeding to or from such training or exercise." I hold that upon the departure of the plaintiff and defendants from the camp they ceased to be subject to military law; their status ceased to be that of soldiers, and became that of civilians subject only as to discipline to the provisions of the Volunteer Act, 1863, and subsequent statutes relating to volunteers, under none of which could the defendants justify their treatment of the plaintiff.

It is, however, contended for the defendants that even if this be the true view, and they and the plaintiff ceased to be subject to military law after leaving the camp at Shorncliffe, they are entitled to immunity by the combined effect of sections 41, 45, and 158 of the Army Act. I think this defence fails also. There is no doubt that the charge of larceny committed during his training with the regulars in the camp was an offence for which he might have been tried by court-martial under section 41; there is no doubt that his arrest by order of Captain Foote, when that charge was preferred against him, was perfectly proper and legal under section 45; and I am inclined to think that, if after his arrest it had been judged better that, instead of being tried by court-martial, the plaintiff should be handed over to the local police with the view of his being tried by the civil court, the arrest might properly have been continued, provided due diligence was used, until he was so handed over. I understood the plaintiff's counsel to be willing to concede so much. But Captain Foote did not adopt this course. He adopted the course he did with, no doubt, the best intentions, believing it to be both lawful and also expedient, and in order to prevent the inconvenience which would arise from delaying (as the holding of a court-martial or the sending of the parties concerned to Hythe police-station would delay) the breaking up of the camp and the departure of the plaintiff and the witnesses for their homes by the special train which had been ordered for their conveyance from Shorncliffe. But the course which he preferred was one for which I can find no justification in any section of the Army Act. The provision of section 158 (1) upon which reliance was placed for the defendants, appears to me not to afford any, for more than one reason. In the first place, its sanction for taking into and keeping in military custody, and for trying and punishing a person who has been, but has ceased to be, subject to military law, is, by the opening words of the sub-section, confined to cases in which "an offence under the Act has been committed" by that person. Here, ex concessio, Marks had not committed an offence. One might, perhaps, I agree, have expected that the sanction would have extended to the case of an offence under the Act being alleged to have been committed; but the words as they stand seem plain enough. Even, however, if the words could be interpreted as they must be interpreted in order to avail the defendants, I could find in this section no justification for that which the defendants did under Captain Foote's orders when, after they had ceased to be subject to military law, they kept the plaintiff as a prisoner during a long railway journey and a two-mile march, not in order that he might be tried by court-martial, but in order that he might be handed over to the police authority, not at the place of the alleged offence, but in a different county. I doubt whether, even if the plaintiff and the defendants continued, as Captain Foote thought they did, to be subject to military law, a detention of this kind and for this purpose could be treated as a proper exercise of the powers of military custody given by section 45 of the Army Act.

The last point taken for the defendants was that, even if the order which they obeyed was unjustifiable or illegal, still it was not obviously unjustifiable or illegal, and the defendants, who were at the time when it was given by Captain Foote subject to military law and bound to obey his orders and simply did what he ordered, ought not to be held liable for what they did. The principles of law applicable to a case such as the present, I take as they are stated by Willes, J., in his judgments in Keighly v. Bell, 4 F. & F. 763, pp. 790, 805, and in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, ib. 806, p. 831. In accordance with those principles, as I understand them, I should hold this to be a good plea for the defendants if I were of opinion that they and the plaintiff continued subject to military law during the time of the doing of the acts by the defendants of which the plaintiff complains. Even if the order were in excess of the powers as to military custody given by section 45, it would be an excess which, in my view, would not be obvious to persons in the position of the defendants. I am, however, for the reasons which I have already stated, of opinion that at the time of the acts complained of neither the plaintiff nor the defendants were subject to military law, and therefore—also, I think, in accordance with the law as laid down by Willes, J., in the cases to which I have referred—I must decide that this defence also fails. I give judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the damages fixed by the jury.

G. by deed transferred his estates, including a manor house, to the defendant, his nephew, subject, as regards property other than the mansion house, to an annual rent-charge in favour of G. for life, and subject also to the manor house being enjoyed as theretofore by G. By the same deed the defendant entered into several covenants relating to the estates, and a power of revoking the deed and reassuming the property in the estates was reserved to G. upon the breach of certain of the said covenants by the defendant. The annual value of the estate at the death of G. was considerably in excess of the rent-charge reserved.

Held, that a sufficient interest and a sufficient power of revocation were reserved in the property so as to bring it within the description of property contained in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (2) (c), and that, on the death of G., in October, 1894, the whole of the property became chargeable with estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1.

Information.

By a deed dated the 19th of October, 1885, Henry, third Earl Grey (since deceased), transferred to his nephew, Albert Grey, now fourth earl, his estates in Northamptonshire, including the mansion house of Howick and its appurtenances and the effects therein, subject to an annual rent-charge of £4,000 in favour of the third earl, issuing out of all the property transferred other than the mansion house and its appurtenances and the effects therein. The deed provided that the mansion house, &c., should be held by the fourth earl in trust to permit the third earl to occupy and enjoy the same as theretofore. By the same deed the fourth earl covenanted (1) to pay certain annuities; (2) to pay the mortgages and other charges on the land and all interest then or thereafter due under them; (3) to pay the rent-charge of £4,000; (4) to keep up the mansion house; (5) to deliver farm or garden produce required for the use of the household at Howick; (6) to pay the funeral expenses, debts, &c., of the third earl; (7) not to sell or dispose of certain of the lands; and (8) at the request of the third earl to produce receipts and vouchers for payments made under clauses (1), (2), (4), or (6). It was also provided that in the event of Albert Grey, now fourth earl, dying in the lifetime of the third earl, or of any breach by the fourth earl of any covenant on his part, that it should be lawful for the third earl to revoke the deed either wholly or in part.

By a deed dated the 26th of September, 1894, the third earl, in consideration of £5,000, released the rent-charge of £4,000, and also released the fourth earl from the covenant to retain unsold the lands named in the 7th clause of the covenant in the deed of 1885, as well as from the power of revocation reserved in the same deed.

The third earl died on the 9th of October, 1894.

The average net income of the property comprised in the deed of the 19th of October, 1885, was before, as well after, the 26th of September, 1894, very considerably in excess of £4,000.

The fourth earl paid estate duty upon the value of the mansion house of Howick and the effects therein only.

The information claimed that estate duty was payable upon the value of the whole of the property comprised in the deed of the 19th of October, 1885, as property passing on the death of the third Earl Grey within the meaning of sections 1 and 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, and having regard to section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889.

Section 2 (1) (2) of the Finance Act, 1894, provides that property passing on the death of the deceased, which is by section 1 declared to be chargeable with a graduated estate duty, shall be deemed to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as to personal property, and the words "voluntary" and "voluntarily" and a reference to a "volunteer" were omitted therefrom.

Section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, provides (inter alia): "(1) Stamp duties at the like rates as are by this Act charged on affidavits and inventories shall be charged and paid on accounts delivered of the personal or moveable property to be included therein according to the value thereof; (2) The personal or moveable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions—viz., (a) Any property taken as a donatio mortis causâ made by any person dying on or after the 1st of June, 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition, made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise which shall not have been bonâ fide made three months before the death of the deceased.

"(c) Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after such day by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right, by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself, or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property."

Section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, amends section 38 as follows: "The description of property marked (a) shall be read as if the word 'twelve' were substituted for the word 'three' therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bonâ fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained, to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

Sir Richard Webster, A.G. (Sir Robert Finlay, S.G., and Danckwerts with him).—This property is chargeable with estate duty because (1) bonâ fide possession of it was not assumed by the fourth Earl Grey to the entire exclusion of the third earl; (2) there was an express reservation of an interest to the third earl; (3) an express power of revocation was reserved: Attorney-General v. Worrall, 43 W. R. 118, [1895] 1 Q. B. 99. The deed of the 26th of September, 1894, too late in any case, could not alter the effect of the deed of 1885.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Bremner, for the respondent.—Reservation of an interest does not render the whole of the property chargeable, but only renders it chargeable to the extent of the interest reserved. The scheme of the Acts was to impose duty on the actual benefit which accrued on the death of the deceased. This was in the present case £4,000 a year. The power of revocation was a limited one and not of the sort contemplated by section 38, which was a general power.

GRANTHAM, J. (whose judgment proceeded upon the terms of the deed), was of opinion that the property was not handed over to the present Earl Grey to the entire exclusion of the late earl and without reservation, and he was also of opinion that a power of revocation was reserved within the meaning of section 38 (2) (c) of the Act of 1881.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should be inclined myself to accede to most of the argument of Mr. Cozens-Hardy and Mr. Bremner if

I thought it was applicable to the particular case. It seems to me it is not. I think that you may probably separate the property where it is all given in one gift. Mr. Cozens-Hardy says that the fair reading of section 38 (2) (c) is that it applies to the extent to which a benefit is reserved. I am inclined to think that that is right so far as it means, to the extent of the property in which a benefit is reserved. Accordingly, taking Mr. Bremner's case of the twenty houses and an interest reserved in one, I should be inclined to think—it is not this case, and therefore I do not formally adjudicate upon it—I say, I should be inclined to think that in that case it would only be the one house upon which the duty would be payable; but it seems to me here that there is an interest reserved in the entirety of the property, and certainly there is a power of revocation reserved as to the entirety of the property, and although the power of revocation is conditional upon certain events happening, it is not the less a power of revocation within the meaning of the express words of the statute.

The point that Mr. Cozens-Hardy and Mr. Bremner made depends really upon the construction of section 38 (2) (c) of the Act of 1881. It says, "any property passing," and so on, "whereby an interest in such property" is reserved, and I think that that would be divisible. It would not be enough to have an interest in some part of the property. The words are "in such property," and I do not think it ought to be read as an interest in some part of the property.

Here the £4,000 was clearly reserved in the whole of the property, and certainly the power of revocation was. On these grounds it seems to me that the arguments of the learned counsel for the respondent are probably correct, but that they do not apply to the facts of the present case.

"THE CHIOGGIA." (a.)

Ship—Bottomry—Necessaries—Bond on ship, freight, and cargo paid out of proceeds of ship and freight in priority to necessaries.

The master of an Italian vessel obtained in 1896 at an English port necessaries for the ship, and in 1897, being in distress for want of funds at a British Colonial port, there executed a valid bottomry bond on ship, freight, and cargo, binding himself personally by the bond. The vessel arrived in safety at her port of destination in England, but the bond not being paid, the assignees thereof instituted an action of bottomry against the vessel, her freight, and cargo, and an action of necessaries was on the same day instituted by the suppliers of the necessaries against the vessel and her freight in respect of the necessaries supplied as above mentioned. The proceeds of the ship and freight were insufficient to pay the wages of the crew, the master's wages, the bondholder's claim, and the claims in respect of necessaries.

Held, that, after payment of the sums due for the wages of the crew and master, the bondholder had a right to exhaust the proceeds of the ship and freight in paying his claim in priority to the claims of the suppliers of the necessaries, and that the latter could not require the ship, freight, and cargo to be marshalled for their benefit.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a question of priorities.

During the months of January and April, 1896, the Goole Ropery and Ship Chandlery Co. (Limited) and Messrs. Leathanor, Pew, & Co., by the order of the master of the Italian barque Chioggia, supplied necessaries to that vessel when she was lying in the port of Goole to the amount of £245 17s. 7d. Subsequently The Chioggia, being on a voyage from Demerara to Liverpool, was compelled to put in distress into the port of St. George, Bermuda, and her master on the 9th of April, 1897, being without funds or credit, after communication with his owners and the owners of the cargo, borrowed at Hamilton, Bermuda, on bottomry of ship, freight, and cargo, the sum of £1,581 12s. 6d., at a maritime premium of 20 per cent., binding himself, his executors and administrators, for payment of the bond.

On the 1st of June, 1897, The Chioggia, having safely arrived at Liverpool and the bond not having been paid in due course, a bottomry action was instituted on behalf of the assignees of the bond—the Association for the Preservation of Commercial Interests as respects Wrecked and Damaged Property—the London Salvage Association—and Charles Augustus Crafer against The Chioggia, her freight and cargo, claiming the sum of £2,200 as the amount due to them under the bottomry bond and for costs. In this action the ship and a portion of her cargo were arrested and an undertaking was given by the owners of the cargo not arrested, who had appeared as defendants, to bring the freight into court and to pay such amount as they should be liable for.

On the same 1st of June, 1897, an action of necessaries was instituted on behalf of the Goole Ropery and Ship Chandlery Co. (Limited) and Messrs. Leathanor, Pew, & Co. in respect of the supply of the above-mentioned necessaries against The Chioggia and her freight, and in this action the plaintiffs claimed judgment for the sum of £245 17s. 7d. and costs.

On the 4th of June, 1897, it was ordered that certain amounts paid or to be paid by the owners of the cargo for pilotage, towage in docking, boatmen, reporting inwards, dock dues and light dues, and the cost of discharging, should be deducted from the freight before it was paid into court; and on the next day the balance of freight, less the costs of paying the same into court, amounting to £372 4s. 2d., was paid into court.

On the 15th of June, 1897, the solicitors for the bondholders delivered their statement of claim in the bottomry action praying that the court would pronounce for the validity of the bond, and that the sum of £1,897 1s. 9d. was still due on it; would condemn the defendants and The Chioggia and her freight in that amount with interest; and would also give the plaintiffs judgment against The Chioggia, her freight and her owners, for the sum of £106 8s. 8d. being the amount due to the crew of the vessel for wages, and which amount the plaintiffs, the bottomry bondholders, had paid under an order of the court allowing them to stand in the shoes of the persons to whom such wages were originally due.

On the 24th of June the Goole Ropery and Chandlery Co. and Augustus Crafer intervened in the action of bottomry and subsequently delivered a defence in which they alleged that they had reason to believe that the proceeds of The Chioggia and her freight would be insufficient to satisfy the claims of the plaintiff and the interveners, and therefore, if the plaintiffs should obtain judgment pronouncing for the validity of the bottomry bond, the interveners would at the trial ask the court to marshall the assets—viz., ship, cargo, and freight—and to order that the interveners' claim be first paid out of the proceeds of the ship and freight, and that the plaintiffs' claim be paid out of the balance of such proceeds and out of the proceeds of the cargo.

No appearance was entered in either action for the owners of The Chioggia or in the bottomry action for the portion of cargo (certain sails) arrested in that suit, and as against the owners of the ship and the owners of the portion of the cargo so arrested the proceedings was carried on by default.

On the 12th of July, 1897, the action of bottomry was heard, and the court pronounced for the force and validity of the bottomry bond proceeded on in that action, together with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the time the said bond became due until payment thereof with costs, and condemned the vessel Chioggia, the portion of cargo then under arrest, and also the defendants, the owners of the rest of the cargo now or lately laden on board the said vessel, and the freight remaining in court, in the sum of £1,897 19s. 6d., the amount due of the said bond and in the aforesaid interest and costs, but without prejudice to other claims against the said vessel; and also condemned the said ship and freight in the sum of £106 8s. 8d., the amount of wages paid by the plaintiffs to the crew of the said vessel. The court also reserved all questions of priority as to payment of such claims, and decreed the said cargo then under arrest to be appraised and sold.

In pursuance of this order The Chioggia and the portion of cargo under arrest was appraised and sold, and after deducting the expenses of sale the net proceeds were paid into court, the amount of the net proceeds of the ship so paid into court being £204 12s. The master of The Chioggia not having been paid his wages, also intervened as a defendant in the bottomry action.

October 26, 1897.—The action of necessaries (in which the plaintiffs in the bottomry action had intervened as defendants) came on for hearing before the judge, Barnes, J., together with a motion on behalf of the plaintiffs in the bottomry suit, that the sum of £576 16s. 10d. in court in that action, being the proceeds of the ship Chioggia and the freight, paid in under the order of court of the 4th of June, 1897, might be paid out to the solicitors of the bondholders: that thereout the bondholders might reimburse themselves the sum £106 8s. 8d. paid by them as wages to the crew as above-mentioned, and pay to the master of The Chioggia the sum of £101 in respect of his wages, &c., and to the Italian consul at Liverpool the sum of £10 0s. 3d. claimed by him as due to the Invalid Seamen Fund, and that the balance of the said amount in court after payment of the said amounts—viz., £359 6s. 6d., might be applied in part satisfaction of the amount due to the plaintiffs (bondholders) under the judgment herein for the amount of the bottomry bond with interests and costs in priority to the claim for necessaries, and that the costs of the motion be costs in the action.

Balloch, for the plaintiffs in the bottomry action, in support of the motion.—The amounts paid for the wages of the crew and the master must be admittedly first paid out of the proceeds in court (The Edward Oliver, L. R. 1 A. & E. 379, 15 W. R. Adm. Dig. 27; The Daring, L. R. 2 A. & E. 260, 16 W. R. Adm. Dig. 22) but after these claims are satisfied the remaining proceeds must be applied towards payment pro tanto of the bottomry bond interest and costs, and until this be done the bondholders have no right to claim anything from the defendants the owners of cargo: The Constancia, 2 Wm. Rob. 404, 460, 464; The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. 240; The Prince Regent, cited 2 Wm. Rob. pp. 84, 85; The Priscilla, Lush. 1, 8 W. R. Adm. Dig. 20.

Butler Aspinall, for the claimants for necessaries intervening in the bottomry action.—The claimants for necessaries are entitled to a judgment in default against The Chioggia and her freight,* and assuming them to have obtained this judgment, they, on the principles on which the cases of The Edward Oliver, The Daring, and The Eugenie, L. R. 4 A. & E. 123, were decided, are entitled to rank against the proceeds of The Chioggia and her freight in priority to the bondholders, who can resort to three funds—viz., The Chioggia, her freight, and her cargo.

He referred to Williams & Bruce Admiralty Practice, 68, 69; White & Tudor Leading Cases in Equity, notes to Aldrich v. Cooper.

Balloch, in reply.—This is not a case of marshalling as in The Eugènie, 21 W. R. 957, L. R. 4 A. & E. 123, and other cases cited. In the first place the necessaries' claimants have no maritime lien; and secondly, the cargo-owners are entirely strangers to the claims for necessaries, which were incurred before the cargo was loaded, and there can be no equity compelling them to have the assets marshalled and indirectly themselves pay these claims.

He referred to Ex parte Kendall, 17 Ves. 514; Snell's Principles of Equity, p. 292.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 8.—BARNES, J.—This is a motion by bottomry bondholders for payment out of court to them of the net proceeds of the Italian ship Chioggia and her freight, and that they may be at liberty thereout to reimburse themselves the sum of £106 8s. 8d. paid by them to the crew for wages, and to pay the master £101, and the Italian consul £10 1s. 8d., and to apply the residue in part satisfaction of the judgment recovered by them in respect of their bond. The motion is supported by the owners of the cargo, but is opposed by the Goole Ropery and Ship Chandlery Co. (Limited) and others, who have supplied necessaries to the said vessel, and obtained judgment against the ship and freight in respect thereof. The bond was given on ship, freight, and cargo whilst the vessel was on a voyage from Demerara to Liverpool on the 9th of April, 1897. After the vessel arrived at Liverpool an action was instituted by the bondholders against the ship and freight and cargo, in which an order was made that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to pay the wages and the amounts legally due to the crew, and to take over their rights; and in pursuance of this order the plaintiffs have paid the crew's wages, amounting to £106 8s. 8d. Judgment was obtained on the 12th of July last in this action for £1,897 19s. 6d. against the ship and freight and the owners of the cargo, who had given an undertaking in respect of the cargo, but all questions of priorities were reserved. The necessaries above-mentioned were supplied at Goole in January and April, 1896, before the vessel sailed for Demerara. Judgment was obtained on the 26th of October last against the proceeds of the ship and freight for the sum of £245 17s. 7d., subject to questions as to priority. The ship has been sold by the marshal, and the net proceeds of the ship and freight, after deducting the marshal's expenses, are £576 16s. 10d. The cargo was of the value of £2,052 10s. 9d.

The suppliers of the necessaries have no maritime lien upon the ship and freight, but, having recovered judgment against these interests, they contend that they have a right to have the assets marshalled in their favour, as they have only the ship and freight to look to, whilst the bondholders have the security of ship, freight, and cargo. The value of the ship, freight, and cargo appears to me enough to meet all the claims and costs. The cargo-owners, in whose interests the case was argued by Mr. Balloch, contend, however, that the bondholders have a prior right to the proceeds of the ship and freight, as against the necessaries' men, and must exhaust these proceeds before coming on the cargo, and that if the assets are marshalled the effect will be to compel the cargo-owners to pay the claim of the necessaries' men, with which they have no concern. Several cases were cited by counsel, but they do not seem to have much bearing upon the present question.

It was not disputed that the claim of the bondholders has priority over that of the necessaries' men, nor that the cargo cannot be made subject to the payment of the bond until the proceeds of the ship and freight have been exhausted, but the contention of the necessaries' men, as above indicated, was that the bondholders, having two funds upon which they could claim—namely, the proceeds of the ship and freight on the one hand, and the cargo on the other, whilst the necessaries' men can only claim against the proceeds of the ship and freight, the latter ought, according to the doctrine of marshalling, to be paid out of the last-mentioned proceeds. But marshalling should not be permitted to the prejudice of third persons. According to equitable doctrines, in order to marshal, not only should there be two creditors of the same person, but one of them should have two funds belonging to the same person to which he can resort. In the present case the two funds belong to different persons—namely, the ship-owners and cargo-owners respectively, and in my opinion the necessaries' men have no right of marshalling. They have no equity to have the claims adjusted so as to compel the cargo-owner in fact to provide the means of discharging the claim for necessaries.

The case of The Edward Oliver, L. R. 1 A. & E. 379, 15 W. R. Adm. Dig. 27, which was principally relied on by the counsel for the necessaries' men, does not apply, although the effect of that decision was to compel the cargo-owners to pay a balance which was greater by the exact sum paid to the master out of the proceeds of ship and freight. The master had a maritime lien upon those proceeds for the amount of his claim, and it was merely decided that the rule that a master who has bound himself, as well as the ship and freight, for the payment of a bottomry bond, is not entitled to payment of his own claim in priority to that of the bondholders, cannot be invoked by the cargo-owners, and will not be acted upon where the bondholder will not be prejudiced by the master being paid before him. The net proceeds in court—£576 16s. 10d.—must, in my opinion, be paid out to the bondholders, and thereout they must be directed to repay themselves the said sum of £106 8s. 8d., and to pay to the master the said sum of £101, and to the Italian consul £10 1s. 8d. on proof to the registrar that these sums are due, and to apply the balance in discharge, pro tanto, of the amount due under their judgment on their bottomry claim.

BADISCHE ANILIN UND SODA FABRIK v. BASLE CHEMICAL WORKS, BINDSCHEDLER. (a.)

Patent — Infringement — Patent applicable to United Kingdom only—Infringing goods sent to England—Order from English purchaser.

A manufacturer of goods abroad which are an infringement of a patent applicable to the United Kingdom alone, who sends these goods by post to an English customer in compliance with his order to so send them, does not infringe the patent for the United Kingdom, for in such a case the sale and delivery take place outside this country.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (45 W. R. 481, [1897] 2 Ch. 322) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in the action from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ.; Rigby, L.J., dissenting): 45 W. R. 481, [1897] 2 Ch. 322; reversing a decision of North, J.

The facts are set out in the report below, and shortly they are as follows:

The appellant company were the owners of a valid patent applicable only to the United Kingdom.

The respondent Bindschedler, a Swiss subject, who traded under the name of the "Basle Chemical Works, Bindschedler," was a chemical manufacturer at Basle in Switzerland, and in compliance with orders given him by post by Johnson & Co., drysalters in London, sent to them by post through forwarding agents in Basle certain goods which infringed the appellants' patent.

The appellant company took proceedings to restrain the respondent and Johnson & Co. from infringing the patent rights of the appellants; and Johnson & Co. submitted to an order, and eventually North, J., granted an injunction against the respondent which was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

The plaintiff company appealed.

Moulton, Q.C., Cripps, Q.C., and Lawson, for the appellants.

Asquith, Q.C., Upjohn, Q.C., and Roskill, for the respondents, were not called on.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—In this case it appears to me that the question which is raised admits of a very simple solution. The person against whom this process is asked for, is a Swiss subject living in Basle, and it cannot be doubted that unless he has done some act in this country no process could or ought to be issued against him.

The allegation upon which the process is sought is that he has used, vended, or exercised in this country a patented article. It is quite certain that he has not done so himself by his own hand; therefore the only question is whether he has been a party to it in any sense which makes his act one of the acts prohibited by our law in this country. The facts are very simple. A person wrote from this country to have a certain quantity of a patented article sent by post to him in London. I pass over the intermediate point between the maker and the vendor in Basle, and I will assume for the purpose of what I have to say that it was to be directly sent by post by the present defendant. The fact that the sale was completed by delivery cannot be doubted—these were goods sold and delivered. Shortly stated, the question is, where the delivery took place. I have stated all that in fact took place with reference to the correspondence and the agreement to purchase, and then, inasmuch as it is admitted that the defendant did not himself bring into this country the patented article, I do not understand how it can be possibly otherwise put than that he did it by someone else, according to the perfectly familiar legal maxim. That brings us to the question of who it was that did bring it into this country. It was ingeniously suggested that you have nothing to do with the relationship between the parties; the question is said to be: "Who caused it to be brought? You have nothing to do with what character the bringer filled." My answer to that is, that that is the whole question: "What character did the bringer fill; was he the agent of the seller to bring; or was he the agent of the buyer to bring the article to him?" The facts have all been stated, and it appears that the seller sent, in pursuance of the order from the buyer, to a particular carrier named—I say a particular carrier named, because the post-office is but a carrier after all; whatever municipal regulations there may be made about the carriage of letters, the post-office is simply a carrier of parcels like any other carrier. In this particular case, therefore, there is a named carrier who, by the direction of the buyer, receives the goods on behalf of the buyer. It is not necessary that the carrier should have been named. If, according to the ordinary course of delivery, the carrier would be the person who would receive it, that would be just as good, for the purpose of the argument, as if the carrier had been actually named; but we have not to consider that question here, because the carrier is named. Then for what reason am I to depart from the well-known and recognized principle of law that, under these circumstances, when goods are delivered by the order of the buyer to a named carrier, from that moment the goods vest in the buyer? It is said, "Oh, you have nothing to do with the question of whether a change of property takes place or not." Why not? You must look behind the rule of law and see the reason for it. The reason for it is that at that moment, according to the course of carriage, or here, according to the specific directions, that is a delivery to the buyer. That is the reason; and, therefore, if you once assume that the delivery in Basle was a delivery to the buyer, what pretence is there for saying that this was an act done in this country by the seller, when the whole thing—the purchase and the delivery—took place in Switzerland? It seems to me that that is decisive of the question. I am myself, I confess, not impressed by the reference either to Reg. v. Coombes, 1 Leach C. C. 388, or to the hypothetical cases put of the chute or the throwing of patented articles over the border between two places close to each other. With reference to Coombes' case, I think one may say that there is a confusion of thought between the technical rules of criminal venue and the question who is the person doing the act; but apart from such a comment as that, there is this obvious distinction between all those three cases and this—that the act is completed by the person who is assumed to be the author of the act in each of the cases so propounded, but here there is this difference, that an intelligent acting agent is interposed between the person who sells in Switzerland and the person who carries away from Switzerland to England. In order to make the analogy complete, you must have some person or another in Coombes' case to help the bullet on to its destination, or, in the other case, to suck it down as Smith, L.J., puts it, or to put it on some place where the natural course of gravitation would bring it down apart from any other act by anyone else. I think that these are rather fanciful suggestions because the real substantial question here is, What jurisdiction have we over an act which is done in Switzerland by a Swiss subject, and which, in all that is done, is (it cannot be doubted) an act within the jurisdiction of the Swiss courts, if there were any patent law applicable to it, but is not within our jurisdiction at all? With reference to the comments of North, J., who, in the first instance, granted the relief that was prayed, the fallacy which I cannot help thinking runs through the whole of his lordship's reasoning is this: He starts with the assumption that an illegal act is being done, and that, according to the familiar legal maxim, the defendants are parties to that illegal act, and that, therefore, if you catch them here, you may assail them by process. The answer is, that there was no illegal act done upon the hypothesis which I have adopted. It was perfectly lawful for this defendant to sell in Basle. It was perfectly lawful for this defendant to deliver in Basle; and, if I am right, the sale and delivery both took place outside of our jurisdiction. Of course, it is easy to represent, by various and lengthened links of causation, that the defendant, in one sense, caused it to be brought to this country. So he did. So did the man who manufactured the article in the factory at Basle, in that sense. But then, according to another equally familiar maxim of the law, it is the proximate and not the remote cause that is looked at for legal purposes.

Under these circumstances, it seems to me that there is no pretence for this action, and I entirely concur with Lindley and Smith, L.JJ., that if the facts had been properly ascertained at the time that this writ was allowed to be served out of the jurisdiction, it ought not to have been served; and that if the defendant had thought proper to make an application to set aside the service, that application ought to have been granted.

Under these circumstances I move your lordships that the judgment be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord Herschell.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and if it were not for the difference of opinion which there has been in the courts below, I should have said that this was a very clear case indeed. The appellants (the plaintiffs in this case) have to make out that the defendant made, used, exercised, or vended a patent article, or that which was patented, in this country. Our patent law does not extend beyond this country. Acts which here would be infringements of the patent, are no infringement if they are done in a country which is not within the ambit of the patent. In this case the only contention is that the defendant used the patented article in this country. It is admitted that it was sold and delivered in Switzerland; everything, therefore, that is necessary to the constitution of the vending took place there.

But it is said that, although sold abroad, it was transmitted from abroad after the sale to the purchaser in this country, and that, whilst being so conveyed in this country, there was a using of the patent in this country. Now, the defendant himself did not so convey it, nor did any agent on his behalf so convey it. The admitted facts establish that the post office authorities and the railway company, who, in fact, conveyed it, were acting in so conveying it, not on behalf of the defendant, but on behalf of the purchaser; and they were not even carrying the property of the defendant, they were carrying the property of the purchaser.

Under these circumstances, it is impossible to say that anything that was done in this country was done either by the defendant or by an agent of the defendant. But Mr. Moulton says, "What a very slight difference. If the purchaser had not directed it to be sent by post and the post-office had been selected by the seller, the defendant, then the case would have been altogether different. What difference can there be if he put it in the post because the purchaser has selected the post, instead of himself selecting it? In each case it is equally carried by the impulse of the seller to this country and through this country." I think that the answer is a very simple one. In the one case you could show that the persons carrying it in this country and delivering it here were agents of the defendant, and that, therefore, he was responsible for their acts. In the other case you cannot show that the persons carrying it in this country and delivering it here were agents of the defendant, and that he is responsible for their acts. You may say that that is a very slight difference, but it is a vital difference, for in the one case you can establish agency, and in the other case you cannot. But in my opinion the difference goes deeper than that. If the sale had not been completed under the contract by delivery in Basle, but if the goods were according to the order to be delivered by the seller in England, the sale would not have been constituted and complete in Switzerland. Until the goods had been delivered in London there would have been no sale. The property in the goods would not have passed to the purchaser, they would still have been the vendor's goods, and the vendor could not have demanded the price of them from the purchaser because the sale was not complete. In that case I apprehend the vending would have been in England, and it would have been impossible for him to get out of the charge, whatever process you used against him, of vending in England, when there was no completed sale constituted except by reason of an act done by him through his agents in England. Therefore, in that case, I think that he would have brought himself within the charge of vending in England, but I do not think that it would have been because he was using the patented article in England by having it carried from one place to another. The truth would have been that, in that case, he was vending it in England because there was no complete sale until he had done that act in England. If that was so, there is a distinction, an absolutely vital distinction, between the case put and the present case. I only desire to add this: supposing that a case of vending could not be established, that no part of the sale was constituted in this country, and that the only charge possible were a charge of using, I do not intend to express any opinion, but I desire distinctly to reserve my opinion whether the mere transport from place to place in this country of a patented article would necessarily be a using in this country. There are some very pertinent observations on the subject by James, L.J., in Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jones, 30 W. R. 294, 17 Ch. D. 721; in that case he pointed out that it might be that the warehouse-keeper who warehoused the goods could be said to use the patented article because the very object of the patent was to make the storing and carriage of that particular article safe (it was a form of dynamite), and therefore the warehouse-keeper who stored it might be said to be using the patent, not merely because he had got the patented article in his warehouse, but because he had got the advantage, having it in his warehouse, of storing there an article which he could not have stored safely but for its patented condition. That, according to James, L.J.'s, suggestion, might be using the patented article. In the same way there are other cases in which the article is, when applied in a particular way, of itself serving the purpose for which it is patented. Those are cases in which it may be that the mere possession, transport, or warehousing of the patented article may amount to a using of it, but it by no means follows that in a case where the person transporting it or warehousing it gets no advantage out of the patent—that is to say, where it can be no more easily and no more safely and no more advantageously carried, warehoused, or stored than if the article were not a patented one, but were an article entirely outside the patent—it by no means follows that the transporting from place to place, or otherwise dealing with the patented article in that sort of way would constitute a using. I do not desire to decide that point now, but I desire to draw attention to that distinction, because it was strongly urged—and, indeed, it seems to have been rather assumed in the court below—that although the sale was entirely outside the kingdom, if the act of transport within the United Kingdom could be brought home to the defendant, that would make out a use in the United Kingdom. If such a case should arise, I desire to reserve complete freedom of action with regard to that point.

I should like to add one word, that with all that the Lord Chancellor said about Coombes' case and its application to this case I entirely agree.

Lords MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, and SHAND concurred.

Lord DAVEY.—I entirely concur in the conclusion your lordships have arrived at, and in the reasons for that conclusion which have been given by Smith, L.J., in the Court of Appeal and by your lordships. If the appellants could have made out that the goods were contracted to be, and were, delivered in London, I think, as at present advised, that that would have been a vending in this country within the meaning of the Patent Act. In my opinion, there was no delivery in London, and nothing was done by the respondent in this country. Like Lord Herschell, I desire to express no opinion upon the nice question which might have arisen under other circumstances, but in my opinion does not arise in the circumstances of this case.

County court—Practice—Appeal—Action where the debt or damage claimed does not exceed £20—Injunction—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120.

In an action for trespass brought in a county court, where the damage claimed did not exceed £20, the plaintiff recovered 6d. damages and was granted an injunction restraining the defendant from continuing the trespass.

Held, that an appeal lay from the injunction.

Appeal from a county court.

The action was brought for trespass. The plaintiff claimed £2 damages and an injunction restraining the defendant from continuing the trespass. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff with 6d. damages, and granted the injunction. No leave to appeal was granted.

The County Courts Act, 1888, s. 120, provides: "If any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity . . . the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision, or order of the judge may appeal from the same to the High Court . . . provided always that there shall be no appeal in any action of contract or tort . . . where the debt or damages claimed does not exceed twenty pounds . . . unless the judge shall think it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be allowed, and grant leave to appeal."

Howland Roberts, for the respondent.—There is no appeal without the leave of the judge. The cause of action is tort, and, as the damages claimed are less than £20, it comes within the proviso of section 120. The injunction was not a separate cause of action. It was one of the remedies for the tort: Martin v. Bannister, 27 W. R. 421, 28 Ib. 143, 4 Q. B. D. 491.

Duke, for the appellant.—The injunction is an equitable matter. Section 120 gives a right of appeal in every case of a point of equity, and the proviso, which only deals with common law actions, does not apply in the case of points of equity. The injunction only is appealed against, the trespass and damages having been admitted.

DAY, J.—As you are only appealing against the injunction you may proceed.

LAWRANCE, J., concurred, and the appeal was proceeded with.

MILLARD v. WASTALL. (a.)

Public health—Nuisance—Black smoke—Notice—Public Health Act, 1875, s. 94.

A notice under section 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, requiring a person to abate a nuisance of black smoke, is good notwithstanding it omits to state what works and things are required to be executed and done in order to abate the nuisance.

Cases stated by justices.

The respondent was summoned under section 95 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for non-compliance with a notice, served on him, requiring him to abate a nuisance caused by a chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke.

The preliminary objection to the summons was taken that the notice did not state the works and things required to be executed and done in order to abate the nuisance.

The summons was thereupon dismissed.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 94, provides: "On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act or default or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues . . . requiring him to abate the same within a time to be specified in the notice and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose. . . ."

F. Lowe, for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

DAY, J.—It is not necessary for the notice to state the works required to be done in such a case as the present. The local authority are not in all cases bound to invent works. In the present case black smoke, discharged from the respondent's chimney, caused a nuisance, all that was necessary was for him to use coal which did not give off black smoke or to treat the fire in such a way as to avoid committing the nuisance.

LAWRANCE, J.—I agree. It is clear that the passage in section 94 referring to works and things to be executed or done could not apply to all the instances of nuisances given in section 91; for example, to a nuisance caused by keeping animals. It is no more necessary to order works to be done when a chimney smokes than when a person keeps a pig so as to cause a nuisance.

Appeal dismissed.

ALLEN v. FLOOD AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Master and servant—Trades union—Procuring dismissal of servant—Intention to injure—Malice—Motive—Cause of action.

Outside the criminal law an act lawful in itself does not cease to be so, no matter how reprehensible the motive for doing it may be. The existence of a bad motive is therefore immaterial when considering whether an act is a civil wrong or not.

To induce employers, therefore, to dismiss their workmen, and not to employ them in future, in consequence of which the workmen suffer loss, is not, where no breach of contract is involved, a wrongful act, whatever the motive for doing it may be.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 W. R. 453, [1895] 2 Q. B. 21) reversed (Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Lords Ashbourne and Morris dissenting).

Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East 574*n*; Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 E. & B. 216; and Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 565, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, considered.

This was an appeal by Allen, one of the defendants in the action, from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.) reported under the name of Flood v. Allen, 43 W. R. 453, [1895] 2 Q. B. 21, refusing an application by the appellant for a new trial of an action tried before Kennedy, J., with a jury, or for judgment, and affirming the decision of that judge on further consideration.

The facts and evidence will be found at some length in some of their lordships' judgments. Shortly the facts are as follows: The action was brought by two members of the Shipwrights' Union against three members of the United Society of Boilermakers and Iron Ship Builders. The plaintiffs Flood and Taylor (the present respondents) alleged that the defendant Allen, and the defendants Jackson and Knight, maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiffs, procured and induced the Glengall Iron Co. to dismiss the plaintiffs from their employment, and not to engage or employ them in future. The plaintiffs were workmen engaged by the day to do wood-work at the Glengall Iron Co.'s works, and were recognized as being men who had some time previously been doing ironwork in another yard. The boilermakers in the yard reported this, and finally Allen, the local delegate of their union and present appellant, went to the managing director of the Glengall Iron Co. and stated, in effect, that, unless the plaintiffs were discharged all the members of the Boilermakers' Union then being employed by the company would be called out and cease to work. The plaintiffs were therefore discharged by the company. At the trial of the action before Kennedy, J., and a jury, the latter, in answer to certain questions, found that Allen maliciously induced the company to discharge the plaintiffs, and also not to re-engage them, and they gave £20 damages to each plaintiff. Upon further consideration the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £40 against Allen, and his judgment was sustained by the Court of Appeal.

Against these decisions Allen appealed.

The case was twice argued. On the further argument, which began towards the end of March, 1897, Lord Ashbourne and Lord James of Hereford were present. The judges were summoned, and after taking time to consider the question left to them, which was "Assuming the evidence given by the plaintiffs' witnesses to be correct, was there any evidence of a cause of action fit to be left to the jury?" delivered their opinions to the House in June, 1897. Hawkins, Cave, North, Wills, Grantham, and Lawrance, JJ., answered in the affirmative; Mathew and Wright, JJ., in the negative.

Cohen, Q.C., and Robson, Q.C. (E. Morten with them), for the appellant.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Rufus Isaacs, for the respondents.

The arguments and cases are dealt with in the judgments.

The House took time for consideration.

Dec. 14.—Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case the two plaintiffs sued three persons as defendants for having maliciously and wrongfully, and with intent to injure the plaintiffs, intimidated and coerced the employers, videlicet, a certain company called the Glengall Iron Co., to break contracts and not to enter into contracts with them, whereby the plaintiffs had suffered damage.

I have compendiously stated the cause of action, as I conceive it to be, in order to discuss by itself the main and important principle which is at stake in the determination of this appeal; but I shall return to the question of the pleadings and to the course of the trial before Kennedy, J., since it appears to me that some confusion has been created by not keeping separate, objections directed to those subordinate parts of the appeal, from the cause of action itself as I have stated it.

The two plaintiffs were shipwrights, and were working in their trade on board a vessel called The Sam Weller. The vessel was being repaired, and the two plaintiffs were engaged by the Glengall Iron Co. to work at their trade in the repair of the vessel.

I think there is much to be said for the doubt thrown out by Hawkins, J., in his elaborate and most able opinion, whether the assumption was accurate on which both parties conducted the case—namely, that there was no contractual relation between the employers and employed so as to bring into debate the question of whether there was any inducement offered to the Glengall Iron Co. to break contracts with the plaintiffs. But for the present I will assume that there was no contract by which the company were bound to keep the plaintiffs in their service till the repairs of the vessel were completed, while on the other hand there was no reasonable doubt that but for what was done by the defendant they would have been kept at work until the termination of the repairs.

I am not concerned to discuss minutely the evidence where the witnesses are in conflict, or where it may be contended that the witnesses relied on by the plaintiffs have exaggerated or misunderstood what was said by the defendant. Such questions were for the jury, and if there was any reasonable evidence for them it was for them, and not for me or for anyone else, to decide.

The plaintiffs gave evidence that while thus employed the defendant Allen came to the responsible manager of the Glengall Iron Co. and made certain communications (which I will deal with presently, because upon the character of those communications much depends), and that in consequence of those communications they were discharged from their employment. As to the one being the consequence of the other, although in a certain sense it is still a question of fact, I confess I am surprised in no small degree to hear a doubt suggested that it was not in consequence of the communications made by Allen that the plaintiffs were discharged. One of the officers of the defendant company, it is true, explains that it was for peace and quietness in the yard, but though his words are accompanied by such expressions as these I should have thought no one could have seriously doubted that what he meant (and, indeed, I think what he said), in the ordinary intelligible use of language, was that he discharged them because he could not have the work in his yard interrupted. I confess I am wholly unable to understand what is stated by some of your lordships, that the men were not discharged by reason of anything that Allen said, and that the boilermakers would have ceased working even if Allen had said nothing. This is not the evidence, and what is more important it is in the teeth of the express finding of the jury in answer to Kennedy, J.'s, question, as I will presently show.

And in truth if this were accurate there would be nothing to discuss since in that case Allen would have done nothing that caused any damage to anyone.

And now I will quote as nearly as I can the language which is alleged to have been used by Allen in his communications. I quote first what was stated by Mr. Halkett, who was the managing director of the Glengall Iron Co. Allen said: "He had received word from some of the boilermakers that were working in our yard that they wanted to see him, and he came round and had an interview with these men, and they told him that we had two shipwrights engaged in our employment who were known to have done ironwork before in Mills & Knight's yard, and that unless these two men were discharged from our employment that day all the ironworkers belonging to his society would leave off work that day, and they gave as the only reason that these men were guilty of doing ironwork in Mills & Knight's yard. . . . The substance of what he said was that they were really trying to put an end to this practice of doing ironwork by the shipwrights, to stop shipwrights being engaged in ironwork. That it was not from any ill-feeling against ourselves nor against any men in particular—Flood and Taylor; but they—that is, the boilermakers—had made up their minds—or we have made up our minds—that wherever it is known that any shipwrights have been engaged doing ironwork, their workmen—that is, the boilermakers—would cease work on the same ship on the same employment."

Then a question was asked: "Did he say anything in regard to Flood and Taylor in respect of other yards besides yours?" and the answer was: "Not in a particular sense—in a general sense that these men would be followed—that these men were known—it was so difficult to get them known; that these men were known, and wherever these men were employed the same action would be taken there as had been taken in our place." He also said: "You have no option. If you continue to engage these men our men will leave. . . . It was in consequence of that that the men were discharged. It was the fear of the threat being carried out—of the men leaving—the boilermakers. If the boilermakers had left or had been called out it would seriously have impeded our business. . . . The threat to withdraw these ironworkers extended to every workman we had in our employment at whatever place." He goes on to say (after an embarrassing interruption) that "the threat was to withdraw the ironworkers in the employment of the Glengall Iron Co. from every ship or every job upon which the Glengall Iron Co. were engaged on which the men of their union were employed"

Mr. Edmonds, the foreman of the Glengall Iron Co., deposed as follows: "Mr. Allen has come here, and says that if those two men"—that is, Flood and Taylor—"are not discharged, all of the ironmen will knock off work or be called out. I will not be sure what term he used. I asked Mr. Allen the reason why. He said because those two men have been working at Messrs. Mills & Knight's on ironworks. I told him I thought it was very arbitrary on his part to do anything like that. I told him I thought it was not right that Messrs. Mills & Knight's sins should be visited upon us."

"Q.—Did anything else take place?

"A.—For the reason that we were not employing the shipwrights on ironwork, and never had done so—not at the Glengall. There was a lot of other conversation, but that is not material to this case. He says that was the case, and if these men were not discharged their men would be called out or 'knocked off.' I will not be sure what term he used. Me and Mr. Allen had a few words, but that is immaterial to this. I think that is all that is material to this case.

"Q.—Was anything said about other yards?

"A.—Yes. When I spoke about it not being right to visit Mills & Knight's sins on us, he said the men would be called out from any yard they went to—they would not be allowed to work anywhere in London river."

As I have said, in the face of this evidence, how anyone can doubt that it was the communication made by Allen that caused the dismissal of these two men I am not able to understand, and in what I have to say hereafter I shall assume, as proved—or, at all events, as established—by evidence proper to be submitted to a jury, that it was Allen who caused the dismissal of the plaintiffs.

The first objection made to the plaintiffs' right to recover for the loss which they thus undoubtedly suffered is that no right of the plaintiffs was infringed, and that the right contended for on their behalf is not a right recognized by law, or at all events only such a right as everyone else is entitled to, deprive them of if they stop short of physical violence or obstruction. I think the right to employ their labour as they will is a right both recognized by the law and sufficiently guarded by its provisions to make any undue interference with that right an actionable wrong.

Very early authorities in the law have recognized the right, and in my view no authority can be found which questions or qualifies it. The schoolmaster who complained that his scholars were being assaulted and brought an action; the quarry-owner who complained that his servants were being menaced and molested, were both held to have a right of action. And it appears to me that the importance of those cases and the principle established by them has not been sufficiently considered. It is said that threats of violence or actual violence were unlawful means; the lawfulness of the means I will discuss hereafter. But the point on which these cases are important is the existence of the right. It was not the schoolmaster who was assaulted; it was not the quarry-owner who was assaulted or threatened; but nevertheless, the schoolmaster was held entitled to bring an action in respect of the loss of scholars attending his school, and the quarry-owner in respect of the loss of workmen to his quarry. They were third persons; no violence or threats were applied to them, and the cause of action, which they had a right to insist on, was the indirect effect upon themselves of violence and threats applied to others.

In my view there are binding authorities to show that the preliminary question—namely, whether there was any right of the plaintiffs to pursue their calling unmolested, must be answered in the affirmative. The question of what is the right invaded would seem to be reasonably answered, and the universality of the right to all her Majesty's subjects seems to me to be no argument against its existence. It is, indeed, part of that freedom from restraint, that liberty of action which, in my view, may be found running through the principles of our law.

As I have said, I will deal separately both with the remedy for the infringement of that right, if it has been infringed, and with the means.

Upon this part of the case I wish to quote and make my own the language of Bramwell, B., in Ex v. Druitt and Others, 10 Cox C. C. 592, at p. 600: "When the law gave, or rather acknowledged, a right, it provided a punishment or a remedy for the violation of that right. That was a cardinal rule and an obvious one. The old expression that 'there was no wrong without a remedy' might also be interpreted to mean that there was also no right without a remedy. Sometimes the remedy was by a criminal proceeding, sometimes by a civil action, sometimes by both. Having made those general remarks I would make another, which was also familiar to all Englishmen—namely, that there was no right in this country under our laws so sacred as the right of personal liberty. No right of property or capital about which there had been so much declamation was so sacred or so carefully guarded by the law of this land as that of personal liberty. They were quite aware of the pains taken by the common law, by the writ, as it was called, of habeas corpus, and supplemented by statute, to secure to every man his personal freedom—that he should not be put in prison without lawful cause, and that if he was he should be brought before a competent magistrate within a given time and be set at liberty or undergo punishment. But that liberty was not liberty of the body only. It was also a liberty of the mind and will; and the liberty of a man's mind and will, to say he should bestow himself and his means, his talents and his industry, was as much a subject of the law's protection as was that of his body. Generally speaking, the way in which people had endeavoured to control the operation of the minds of men was by putting restraints on their bodies, and therefore we had not so many instances in which the liberty of the mind was vindicated as was that of the body. Still, if any set of men agreed among themselves to coerce that liberty of mind and thought by compulsion and restraint, they would be guilty of a criminal offence—namely, that of conspiring against the liberty of mind and freedom of will of those towards whom they so conducted themselves. He was referring to coercion or compulsion, something that was unpleasant and annoying to the mind operated upon, and he laid it down as clear and undoubted law that if two or more persons agreed that they would by such means co-operate together against that liberty they would be guilty of an indictable offence."

It is said indeed that an action for the infringement of such a right is a novelty, but I do not concur that it is, or that if it were, it would be a sufficient argument. The whole history of the action upon the case from the 13 Edward 1, c. 24, downwards, affirms the principle that where cases fall under the same right and require a like remedy new precedents should be created.

So in Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51, at p. 63, per Ashurst, J., "another argument which has been made use of is that this is a new case, and that there is no precedent for such an action. Where cases are new in their principle, there I admit that it is necessary to have recourse to legislative interposition in order to remedy the grievance; but where the case is only new in instance and the only question is upon the application of a principle recognized in the law of such new case, it will be just as competent to courts of justice to apply the principle in any case that may arise two centuries hence, as it was two centuries ago."

First it is said that the company were acting within their legal rights in discharging the plaintiffs. So they were, but does that affect the question of the responsibility of the person who caused them so to act by the means he used? The scholars who went away from the school were entitled to do so. The miners were entitled to cease working at the quarry. The natives were entitled to avoid running the risk of being shot. But the question is, What was the cause of their thus exercising their legal right?

The question must be whether what was done in fact, and what did in fact procure the dismissal of the plaintiff, was an actionable wrong or not. I have never heard that a man who was dismissed from his service by reason of some slander could not maintain an action against the slanderer because the master had a legal right to discharge him.

In treating the question I can desire no more apt exposition of the law than what is contained in Bowen, L.J.'s, admirably-reasoned judgment in the Mogul case in the Court of Appeal. "Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it. The intentional driving away of customers by show of violence: Tarleton v. McGawley, Peake N. P. C. 270; the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing: Clifford v. Brandon, 2 Camp. 358; Gregory v. Brunswick, 6 Man. & G. 205; the disturbance of wild fowl in decoys by the firing of guns: Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East 571; and Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East 574*n*; the impeding or threatening servants or workmen: Garret v. Taylor, Cro. Jac. 567; the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts: Bowen v. Hall, 29 W. R. 367, 6 Q. B. D. 333; Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 Ell. and Bl. 216; all are instances of such forbidden acts."

It will be observed that in what Bowen, L.J., says, intimation, obstruction, or molestation, or intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other (always assuming that there is no just cause for it), are each of them, where damage has been caused, actionable wrongs. And so Sir William Erle in a passage quoted by the late Master of the Rolls (Lord Esher) points out that "every person has a right under the law, as between himself and his fellow-subjects, to full freedom in disposing of his own labour or his own capital according to his will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others. Every act causing an obstruction to another in the exercise of the right comprised within this description, done, not in the exercise of the actor's own right, but for the purpose of obstruction, would, if damage should be caused thereby to the party obstructed, be a violation of this prohibition."

The Lord Justice was too keen a reasoner not to observe that the words "without just cause or excuse," which he had used, required exposition to render his reasoning complete, and accordingly he explains in another part of his judgment what his view was of malice. His lordship thus describes the state of mind which in his view would negative just cause or excuse: Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow, & Co., 37 W. R. 766, at p. 760, 23 Q. B. D. 598, at p. 613. "Now, intentionally to do that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's property or trade, is actionable if done without just cause or excuse. Such intentional action when done without just cause or excuse is what the law calls a malicious wrong: see Bromage v. Prosser, 4 B. & C. 247; Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty, per Lord Blackburn, 31 W. R. 165, 7 App. Cas. 741, at p. 772."

I must, for my own part, disclaim the idea that you can get rid of observations such as these in the learned judge's judgment by saying that they are obiter. Of course, one is familiar with the observation that such-and-such an opinion expressed by a learned judge was not necessary for the decision of the case. But where a distinction is being drawn between what is lawful and what is not, and where, as in this case, the observations form part of the reasoning by which the conclusion is arrived at, it appears to me that, whichever way the decision may be, one part of the judgment is as much an authoritative exposition of the law as the other.

Now, it will be observed that Bowen, L.J., points out that not only contractual rights are comprehended within his view, but other rights, such as the right to carry on the business of an actor and the like.

In the same case, when appealed to this House, 40 W. R. 337, [1892] A. C. 25, it appears to me that the principle upon which that decision was arrived at is an important one, as excluding what is here suggested to be lawful. I myself asked in that case: "What legal right is interfered with? What coercion of the mind or will or of the person is effected? All are free to trade upon what terms they will, and nothing has been done, except in rival trading, which can be supposed to interfere with the appellants' interests." Lord Watson pointed out that the withdrawal of agents at first appeared to him to be a matter attended with difficulty, but that, on consideration, he was satisfied that it could not be regarded as an illegal act. "In the first place, it was impossible that any honest man could impartially discharge his duty of finding freights to parties who occupied the hostile position of the appellants and respondents; and in the second place the respondents gave the agents the option of continuing to act for one or other of them in circumstances which placed the appellants at no disadvantage." And he added: "That it had not been proved, and not been suggested, that the respondents used either misrepresentation or compulsion for thep. urpose of obtaining the object of their combination" And Lord Bramwell begins his judgment by saying that the plaintiffs in that case "did not complain of any trespass, violence, force, fraud, or breach of contract, nor of any direct tort or violation of any right of the plaintiffs, like the case of firing to frighten birds from a decoy; nor of any act, the ultimate object of which was to injure the plaintiffs, having its origin in malice or ill-will to them." Lord Morris expressed his intention to adopt entirely the principles laid down by Bowen, L.J.; and Lord Macnaghten read and adopted Lord Bramwell's judgment. Lord Field justifies his opinion, which he says may be supported upon the principles laid down in Keeble v. Hickeringill, as to which I shall have a word to say hereafter. But he goes on to say that "Everything that was done by the respondents was done in the exercise of their right to carry on their own trade, and was bonâ fide so done. There was not only no malice or indirect object in fact, but the existence of the right to exercise a lawful employment in the pursuance of which the respondents acted, negatives the presumption of malice which arises when the purposed inflictionof loss and injury upon another cannot be attributed to any legitimate cause, and is therefore presumably due to nothing but its obvious object of harm." And Lord Hannen says "that he considered that a different case would have arisen if the evidence had shown that the object of the defendants was a malicious one—namely, to injure the plaintiff, whether they, the defendants, should be benefited or not." And he concluded his judgment by saying "that it appears to him that in that case there was nothing indicating an intention to injure the plaintiffs, except in so far as such injury would be the result of the defendants obtaining for themselves the benefits of the carrying trade, by giving better terms to customers than their rivals, the plaintiffs, were willing to offer."

I have been careful to call attention to the opinions of the noble and learned lords, not only because I think a use has been made of the decision in that case which is not justified by anything in the opinions delivered, but rather because I think that upon the principles I have indicated before, these opinions form a very considerable body of authority, that if the elements which each noble lord in turn pointed out did not exist in that case had, in fact, existed, the decision would have been the other way.

I do not think that the case of Keeble v. Hickeringill stands alone, though if it did, considering who decided it, and that certainly in later years it has been much quoted and commented on, and never until now, so far as I am aware, criticised or questioned, I should be quite content to rely upon the authority of so profound a lawyer as Sir John Holt, and such an expositor as he was of the spirit of freedom which runs through the English law; but it will be also observed that in this House, Lords Bramwell and Field and, in the Court of Appeal, Bowen, L.J., assume it to be good law.

It is interesting to observe that that case has been recognized and acted upon in the American courts, where these questions of capital and labour have not infrequently arisen.

In Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, it was held that an action of tort would lie upon a count alleging that the plaintiff was a manufacturer of shoes, and for the prosecution of his business it was necessary for him to employ many shoemakers; that the defendant well knowing this, did unlawfully, and without justifiable cause, molest him in carrying on the said business with the unlawful purpose of preventing him from carrying it on, and wilfully induced many shoemakers who were in his employment, and others who were about to enter into it, to abandon it without his consent and against his will, and that thereby he lost their services and the profits, &c., to be derived therefrom, and was put to expense, &c. The second count alleges contracts between the plaintiff and the shoemakers to make stock into shoes, and that the defendant "well knowing this, with the unlawful purpose of preventing him (the plaintiff) from carrying on his business, induced them to return the stock unfinished to the factory, and to neglect and refuse to make it into shoes as they had agreed to do." The third count alleges the defendant enticed and procured a shoemaker in the plaintiff's service and employment who had agreed to make three cases of shoes to leave the plaintiff's service and employment. There was a demurrer to the declaration, and this demurrer was allowed in the superior court, whereupon the plaintiff appealed. Wells, J., after citing Com. Dig. Action on the case A., "in all cases where a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action on the case to be repaired in damages," goes on to review in order Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East 574n; Tarleton v. McGawley, Peake 270; Green v. Button, 2 C. M. & R. 707; Gunter v. Astor, 4 J. B. Moore 12; Hart v. Aldridge, Cowp. 54; Shepherd v. Wakeman, Sid. 79; Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes 577; Lumley v. Gye, 2 En. & B. 216. He overruled the demurrer, and holding that the declaration sufficiently alleged (1) intentional and wilful acts; (2) calculated to cause damage to the plaintiff in his lawful business; (3) done with the unlawful purpose to cause such damage and loss without right or justifiable cause on the part of the defendant (which constitutes malice); and (4) actual damage and loss resulting, held that each of the three counts disclosed a good cause of action. "This decision," continues the learned judge, "does not apply to a case of interference by way of friendly advice, honestly given; nor is it in denial of the right to free expression of opinion. We have no occasion now to consider what would constitute justifiable cause."

Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. 385, and Rice v. Manley, C. A., State of New York, 21 Sickels 82 (66 N. Y.), were both cases where the defendant, through false words, caused a third person who had entered into contracts of sale (in the first-named case of cheese, in the second of hogs) void by the Statute of Frauds, to break such contracts. An action was held to lie in each case.

In Bixby v. Dunlap, 22 Amer. Rep. 475, it was held that exemplary damages could be recovered from a defendant who knowingly procured a servant to leave a master whom she had contracted to serve without ever being actually in his employment. Lumley v. Gye is here taken as having laid down the law on this subject.

In Angle v. Chicago, &c., Co., 151 U. S. Rep. 6, it was alleged that the United States had granted lands in the State of Wisconsin in aid of the construction of railways. The State of Wisconsin had granted a portion of these lands to the defendant company for the purpose of constructing a particular railway. It had also granted other lands to another company, the Portage Co., to construct another and somewhat competing railway; this latter railway was to be completed within a certain time. This could not be done, and the State of Wisconsin enlarged the time for completion. The Portage Co. then employed the plaintiff to complete the line, and he was actively prosecuting the work when the defendant company, conspiring with certain officials of the Portage Co., induced the State of Wisconsin to revoke the concession to the Portage Co., whereby the plaintiff lost his employment. He accordingly brought his action. The court held, following Lumley v. Gye and Bowen v. Hall, that the defendant company were liable to the plaintiff.

I now revert to that part of the case which I admit has to be carefully considered: whether in what the defendant did in order to procure the dismissal of the plaintiffs he came within any of the rules which have been laid down in the cases quoted. Now, to my mind, he was guilty of intimidation and coercion through that intimidation. In using that word "intimidation" I am not using it in the technical sense which the statutes upon the subject have been construed to mean; I will explain in what sense I do understand the word, but in passing I must deprecate the language which has been used to minimize the effect of what Allen said. I observe it is described as "inconvenience." That is not how it is described by the witness. Edmonds, the foreman of the Glengall Co., thus describes what would have been the effect upon the business of the firm. He says: "They were rather busy just then with the boilermakers; that they employed three times as many boilermakers as shipwrights; and if the boilermakers had knocked off work or struck, it would have stopped the business of the company altogether—entirely—at that time, and that it was a very serious matter to the firm, and that the discharge of the men was in order to prevent their having to stop their business."

It seems to me very obvious to ask whether the threat to do that which will have such an effect as the witness described is a coercion of the will or not. The men were good workmen and of good character; they were working, even according to Allen's own view, at their own trade as shipwrights, but they had worked upon a former occasion for a different employer upon an iron ship.

I think the dissatisfaction among the boilermakers at these two men being employed has been greatly exaggerated. The man Elliott, who actually sent for Allen, gives this account of it: "We were having a talk together at breakfast-time, and some of them felt dissatisfied about it. Some of them said we had better leave our work. I said, 'Do not do anything of the kind.' . . . I sent a telegram to Allen. . . . When I met Mr. Allen at breakfast-time the next morning he said to me: 'Well, what is this here little bit of a trouble here?' 'Well,' I said, 'the chaps are dissatisfied about these here two plaintiffs, Flood and Taylor, being in the habit of working over at Mills & Knight's.' 'Well,' he said, 'what do they want?' 'Some of them are saying they are going to leave their work.' He says, 'The best thing you can do is to go in and tell them not to leave their work until things are settled; wait and see how things settle.' I said, 'Very good, I will tell them what you say now.'"

The cross-examination is important with reference to what took place afterwards, and as exhibiting the extent and degree to which even some of the men—for it goes no further—expressed their wishes. The learned counsel asks: "Their wishes were that these men, whose conduct they objected to at Mills & Knight's, should not be kept in the same employ with themselves. A.—Oh, no. Q.—That was the feeling, was it not. A.—No. Q.—Well, let me understand. A.—They did not say they should not be kept in the employ of the firm at all. Q.—They did not say they should not be kept on the job on which they were being employed. A.—They did not wish them among our midst. Q.—Working on the same ship. A.—Yes."

It will be observed how limited are the numbers in respect of which the allegation of discontent is put forward, and it will be observed that this witness entirely repudiated any wish to prevent these men being employed, but even that wish is limited to the desire that they should not be employed upon the same ship. But perhaps the most astonishing part of the case is to be found in Allen's own evidence.

Allen denies that he had ever said anything about the men being called out. He denies in terms that he said the same thing would happen in any yard where the two men were employed. He denies that he used that memorable language, "We have made up our minds that wherever it is known that there are any shipwrights who have been engaged doing ironwork the boilermakers will leave work in that yard." Being asked whether he wished the step to be taken of the two men being discharged, he said, "He had no such thought floating in his mind at the time." This is, of course, in direct conflict with the evidence given by the manager and the foreman of the Glengall Co., but, as I have said, the credibility of the witness was for the jury and not for me.

And now it is important to call attention to the exact question which was left to the jury. Kennedy, J., said: "The question that I want you to answer is that, if you find he induced the Glengall Iron Co. by the threat which is suggested by the plaintiffs of calling out all the men on strike, and he continued in that course of conduct if there was any attempt to employ them again, did he do that with the malicious intention which I have endeavoured to explain—that is, merely, not for the purpose of forwarding that which he believed to be his interest as a delegate of his union in the fair consideration of that interest, but for the purpose of injuring these plaintiffs, and preventing them doing that which they were each of them entitled to do." Observe the phrase used: "the threat suggested by the plaintiff of calling out all the men on strike," and that that induced the Glengall Iron Co. to discharge the plaintiff, and yet it is said that Allen's threat had nothing to do with the discharge of the plaintiffs. It will be observed that Kennedy, J., draws a distinction between the conduct which he assumes to be lawful on Allen's part to do what he did do if it were merely for the purpose of forwarding that which he believed to be his interest as a delegate of his union in fair consideration of that interest on the one hand, and on the other hand his conduct, if what he did was done for the purpose injuring these plaintiffs.

It appears to me that that is a direction of which the defendants cannot complain, since it puts what is to my mind an alternative more favourable to them. In my view his belief that what he was doing was for his interest as a delegate of his union would not justify the doing of what he did do. It is alleged, and to my mind and to the mind of the jury proved, that the employers were compelled under pressure of the threats that he used to discharge the plaintiffs.

I have not used the word "intimidated" because I observe the learned judge says there was no intimidation in a legal sense. If what was meant by that was that there was no threat of violence to person or property, it is true, but the word "intimidation" is not always to be construed as it has been construed under 6 Geo. 4, c. 129. The construction of it in that statute flowed from the other words with which the word "intimidate" is associated; and if, without using the word "intimidate," that which was held out as the inducement to dismiss the plaintiffs was that such a stoppage of the works should be occasioned as that the business of the company would seriously suffer, I should think that would be a thing which would be likely to produce fear of the consequences of the company retaining them in their employment, and a company which abstained from doing so by reason of that fear would justly be described as "intimidated."

But the objection made by the defendants appears to be that the word "malicious" adds nothing, that if the thing was lawful it was lawful absolutely, if it was not lawful it was unlawful; the addition of the word "malicious" can make no difference. The fallacy appears to me to reside in the assumption that everything must be absolutely lawful or absolutely unlawful. There are many things which may become lawful or unlawful according to circumstances.

In a decision of this House (Corporation of Bradford v. Pickles, 44 W. R. 190, [1895] A. C. 587) it has undoubtedly been held that whatever a man's motives may be, he may dig into his own land and divert subterranean water which but for his so treating his own land might have reached his neighbour's land. But that is because the neighbour had no right to the flow of the subterranean water in that direction, and he had an absolute right to do what he would with his own property. But what analogy has such a case with the intentional inflicting of injury upon another person's property, reputation, or lawful occupation? To dig into one's own land under the circumstances stated requires no cause or excuse. He may act from mere caprice, but his right on his own land is absolute so long as he does not interfere with the rights of others.

But referring to Bowen, L.J.'s, observation, which to my mind is exactly accurate, "in order to justify the intentional doing of that which is calculated in the ordinary course of events to damage, and which does, in fact, damage another in that other person's property or trade" you must have some just cause or excuse.

Now the word "malicious" appears to me to negative just cause or excuse, and without attempting an exhaustive exposition of the word itself it appears to me that if I apply the language of Bowen, L.J., it is enough to show that this was, within the meaning of the law, "malicious."

It appears to me that no better illustration can be given of the distinction on which I am insisting between an act which can be legally done, and an act which cannot be so done because tainted with malice, than such a colloquy between the representative of the master and the representative of the men as might have been held on the occasion which has given rise to this action. If the representative of the men had in good faith and without indirect motive pointed out the inconvenience that might result from having two sets of men working together on the same ship whose views upon the particular question were so diverse that it would be inexpedient to bring them together, no one could have complained; but if his object was to punish the men belonging to another union because on some former occasion they had worked on an iron ship, it seems that the difference of motive may make the whole difference between the lawfulness or unlawfulness of what he did.

I see it is suggested by one of your lordships that the action for malicious prosecution is supposed to be an exception. I am not quite certain that I understand what is the proposition to which it is an exception. If it means that there is no other form of procedure known to the law wherein malice may make the distinction between a lawful and an unlawful act, I am unable to agree. Maliciously procuring a person to be made a bankrupt, maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause presenting a petition to wind up a company, or maliciously procuring an arrest, are equally cases wherein the state of mind of the person procuring the bankruptcy, the winding up, or the arrest may affect the question of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the act done.

Again, in slander or libel the right to preserve one's character or business from attack appears to me quite as vague and general a right as it is suggested is the right to pursue one's occupation unmolested; and it cannot be denied that in both these cases the lawfulness or unlawfulness of what is said or written may depend upon the absence or presence of malice.

Doubtless there are cases in which the mere presence of malice in an act done will not necessarily give a right of action, since no damage may result, and in this case, however malicious Allen's intervention may have been, if the employers had defied Allen's threats instead of yielding to them, the plaintiffs could not have succeeded in an action, because they would not have been injured: see Quartz Hill Co. v. Eyre, 31 W. R. 668, 11 Q. B. D. 674; Gibbs v. Pike, 9 M. & W. 351; Jennings v. Florence, 2 C. B. N. S. 467, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 60.

On the same principle an action will not lie against a sheriff for a false return to a writ of execution if the plaintiff has not suffered actual damage in consequence of the false return: see Wylie v. Birch, 4 Q. B. 566.

I turn now to the course of the trial, which is important in more ways than one. It is manifest that both the form of the statement of claim and the evidence directed at the trial were intended to raise the question of the right of the Boilermakers' Union to use what I will call their union for combined action against the individual plaintiffs who belonged to another union.

The plaintiffs apparently proceeded upon the assumption that what was represented to them as having been said by Allen was said in his character of delegate of, and speaking with the authority of, the Boilermakers' Union, and accordingly the general secretary of this trades union and the chairman at the time of these transactions were both joined as defendants. Had they adopted or had been proved to authorize the course taken by Allen, a question would have arisen whether or not they were all three parties to a conspiracy. Whether that charge could have been maintained against them or not I at present desire to say nothing. Such a question may arise again, and I wish to keep myself free to consider that question when it arises. But the chairman and the secretary of the union absolutely disclaimed any general or specific authority on the part of Allen either to threaten the employers or to withdraw the men. As to specific authority the chairman proved that he had never heard of the dispute until he was served with the writ in the action. He says in terms that he never gave any authority to Mr. Allen to threaten employers to withdraw men from the work, and to do any such thing he regarded as a very serious matter for any delegate to take upon himself; and so far was he from adopting what Allen is sworn to have said—namely, that the union would hunt the men out of every employment where they were known to be because they had once worked in an iron ship, he emphatically denies the right of his union to do anything of the sort; he says in terms, "providing that the shipwright, after being at the ironwork, started in some other place, for instance, then I would say we have no right whatever to interfere with him unless he were then beginning ironwork again. If he started at woodwork we would not interfere with him in any other place."

The learned counsel then put a question to him (I think somewhat under a misapprehension as to what the learned judge himself meant by a question he put), "You say that may depend on circumstances?" and his answer is, "I do not say they would in that instance, because in no instance have I ever known men interfering with him when he went to some other works and started his own particular work."

I think it is only just to the Boilermakers' Union to point out how emphatically and distinctly their authorized officers (chairman and general secretary) disclaimed any such practice or principle as that which Allen is sworn to have attributed to them, and accordingly no imputation or liability could properly be attributed to the Boilermakers' Union or their authorized officers; but does that relieve Allen from the consequences of what he did?

If concerted collective action to enforce, by ruining the men's employment, the will of a large number of men upon a minority, whether the minority consists of a small or of a large number, be a cause of action where the actual damage is produced, it would seem to be a very singular result that an individual who falsely assumes the character of representing a large body uses the name of that large body to give force and support to the threat which he utters, and so produces the injury to the individual or to the minority, could shield himself from responsibility by proving that the body whose power and influence he had falsely invoked as his supporters had given him no authority for his threats—so that, if they in truth authorized him, he and they might all have been responsible; while the false statement that he made, though acting upon the employer by the same pressure because it was believed, and producing the same mischief to the person against whom it was directed, could establish no cause of action against himself because it was false.
